Davis, who took office in May after the investigation was underway, would only say that his agency was actively pursuing a difficult inquiry. He said the officers had logged between three and six years on the force, and some were on street patrol.

Inglewood, a working-class city of 112,000, has long struggled with prostitution problems. Because of its proximity to Los Angeles International Airport, Inglewood has numerous hotels lining its main commercial streets.

Davis insisted that the investigation, which involves administrative rather than criminal improprieties, did not indicate there was a systemic problem with officer misconduct. He said the investigation could lead to changes in training and management.

The investigation comes as the department, the seventh-largest police agency in the county, struggles to fill two dozen vacancies in its 213-officer force.

Sources have told The Times that the internal affairs investigation began after federal authorities launched an investigation of money-laundering and prostitution involving women smuggled into Los Angeles from Asia.

That probe, which resulted in charges against more than two dozen people, led to allegations that Inglewood officers engaged in the sexual liaisons -- sometimes in uniform -- during work hours and off duty, according to several local and federal sources familiar with the case.

Evidence seized by federal agents and local investigators included "very detailed ledgers" that suggested Inglewood officers were receiving sexual favors at the businesses without paying, according to one source close to the investigation.

The ledgers, the source said, had the names of customers and the amounts they paid -- except when the customers were police officers. In those cases, the women allegedly entered a symbol.

Word of the inquiry comes less than two months after the FBI confirmed that it was investigating two Inglewood police officers in the alleged rape of a woman they stopped on suspicion of prostitution. The woman's attorney said last week that he has filed a claim against the city and is awaiting an answer from authorities on whether the two officers have been arrested or charged.

Davis today said there were no developments in that case.

To date, sources say, none of the officers has been fired, though some have retired or left the city for other departments.

The internal affairs investigation began more than a year ago when several Inglewood massage parlors and tanning salons were the focus of federal allegations of money laundering and prostitution.

To date, 18 people have pleaded guilty in that investigation, and four others -- including the alleged owner of the brothels, Kimberly Mao -- are awaiting trial.

Mao has pleaded not guilty to the federal charges and has repeatedly denied involvement in prostitution or money-laundering.

But in a recent interview organized by Mao, a dozen women who worked for her at the businesses told The Times that they had seen or heard of officers coming into the massage parlors and sometimes demanding sexual services.

The women, who denied they were prostitutes, recalled several specific incidents, including one in which officers donned masks to hide their identities and pointed guns at employees. Another employee told The Times that an older officer exposed himself in an unsuccessful effort to have her engage in sex with him.

Investigation Nearing End In Case Of Pizza Man Killed By Bomb Collar (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, February 16, 2007

More than three years after a bank robbery suspect in Erie, Pa., was killed when a bomb locked around his neck exploded, a federal prosecutor has summoned investigators to meet today in Pittsburgh to help her determine whether to file charges in the case.

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan says her meeting with investigators from the FBI, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and the Pennsylvania State Police indicates that the probe into the bizarre death of Brian Wells, 46, is nearly complete. "The investigation is in its final stages," she says.

A federal grand jury in Erie has heard testimony from "numerous" witnesses, Buchanan says, adding that the probe has been complicated by the deaths of at least two potential witnesses.

The death of Wells, a pizza deliveryman, received national attention because it occurred on live television and because of the many questions it left. No one has been arrested in the case, and it remains unclear whether Wells was a willing participant in a bank robbery plot that went awry or was the unwitting victim of a such a plot.

Investigators also have examined other possibilities. Among them: that the intent all along was not to rob the bank, but to send Wells to a torturous death. Or, that Wells was part of a robbery plot but thought the bomb was fake.

Buchanan declined to comment on whether authorities believe they have resolved such questions.

Wells' strange odyssey began about 1:30 p.m. on Aug. 28, 2003, when an unidentified person called Mama Mia's Pizzaria in Erie and ordered two sausage pizzas to be delivered to what was described as a construction site. Wells, a longtime employee of the restaurant, was sent to deliver the pizzas.

At some point afterward, the bomb was locked around Wells' neck. He drove his Geo Metro to a PNC Bank branch and walked inside carrying a nine-page note that told him how to rob the bank. The note also told Wells to quickly make a series of stops after leaving the bank, suggesting that his progress was being monitored.

When he was stopped by police in a nearby parking lot after leaving the bank with an undisclosed amount of money, Wells had less than 30 minutes to make three more stops, according to the note. The bomb exploded shortly after officers had stopped Wells.

Just before the explosion, Wells offered a possible clue when he told officers that whoever put the device around his neck "pulled a key out and started a timer."

Throughout the investigation, Wells' relatives and friends have sought to cast him as an innocent victim. On a website — www.brianwells.net — they have suggested that he was abducted by up to seven men.

"This case is not solved," the site says. "The Killers must be caught before they Kill again."

Wells' family members could not be reached for comment Thursday.

8 In Inland Empire Accused Of 'Fight Club' Crimes (LAT)

By Sara Lin And Jonathan Abrams, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

Police say the gang, founded by Murrieta high school football players, began as bullies but escalated to robberies, burglaries and assaults.

Eight former students of Murrieta Valley High School, including former football players accused of belonging to a "Fight Club" gang, were arrested Thursday on suspicion of waging a crime spree of robberies, burglaries and assaults over two years.

The gang was founded in 2004 by a group of football players who injected anabolic steroids to enhance their performance on the field — and beat up students who "disrespected" their members, said Lt. Dennis Vrooman, spokesman for the Murrieta Police Department.

The suspects started calling themselves "Fight Club" and would challenge one another to fistfights outside the Murrieta school — attracting groups of juvenile spectators, police said. The gang appears to have been modeled on the gang depicted in the 1999 film "Fight Club," starring Brad Pitt.

"They essentially started out as bullies in the school and graduated to crimes of violence," Vrooman said. They had dog tags and baseball caps with an "FC" logo, he said.

Members of the gang would case homes in Murrieta and neighboring Temecula while attending parties, and come back days later to burglarize the residences, investigators allege. They first stole guns, which were later used in robberies at liquor stores and gas stations, Vrooman said.

Members of the gang attempted a home-invasion robbery and committed a car theft, two cases of arson, multiple armed robberies, false imprisonment and several assaults, police said.

Four of the suspects were arrested on suspicion of participating in a criminal street gang, which when considered with the other allegations could lead to a life sentence if convicted, Vrooman said.

The arrests came after a six-month investigation by the Murrieta-Temecula Regional Gang Task Force.

Tim Hales, commander of the task force, said several of those taken into custody came from good neighborhoods.

"They're not poor kids," Hales said. "These are kids that came from good families, for the most part."

Hales added that not all of those arrested were active in the gang: "Not all are Fight Club members; some are active members and some are associates."

Those arrested were Travis Brenn Baker, 20, of Winchester; Christopher David Owen Bredesen, 18, of Murrieta; Gilberto Cuevas, 18, of Murrieta; Simon Lyle Johnson, 20, of Murrieta; Nathan R. Martinez, 21, of La Habra; Michael Robert Petty, 20, of Murrieta; William J. Unmacht IV, 21, of Murrieta; and Martin Arturo Valle, 21, of Murrieta. A 17-year-old from Murrieta, a student at the school, also was arrested.

Three suspects remain at large, including Anthony Craig Smith, 19, of Murrieta, who is accused of stealing a motorcycle and setting it ablaze, police said.

The father of Simon Johnson said in a telephone interview Thursday that his son knew the other suspects, but was not involved in the Fight Club.

He said police told him that Johnson, who was charged with possession of stolen property and possession of a concealable firearm, may have been present when a stolen firearm was sold. Detectives had questioned the father and others about a firearm that was said to have disappeared from a house after a party.

After that, Johnson's father said, his son disassociated himself from the others and has been working for a flooring company.

"When all this started … Simon made the choice to say, 'These guys are bad news,' and he cut the cord with them," said Johnson's father, who declined to give his first name.

The father of the 17-year-old said the teen was on the football team. Police officials told him his son's arrest was related to a MySpace.com posting that was interpreted as a threat, he said.

Family members of Cuevas, Petty and Valle declined to comment. Family members of Baker, Bredesen, Martinez and Unmacht could not be reached for comment.

Murrieta Valley High School Principal Renate Jefferson declined to comment about the arrests.

As for the allegation by police that football team members used steroids, Jefferson said that coaches at the school regularly warn students about the dangers of using those performance-enhancing substances, as well as drugs and alcohol.

Former Murrieta Valley Athletic Director Dave Zirkle said he knew of three of the former players — Martinez, Petty and Unmacht — adding that Unmacht's father was an assistant coach while his son played for the team.

"They were never in trouble that I knew of. They were good students and good kids," Zirkle, who retired in 2004, said.

A spokeswoman for the Murrieta Valley Unified School District said school officials had cooperated fully with police, but declined to comment further.

Police said the gang was well known on the high school campus. "It was pretty widely known that one, you don't mess with people from Fight Club; and two, everyone knew who they were and were afraid of them," Hales, the task force commander, said.

The group was responsible for dozens of assaults, sending at least one boy to the hospital for several days, Hales said.

Hales described the gang as amateurs when it came to burglarizing homes and robbing stores.

"They were doing things unmasked and ungloved," he said. "Eventually they learned. The last few were done masked and gloved."

Still, their alleged targets were chosen erratically. They allegedly burglarized gas stations and liquor stores for cash and broke into businesses to steal computers and workout equipment. But in residences, they allegedly swiped drug paraphernalia, baseball caps and clothing.

"I don't think wanted high market value; they just wanted things for themselves," Hales said.

The suspects are to be arraigned Feb. 20.

CIVIL LAW:

Special Counsel Accused Of Intimidation In Probe (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

A trouble-plagued whistle-blower investigation at the Office of Special Counsel -- whose duties include shielding federal whistle-blowers -- hit another snag this week when employees accused the special counsel of intimidation in the probe.

The Office of Personnel Management's inspector general has been investigating allegations by current and former OSC employees that Special Counsel Scott J. Bloch retaliated against underlings who disagreed with his policies -- by, among other means, transferring them out of state -- and tossed out legitimate whistle-blower cases to reduce the office backlog. Bloch denies the accusations, saying that under his leadership the agency has grown more efficient and receptive to whistle-blowers.

The probe is the most serious of many problems at the agency since Bloch, a Kansas lawyer who served at the Justice Department's Task Force for Faith-based and Community Initiatives, was appointed by President Bush three years ago. Since he took the helm in 2004, staffers at the OSC, a small agency of about 100 lawyers and investigators, have accused him of a range of offenses, from having an anti-gay bias to criticizing employees for wearing short skirts and tight pants to work.

The 16-month investigation has been beset by delays, accusations and counter-accusations. The latest problem began two weeks ago, when Bloch's deputy sent staffers a memo asking them to inform OSC higher-ups when investigators contact them. Further, the memo read, employees should meet with investigators in the office, in a special conference room. Some employees cried foul, saying the recommendations made them afraid to be interviewed in the probe.

This week, Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility, the Project on Government Oversight, the Government Accountability Project and Human Rights Campaign and a lawyer for the OSC employees protested in a letter to legislators and to Clay Johnson III, the Office of Management and Budget deputy who ordered the OSC probe.

The OSC's memo, the group said, "was only the latest in a series of actions by Bloch to obstruct" the investigation. "Other actions have included suggestions that all witnesses interviewed . . . provide Bloch with affidavits describing what they had been asked and how they responded."

Bloch's office responded with a statement: "Due to the fact that this is an ongoing investigation, OSC cannot comment on it other than to say we look forward to the speedy resolution. Special Counsel Bloch has been and continues to be recused from any decision-making in this investigation. The Office of Special Counsel has fully cooperated in the investigation, and any information to the contrary is reckless speculation."

But the same day the organizations went to the OMB and Congress, Bloch's new deputy, Jim Byrne, issued another employee memo -- not inspired by the complaint, he said.

"All OSC Employees: This e-mail communicates new procedures that will be used . . . in conducting the remainder of its investigative work in our agency. . . . The [investigators] will schedule interviews by directly contacting the employee with whom they wish to speak. The date, time, and place of the interviews will be arranged between the OIG and the employee. There is no longer a requirement to use OSC facilities for the interview. . . ." he wrote.

"All employees who are contacted by the OIG should cooperate fully with the investigators and provide information and testimony unless disclosure of the information is prohibited by law, regulation, or policy. All employees are permitted to be represented by personal counsel during their interview. . . .

"And, you are also welcome to directly contact me with any questions that you may have. We have nothing to hide."

Protecting Those Who Speak Out (NYT)

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

The plight of federal workers who raise alarms about waste and fraud in government has become a scandal unto itself. That candid air marshal suddenly assigned to desk duty after complaining of shoddy agency practices has plenty of company, including workers who have lost security clearances or found their jobs suddenly relocated far from home. But in a vote this week of bipartisan unanimity, the House government reform committee offered whistle-blowers fresh hope with a much needed measure to protect them against official retaliation.

Existing law gives too much of an edge to oversight boards that are inclined to dismiss or belittle the charges of whistle-blowers. The bill, sponsored by Henry Waxman, Democrat of California, and Tom Davis, Republican of Virginia, would guarantee a worker the right to a court review of a complaint if it lingers beyond six months without action.

The protection against retaliation would also be extended for the first time to the F.B.I. and to intelligence agencies where wastefulness is draped in secrecy. (Maybe someone on the inside could finally explain the hundreds of F.B.I. computers and firearms that are regularly lost.) And nongovernment workers employed by federal contractors would finally have protection if they blew the whistle. The bill would extend anti-retaliation rights to those workers who courageously complained about the politicization of science by patronage appointees, and to airport security workers.

Politicians campaign endlessly on promises to end waste, fraud and abuse. Congress has a golden opportunity to protect the people whose courage can make that possible.

Congress Eyes Getting More Info Released (AP)

By Laurie Kellman, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — Congressional Democrats are looking at ways to strengthen open government laws and force the Bush administration to release more documents under the Freedom of Information Act.

Rep. Lacy Clay, D-Mo., said legislation he is considering would be broader than an open government bill last year that sought to reduce the number of disputed FOIA requests and improve reporting requirements to Congress. The legislation never reached a vote in the House or Senate.

Clay said the old bill will be the starting point for a new one that will take direct aim at the administration's practice of using the threat of terrorism to withhold "nonsensitive information."

"I am deeply concerned that this administration appears to be shielding information that ought to be accessible to the public," said Clay, chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee's subcommittee on information policy.

The American Civil Liberties Union urged the subcommittee on Wednesday to scrap what it said was the White House's "policy of nondisclosure" outlined in a 2001 memo by then-Attorney General John Ashcroft.

Ashcroft advised against releasing information when there was uncertainty about whether FOIA exemptions applied, such as for national security and law enforcement material. His memo reversed a Clinton administration policy that urged agencies to resolve FOIA requests by erring on the side of releasing, not withholding, government information.

"To this administration, secrecy is the default response," ACLU Executive Director Anthony D. Romero said in written testimony prepared for Clay's subcommittee.

Another witness, Clark Hoyt of the Sunshine in Government Initiative, urged Congress to create an independent ombudsman within the federal government to improve training and compliance with the FOIA and act as a liaison for people frustrated in their efforts to use the law to obtain records.

President Bush signed an executive order in 2005 directing federal agencies to be more efficient in dealing with requests for government information, but he left the Ashcroft memo in place. The order called on agencies to take several consumer-friendly steps, including streamlining the handling of requests under the FOIA and appointing senior officials to monitor compliance with the law.

Linda Koontz, director of information management for the Government Accountability Office, said it is too soon to tell if the flow of disclosure has improved under the new executive order. But her agency's study of FOIA request processing trends from 2002 to 2005 found that many agencies could not keep pace with the increase in requests they received.

Melanie Ann Pustay, acting director of the Justice Department's Office of Information and Privacy, pointed out that agencies face stiff challenges in fulfilling many FOIA requests because of the sheer volume and irregularity of documents that must be reviewed.

She also said that the Internet, among other sources, has caused FOIA requests to balloon to "millions" every year and that processing them costs more than $300 million annually.

New FOIA Reform Legislation Expected Soon (GOVEXEC)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, February 16, 2007

Newly empowered congressional Democrats likely will introduce legislation to reform the Freedom of Information Act in the next month, sources in both chambers said this week.

The bill's introduction likely will coincide with Sunshine Week March 11-16, an initiative led by the American Society of Newspaper Editors to educate the public about the importance of open government. National Freedom of Information Day also happens that week, on March 16.

Rep. William Lacy Clay, D-Mo., chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Subcommittee on Information Policy, Census and National Archives, said Wednesday after a hearing on FOIA that he expects to see reform legislation introduced soon.

Clay said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, will be heavily involved in crafting the measure. A bill that was approved at the subcommittee level in September 2006 (H.R. 867) will be used as a starting point.

"We are trying to refine that," Clay said. "We're trying to improve upon it."

In a statement, Waxman said he looks forward to working with Clay on legislation to strengthen the FOIA, and is pleased, as the law was the focus of the subcommittee's first hearing in the new Congress.

Similar legislation (S. 394) introduced by Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, cleared the Senate Judiciary Committee last fall.

Both bills would have imposed stricter enforcement of the existing 20-day deadline for responses to requests for information under FOIA and would have created a system to allow the public to track the status of requests online and via a telephone hotline. At the end of 2005, the requests in 22 government agencies totaled nearly 150,000, up about 20 per cent from the previous year.

The legislation also called for a FOIA ombudsman to mediate disputes between the government and members of the public.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, is planning to reintroduce a similar version of last year's bipartisan legislation, according to committee spokeswoman Tracy Schmaler.

Last year's legislation might have had a greater chance of passing had President Bush not issued an executive order in December 2005 requiring agencies to improve their processes for responding to information requests. Subsequent agency reports in response to the order have shown that agencies have plans for improving the administration of FOIA requests.

While the executive order may have appeased a Republican-run Congress last year, sources said that the Democrats who run Congress now are likely to move aggressively on the legislation this session, for fear that if delayed to 2008, it could get lost in the midst of a presidential election year.

The success of Bush's executive order in improving agency response times to requests is also likely to affect the legislation, sources said.

Melanie Ann Pustay, acting director of the Justice Department's Office of Information Policy, the group that shares the job with the Office of Management and Budget of enforcing the executive order, said at a hearing Tuesday that it is too early determine how effective agencies have been in implementing their plans. But Pustay said so far she has been very pleased with the results.

Asked why the Justice Department had more two dozen identified deficiencies in its plan, including eight at the FBI, Pustay said she thinks "that is just to be expected" and can be blamed on the logistical challenge of moving offices.

Pustay said that the latest edition of the FOIA Guide produced by the Justice Department was delayed from its December 2006 release date because that timeline was "overly optimistic."

Bankruptcy Judge Approves $145 Million In Fees For Lawyers, Advisers In Delphi Case (AP)

By Vinnee Tong, The Associated Press

A federal bankruptcy judge on Thursday approved $145 million in fees to lawyers and financial advisers for the first year of the restructuring of auto parts supplier Delphi.

Troy, Mich.-based Delphi Corp., a former subsidiary of General Motors Corp. until 1999, has incurred nearly $135 million in professional fees and $10 million in expenses for the period from its voluntary bankruptcy protection filing on Oct. 8, 2005, through the end of September 2006.

U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Robert Drain of the Southern District of New York approved the payment applications filed by about 30 law firms, bankers and others.

As part of its bankruptcy case, Delphi has cut labor costs by offering voluntary buyout and early retirement deals to tens of thousands of union workers represented by the United Auto Workers and the International Union of Electronic Workers-Communications Workers of America, the company's biggest and second-biggest unions.

Delphi has made reducing labor and retirement benefit costs one of the highest priorities in its reorganization.

Among Delphi's advisers, the biggest bill comes from the law firm Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom, which recorded fees and expenses of $32.79 million for the year.

Skadden's hourly rates range from $585 to $835 for partners, $560 to $640 for counsel and special counsel, $295 to $540 for associates and $90 to $230 for legal assistants.

The various firms have received most of the fees already, as they are paid monthly, aside from so-called "hold backs." Drain approved orders on Thursday covering three separate periods. His approval means the firms will receive the 5 percent or 10 percent that has been held back. Because of the size of the case, the court had established a special fee committee to create guidelines for how the firms should be paid.

The judge must also approve the fees at the conclusion of the case.

Delphi expects to emerge from bankruptcy protection in the first half of this year. It is now negotiating with its unions over collective bargaining agreements and General Motors over legacy retirement costs. Those agreements are needed if Delphi wants to move forward on a proposed plan that has private equity investors making a cash infusion as the company exits bankruptcy.

Three private equity investors -- Appaloosa Management LP, Cerberus Capital Management LP and Harbinger Capital Partners Master Fund I -- along with Merrill Lynch & Co. and UBS Securities LLC have agreed to invest $1.4 billion to $3.4 billion in a restructured Delphi, a tentative deal approved by Drain last month.

The investors and Delphi seek to resolve the issues with GM and the unions ahead of a Feb. 28 deadline, after which the two parties will give up the right to withdraw from the tentative agreement.

Bear Stearns Ordered To Pay $125 Million (WP/BLOOM)

By Otis Bilodeau And Thom Weidlich, Bloomberg News

Judge Cites Firm for Lax Oversight in Collapse of Manhattan Hedge Fund

Bear Stearns must pay at least $125.1 million to a failed hedge fund after a court concluded the securities firm ignored signs that investors were being defrauded and took money to cover its own potential losses.

U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Burton Lifland in New York yesterday ordered that Bear Stearns must return the money to Manhattan Investment Fund, which collapsed in 2000 after regulators accused the manager of sending fake account statements for more than three years.

Bear Stearns, alerted to the fraud as early as 1998, waited a year before scrutinizing the hedge fund's books and learning its true financial condition, Lifland wrote.

The delay allowed Manhattan Investment to continue cheating investors, who lost almost $400 million, according to regulators. The ruling against Bear Stearns, of New York, may spur investment banks to monitor hedge funds, their most lucrative trading clients, more closely. Bear Stearns is one of the biggest brokers to hedge funds.

Hedge funds are lightly regulated investment pools that allow managers to keep a substantial portion of gains they generate for clients. Hedge funds have resisted government efforts to make them disclose more about their operations.

"These are issues that the hedge fund industry wants to go away, but they're not going to," said Seth Berenzweig, a partner at Albo & Oblon, a law firm in Arlington.

For Bear Stearns, a $125.1 million payment is equivalent to 6 percent of its $2.05 billion profit last year. Bear Stearns spokesman Russell Sherman said the firm will appeal.

Manhattan Investment, founded in 1996 and managed by Michael Berger, imploded into bankruptcy four years later in "one of the most egregious and costly frauds in the history of the securities markets," the SEC wrote in a bankruptcy court filing submitted last year.

Berger deceived investors for more than three years with fake account statements, said the SEC, which sued Manhattan Investment for fraud in 2000. Berger pleaded guilty to related criminal charges and then left the country before sentencing.

"Bear Stearns was required to do more than simply ask the wrongdoer if he was doing wrong," Lifland wrote.

"This is going to send shock waves through many prime brokers because they've been very careful to limit their responsibility for their customers' actions," said Michael Missal of Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Preston Gates Ellis in the District.

House, Senate Seek FDA Regulation Of Tobacco (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — House and Senate lawmakers of both parties introduced sweeping legislation Thursday to subject tobacco to the kind of safety regulation that applies to medicines and food, and said prospects for action were the most favorable in years.

"This bill is long overdue, and this is the year, I believe, that regulation of tobacco by the Food and Drug Administration is going to become law," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles), a longtime nemesis of the tobacco industry who heads the Government Reform Committee.

"If this gets to the House floor, [its passage] will be [by] a very large margin," said Rep. Tom Davis of Virginia, Waxman's Republican cosponsor. The legislation could garner enough support to override a veto, Davis said.

Although the White House has not supported similar legislation in the past, it's not clear what position President Bush will take this time.

Administration officials were neutral Thursday.

"We're in the process of reviewing the legislation," Department of Health and Human Services spokeswoman Christina Pearson said. "As a general point on smoking reduction, I do want to note the substantial progress that has happened over the past 40 years. Though we must remain vigilant, … reducing the incidence of smoking in this country has helped us avert many thousands of cases of disease."

The tobacco industry is divided over regulation. Most major public-health groups support federal oversight.

The bill introduced Thursday would grant the FDA legal authority to regulate nicotine. The agency had previously asserted it had such power, but the Supreme Court disagreed, ruling in 2000 that Congress must specifically confer such authority.

Under the bill, the agency would also gain the power to restrict tobacco advertising, require stronger warnings on cigarette packs, mandate reductions in nicotine, regulate additives and set stiff penalties for selling to minors.

Smoking is a leading cause of cancer, heart disease and emphysema, and is estimated to cause more than 400,000 deaths a year in the United States.

Three presidential candidates immediately signed on to the legislation: Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.). Its principal sponsors in the Senate are Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John Cornyn (R-Texas).

The last major battle over tobacco regulation was in 2004, when a bill passed the Senate but faltered in the House. It was blocked by Republican leaders, including former House Majority Leader Tom Delay of Texas.

The new Democratic leadership in both chambers is behind the legislation, advocates said.

"We've always had bipartisan support, but we didn't have support from the leadership," Waxman said.

The biggest cigarette company, Philip Morris Cos., favors the legislation, saying FDA oversight would provide the industry with a stable legal framework and could reduce harm from smoking. But many smaller companies oppose regulation, in part because, they say, it could create roadblocks to competition that would benefit Philip Morris.

Congressional debates on health issues often turn personal, and this one promises to be passionate. Davis said his father died of emphysema. Another cosponsor, Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), said his father smoked two packs of Camels a day and died of lung cancer.

"If we can regulate nicotine in gum, in patches and in nasal sprays, why can't we do it in cigarettes?" Davis said.

Lawmakers Unveil Tobacco Regulation Bill (AP)

By Andrew Bridges

Seven years after being rebuffed by the Supreme Court, anti-smoking advocates rejoiced Thursday as lawmakers renewed a push for federal regulation of tobacco, a step they say is needed to deter children from lighting up and to get smokers to quit.

"Congress has the opportunity to take a monumental step and grant the Food and Drug Administration the meaningful and long-overdue authority to regulate tobacco, which kills 440,000 people and costs our nation $96.7 billion in health care bills every year," said John Seffrin, chief executive officer of the American Cancer Society.

A bipartisan group of lawmakers reintroduced legislation Thursday that would give the FDA the same authority over cigarettes and other tobacco products that it already has over countless other consumer products.

"Congress cannot in good conscience allow the federal agency most responsible for protecting the public health to remain powerless to deal with the enormous risks of tobacco, the most deadly of all consumer products," Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-

Mass., said in introducing the Family Smoking Prevention and Tobacco Control Act with Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, and Reps. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., and Tom Davis, R-Va.

For decades, the FDA said it lacked authority to regulate tobacco so long as cigarette makers did not claim that smoking provided health benefits. In 1996, it reversed course and cited new evidence that the industry intended its products to feed the nicotine habits of the roughly 45 million Americans who smoke.

Tobacco companies sued, and the case eventually landed in the Supreme Court. In 2000, the court ruled 5-4 that Congress did not authorize the FDA to regulate tobacco.

Previous legislative efforts to give the FDA that authority have faltered. The new bill is fundamentally the same legislation as introduced in the last Congress. Supporters believe it will fare better in the Democratic-controlled House and Senate.

A spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said it had the support of the caucus. A spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said she personally supported it.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto declined to comment.

The Department of Health and Human Services is reviewing the legislation, spokeswoman Christina Pearson said.

The bill would allow the FDA to act to discourage children from starting smoking and encourage adults to quit, in part by reining in advertising, bolstering existing sales restrictions and strengthening warning labels. It also would allow the FDA to order the elimination or reduction of harmful and addictive ingredients in tobacco. The agency couldn't ban nicotine outright, but the bill would give it the power to reduce its levels.

Furthermore, the bill would require tobacco companies to disclose what tobacco products — and their smoke — contain. Secondhand smoke, for example, contains 250 chemicals known to be toxic or carcinogenic, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

The FDA had no immediate comment on the proposed legislation. Many tobacco companies have opposed the legislation in the past, with the exception of Philip Morris USA, maker of Marlboro, the nation's top-selling cigarette brand.

"FDA regulation creates a uniform set of federal standards for the manufacture and marketing of all tobacco products," Michael E. Szymanczyk, chairman and chief executive officer of Philip Morris USA, said in a statement.

Experts and other tobacco companies believe some provisions of the bill would favor the most entrenched players in the industry, like Philip Morris, which enjoy strong brand loyalty that could allow them to weather advertising restrictions without losing market share.

"We certainly continue to oppose any bill that conveys an unfair advantage or disadvantage to any manufacturer, which this legislation could. If you eliminate ways to communicate with adult smokers or consumers, that certainly benefits the market leader and makes it difficult, if not impossible, for those who aren't the market leader to compete," said David Howard, a spokesman for R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., the nation's second-largest tobacco company and maker of Camel and other brands.

Court Ruling Reignites Tobacco Suits (LAT)

By Maura Dolan, Times Staff Writer

California justices unanimously reject a 2002 federal decision that had effectively blocked smokers from seeking damages.

SAN FRANCISCO — The California Supreme Court made it possible Thursday for people who become ill from smoking to once again win large judgments from tobacco companies, unanimously rejecting a four-year-old federal court decision that had virtually halted all smoker lawsuits in the state.

"It reopens tobacco litigation in California," said Northeastern University Law Professor Richard A. Daynard, who heads a group that promotes lawsuits against the industry. "The light just went from red to green."

Since California began allowing individual lawsuits over smoking damage in 1998, plaintiffs had won some of the biggest tobacco awards in the country, including a $28-billion jury verdict in Los Angeles.

The awards came to a halt when a federal appeals court in 2002 set a strict deadline, saying smokers should have filed suit years earlier, when it became widely known that smoking was a health hazard and addictive.

Taking advantage of the federal ruling, the tobacco industry had exercised its right to move cases into federal court, which hears disputes between litigants in different states. Lawyers said every single case was dismissed.

In a decision written by Justice Carlos R. Moreno, the high court said that although judges and juries can presume that plaintiffs should have known of the dangers and filed their lawsuits earlier, smokers can rebut that presumption by presenting evidence that tobacco companies misrepresented the risks.

"Although knowledge of smoking addiction has been widespread … ," Moreno wrote, "tobacco companies misrepresentation of the danger and addictiveness of smoking were also widespread."

A lawyer for Philip Morris USA Inc. and Brown and Williamson Tobacco Corp., the defendants in the case, did not return a telephone call seeking comment on the Supreme Court ruling. Another tobacco executive referred to a prepared statement.

"Awareness of the dangers of smoking will continue to be key issues should either of these cases proceed to trial, and plaintiffs must prove liability on the part of the defendants including, among other things, that smoking caused their illness and that the company's conduct prevented them from making an informed choice to smoke," said William S. Ohlemeyer, Philip Morris USA vice president and associate general counsel, in the statement.

In one of two cases before the court, Leslie Grisham sought economic damages for the costs of cigarettes she bought when she became addicted.

She also sought damages for physical injury. She said smoking gave her emphysema, peritonitis and gingivitis, which led to the loss of her teeth and disfigurement.

The court also said Grisham can sue for her physical injuries because the clock did not start ticking for the legal deadline until she discovered her ailments.

"The addictiveness of a product is distinct from its capacity to cause serious physical injury," Moreno wrote.

The two cases will go now back to the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. Although smoking cases may still be heard in federal court, judges there will have to base their decisions on the California court's interpretation of state law, lawyers in the case said.

Daniel U. Smith, who argued before the California Supreme Court for Grisham, said he was "elated" by the ruling. If the court had ruled that the legal deadline for suing began with knowledge of addiction, no one in California would ever recover damages for serious smoking-caused disease, he said.

"Cancers take 10 to 20 years to develop," he said. "Now it is a new day, and we will see if more smokers file now that they are allowed to," he said.

Smith said the federal ruling spawned similar decisions in other federal circuits around the country. Now that a moderately conservative California high court has rejected the 2002 decision, "other federal courts will be invited to reconsider their positions," he said.

But Brentwood lawyer Michael Piuze, who won billion-dollar verdicts against the tobacco industry, said the 2002 decision caused many trial lawyers to "wash their hands" of tobacco litigation "because it has been impossible."

"Every state court case got kidnapped to federal court and then got executed under the authority" of the 2002 ruling, Piuze said.

LAPD May Get Options On Monitoring Racial Profiling (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

Faced with a $25-million price tag to replace aging devices that log the ethnicity of every motorist stopped, the Los Angeles Police Department may be allowed to pursue alternative methods for making sure its officers are not engaging in racial profiling, a federal monitor said Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0132855

In his quarterly report on the department's compliance with a federal consent decree mandating LAPD reforms, Independent Monitor Michael Cherkasky said the agency might be able to meet the requirement for checking on racial profiling by methods other than the one currently used to collect data.

"It is the monitor's belief that the dollars that would need to be spent in continuing the current method of collection and aggregation can, in fact, be better spent on enhancing the city's ability to detect, investigate and prevent biased policing," Cherkasky wrote.

That opens the door for the city to propose alternatives such as installing video cameras in all patrol cars, though any change would require final approval from Cherkasky, the Justice Department and a federal judge.

Also, it might cost up to $25 million to put video cameras in all patrol cars.

Still, Police Commission President John Mack welcomed the possibility that the city could find a less costly and more effective way to check for profiling.

"Based upon some discussion we've had with the monitor, we look forward to in-car cameras hopefully providing a much better solution to the problem," Mack said.

Officers who have pulled over cars have had to use electronic devices to record the ethnicity and other details of motorists, but Mack said it has been "fruitless" because the vast amount of raw data has not allowed the department to determine whether officers acted improperly.

"The data suggested that blacks and Hispanics were being stopped far more frequently than whites and, moreover, that intrusive after-stop actions of officers were likewise disparate," Cherkasky wrote in the new report.

"The monitor acknowledged that the disparate treatment reflected in the statistics might be explained other than as an indication of biased policing and that additional analysis was required in order to attempt to explain the disparities."

That analysis failed to explain the discrepancies in numbers or to determine whether racial profiling was taking place — leading the city to begin exploring less expensive and more effective options such as video cameras.

The quarterly report found that the LAPD has made progress on many reforms, but has still failed to address some key requirements, including completion of a computer system to track officer behavior.

Judge Limits New York Police Taping (NYT)

By Jim Dwyer

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

In a rebuke of a surveillance practice greatly expanded by the New York Police Department after the Sept. 11 attacks, a federal judge ruled yesterday that the police must stop the routine videotaping of people at public gatherings unless there is an indication that unlawful activity may occur.

Four years ago, at the request of the city, the same judge, Charles S. Haight Jr., gave the police greater authority to investigate political, social and religious groups.

In yesterday's ruling, Judge Haight, of United States District Court in Manhattan, found that by videotaping people who were exercising their right to free speech and breaking no laws, the Police Department had ignored the milder limits he had imposed on it in 2003.

Citing two events in 2005 — a march in Harlem and a demonstration by homeless people in front of the home of Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg — the judge said the city had offered scant justification for videotaping the people involved.

"There was no reason to suspect or anticipate that unlawful or terrorist activity might occur," he wrote, "or that pertinent information about or evidence of such activity might be obtained by filming the earnest faces of those concerned citizens and the signs by which they hoped to convey their message to a public official."

While he called the police conduct "egregious," Judge Haight also offered an unusual judicial mea culpa, taking responsibility for his own words in a 2003 order that he conceded had not been "a model of clarity."

The restrictions on videotaping do not apply to bridges, tunnels, airports, subways or street traffic, Judge Haight noted, but are meant to control police surveillance at events where people gather to exercise their rights under the First Amendment.

"No reasonable person, and surely not this court, is unaware of the perils the New York public faces and the crucial importance of the N.Y.P.D.'s efforts to detect, prevent and punish those who would cause others harm," Judge Haight wrote.

Jethro M. Eisenstein, one of the lawyers who challenged the videotaping practices, said that Judge Haight's ruling would make it possible to contest other surveillance tactics, including the use of undercover officers at political gatherings. In recent years, police officers have disguised themselves as protesters, shouted feigned objections when uniformed officers were making arrests, and pretended to be mourners at a memorial event for bicycle riders killed in traffic accidents.

"This was a major push by the corporation counsel to say that the guidelines are nice but they're yesterday's news, and that the security establishment's view of what is important trumps civil liberties," Mr. Eisenstein said. "Judge Haight is saying that's just not the way we're doing things in New York City."

A spokesman for Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly referred questions about the ruling to the city's lawyers, who noted that Judge Haight did not set a deadline for destroying the tapes it had already made, and that the judge did not find the city had violated the First Amendment.

Nevertheless, Judge Haight — at times invoking the mythology of the ancient Greeks and of Harold Ross, the founding editor of The New Yorker — used blunt language to characterize the Police Department's activities.

"There is no discernible justification for the apparent disregard of the guidelines" in his 2003 court order, he said. These spell out the broad circumstances under which the police could investigate political gatherings.

Under the guidelines, the police may conduct investigations — including videotaping — at political events only if they have indications that unlawful activity may occur, and only after they have applied for permission to the deputy commissioner in charge of the Intelligence Division.

Judge Haight noted that the Police Department had not produced evidence that any applications for permission to videotape had ever been filed.

Near the end of his 51-page order, the judge warned that the Police Department must change its practices or face penalties.

"Any future use by the N.Y.P.D. of video and photographic equipment during the course of an investigation involving political activity" that did not follow the guidelines could result in contempt proceedings, he wrote.

At monthly group bicycle rides in Lower Manhattan known as Critical Mass, some participants break traffic laws, and the police routinely videotape those events, Judge Haight noted. That would be an appropriate situation for taping, he said, but police officials did not follow the guidelines and apply for permission.

"This is a classic case of application of the guidelines: political activity on the part of individuals, but legitimate law enforcement purpose on the part of the police," Judge Haight wrote. "It is precisely the sort of situation where the guidelines require adherence to certain protocols but ultimately give the N.Y.P.D. the flexibility to pursue its law enforcement goals."

Gideon Oliver, a lawyer who has represented many people arrested during the monthly bicycle rides, said he was troubled by the intensive scrutiny of political activities.

"I'm looking forward to a deeper and more serious exploration of how and why this surveillance has been conducted," Mr. Oliver said.

In the past the Police Department has said that it needed intelligence about the Critical Mass rides in order to protect the streets from unruly riders.

Patrick Markee, an official with another group that was cited in the ruling, the Coalition for the Homeless, said the judge's decision ratified their basic rights to free speech.

"We're gratified that Judge Haight found that the police shouldn't engage in surveillance of homeless New Yorkers and their supporters when they're engaged in peaceful, lawful political protest," Mr. Markee said.

The Police Department's approach to investigating political, social and religious groups has been a contentious subject for most of four decades, and a class action lawsuit brought by political activists, including a lawyer named Barbara Handschu, was settled in 1985. Judge Haight oversees the terms of that settlement, which are known as the Handschu guidelines, and which he modified in 2003.

At the time, Judge Haight said that the police could "attend any event open to the public, on the same terms and conditions of the public generally."

But in yesterday's ruling, he said that permission "cannot be stretched to authorize police officers to videotape everyone at a public gathering just because a visiting little old lady from Dubuque (to borrow from The New Yorker) could do so. There is a quantum difference between a police officer and the little old lady (or other tourist or private citizen) videotaping or photographing a public event."

The judge said he bore some responsibility for misinterpretation of the guidelines.

"I confess with some chagrin that while the text of this opinion and its implementing order, read together, may not be as opaque as the irritatingly baffling pronouncements of the Oracle" at Delphi, "they do not constitute a model of clarity," he wrote.

AirTran Urges Midwest To Negotiate Deal (MILBIZ)

Milwaukee Business Journal, February 16, 2007

AirTran Holdings Inc. reported Feb. 15 the federal waiting period for its proposed $345 million buyout of Midwest Air Group Inc. has expired.

AirTran chairman and CEO Joe Leonard called the Justice Department's determination not to challenge the proposed merger a "milestone" and said he hoped the agency's decision will prompt Midwest management to sit down with AirTran for formal negotiations.

"As we have frequently said, the combination of AirTran and Midwest is pro-competitive and the merger of our two airlines will create a stronger, more diversified airline, better able to withstand competition from other airlines, offer greater job security to employees and provide more service to the cities currently served by both airlines, " Leonard said in a statement.

AirTran (NYSE: AAI) is trying to buy Oak Creek-based Midwest Air Group Inc. (AMEX: MEH) to create a low-fare carrier with revenue of about $3 billion in 2007. However, Midwest on Jan. 25 rejected the unsolicited offer calling it "opportunistic" and saying it "undervalues" the company.

Leonard said Thursday he hoped that with the expiration of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act that Midwest will "consider the benefits to their stakeholders and sit down with us to negotiate a definitive agreement."

Judge May Hold Up Caremark-CVS (SLPD)

By Mary Jo Feldstein, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, February 16, 2007

A hearing today is expected to determine whether the bid by CVS Corp. to buy Caremark Rx will be further delayed because of alleged misconduct by Caremark executives and board members.

The lawsuit challenging the CVS-Caremark deal was brought by Express Scripts Inc. of Maryland Heights, which also wants to buy Caremark. It alleges that Caremark's executives and directors failed to negotiate in the best interest of its shareholders.

Delaware Chancery Court Chancellor William B. Chandler III already has delayed the Caremark shareholders' vote at least until March 9. He acted after a large group of shareholders said it needed more time to evaluate the CVS offer.

CVS, the nation's No. 2 retail drug chain, in November announced its plan to combine with Caremark, based in Nashville, Tenn. Its bid was a $21 billion, all-stock offer that it said would create a new dynamic in the pharmaceutical industry. Caremark shareholders had been scheduled to vote on the deal Tuesday.

Express Scripts is the nation's No. 3 pharmacy-benefits manager. In December, it countered CVS's bid for Caremark with a cash-and-stock offer valued at $26 billion and a vision of a larger, stronger pharmacy-benefits management company.

Express Scripts later sued Caremark, that company's board and CVS, saying the Caremark—CVS deal should be quashed because of "extensive fiduciary misconduct." Chandler isn't expected to rule today.

"In short, the Caremark stockholders will be forced to make a decision in a context distorted by the misconduct of their own board," Express Scripts said in a brief filed this week.

Express Scripts alleges that Caremark's chief executive, Edwin "Mac" Crawford, spent months negotiating the CVS deal before bringing it to the board. It alleges also that Crawford and the board put perks for executives and directors ahead of obtaining the best price and terms for shareholders.

CVS tells a different story. In its brief, CVS argues that Caremark board members knew of a potential deal with CVS early on and met several times to discuss it.

"Despite the plaintiffs' claims, the record shows that this was not a deal motivated by self-interest or hastily signed," CVS said. "The companies took their time, talked to competitors and eventually decided that the merger was in the best interest of shareholders."

Caremark also has filed a brief in the case, but as of late Thursday lawyers had yet to agree on a version of it that could be released to the public. Material described as proprietary data was removed from the Express Scripts and CVS legal papers before they were made public.

According to Express Scripts, Crawford and CVS Chief Executive Tom Ryan spent 10 months negotiating major elements of the deal — including structure, general terms and approximate price — before bringing the Caremark board into the discussions on Aug. 16, 2006.

CVS said the idea of a Caremark-CVS combination was first brought to the Caremark board in November 2005, nearly a year before the board voted on the deal. CVS claims Caremark's board "relied on a host of advice over the course of a year before making its decision."

CVS also denies the allegation that Caremark's executives and board didn't push for the best possible deal. Caremark's board, for example, negotiated a lower break-up fee to encourage third-party offers that could force CVS to increase its price, CVS said.

Express Scripts' brief also reveals the company met with Caremark to discuss a possible merger on four occasions, and as recently as October 2005. And, though Caremark now says a merger with Express Scripts would fail because of antitrust issues and differing strategic goals, those issues were not "major stumbling blocks" in earlier negotiations, Express Scripts said.

In its brief, CVS questions Express Scripts' standing to bring the lawsuit. Through a subsidiary, Express Scripts is a Caremark shareholder. But CVS said Express Scripts didn't buy those shares until after the CVS-Caremark deal was announced.

Lawmakers Seek Repeal Of Insurance Antitrust Exemption (MCT)

By Maria Recio, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON - Lawmakers moved to rein in the insurance industry Thursday by introducing legislation in the House of Representatives and Senate to repeal the industry's federal antitrust exemption.

Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, R-Miss., a fierce critic of the insurance industry's response to Hurricane Katrina, joined Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and ranking member Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., on the Senate floor to introduce the bill. In the House, Rep. Gene Taylor, D-Miss., Rep. Pete DeFazio, D-Ore., Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-La., Rep. Walter Jones, R-N.C., and others announced the introduction of identical legislation.

"Federal oversight would provide confidence that the industry is not engaging in the most egregious forms of anti-competitive conduct - price-fixing, agreements not to pay and market allocations," Leahy said. "Insurers may object to being subject to the same antitrust laws as everyone else, but if they are operating in an honest and appropriate way, they should have nothing to fear."

Lott, who lost his home in the hurricane and who's part of a lawsuit that's being settled with State Farm & Casualty Co., said, "After Hurricane Katrina we learned a lot of lessons." He said he found out "to my absolute horror that the insurance industry is not covered by the antitrust laws."

"This is wrong," Lott concluded, "and the Senate, in a bipartisan way, should, and I believe will, correct it."

The bill has some heavy hitters behind it, notably Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., who said in a statement, "If insurers around the country are operating in an honest and appropriate way, they should not object to being answerable under the same federal antitrust laws as virtually all other businesses."

Taylor, who also lost his home and is part of the State Farm settlement, said in an interview that "the insurance industry is the only industry exempt from the laws intended to protect consumers."

The Insurance Industry Competition Act of 2007 would bring insurers under the scrutiny of the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission by lifting the exemption they currently have under the McCarran-Ferguson Act of 1945. States would continue to regulate insurance companies, but federal agencies would have authority to review any "unfair methods of competition," such as price-fixing.

The industry is opposed to the bill, arguing that a change in regulatory oversight needs to include a look at the 50-state system insurers operate in.

"Any discussion about repealing the antitrust exemption has to include a discussion about modernizing state regulation," said Dennis Kelly, a spokesman for the American Insurance Association. The exemption, he added, is very narrow. "The problem is hurricanes, not insurance companies," Kelly said.

The bill is the latest effort by lawmakers to bring the insurance industry to task for refusing to pay claims of wind damage from Katrina by blaming water damage, which is covered by the federal government's flood insurance program. Taylor last week introduced "multiple perils" legislation to give residents coverage of wind and water damage.

Reacting to the announcement that State Farm won't write new policies in Mississippi, Taylor said, "I think this is a marketing gimmick."

By "winking at its competitors," Taylor predicted that State Farm would resume writing policies in a few months at much higher rates. As for the timing of the announcement, on the heels of a settlement agreement, Taylor said, "It was intentionally timed by State Farm to rub it in people's faces."

The refusal of insurers to pay off policyholders after the hurricane is motivating Taylor now.

"I personally believe that the Big Three insurers said, 'Let's don't pay claims' after Katrina," Taylor said. "It's wrong. Unfortunately, it's legal. But it ought to be illegal."

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

"I love the free market, but the fact is more concentration means less competition, and these markets are less free than they should be. And this Commission is about regulation -- regulators. I always worry a little when I hear regulators shy away from regulation talk."

-- Senator Byron Dorgan (D., North Dakota) addressing members of the Federal Communications Commission at a recent hearing.

If you're wondering where the new Democratic majority in Congress is inclined to steer telecom policy, look no further than Mr. Dorgan's comment above. Note how he pays lip service to free markets while ultimately favoring more regulation for its own sake.

But more regulation is the last thing today's telecom industry needs, at least if empirical evidence is any indication. As FCC Chairman Kevin Martin reported at a Senate hearing earlier this month, the industry is now taking risks in a way it hasn't since the tech bubble burst six years ago.

"In 2006, the S&P 500 telecommunications sector was the strongest performing sector, up 32% over the previous year," said Mr. Martin. "Markets and companies are investing again, job creation in the industry is high, and in almost all cases, vigorous competition -- resulting from free-market deregulatory policies -- has provided the consumer with more, better and cheaper services to choose from."

Much of this growth has been fueled by increased broadband deployment, which makes high-speed Internet services possible. The latest government data show that broadband connections increased by 26% in the first six months of 2006 and by 52% for the full year ending in June 2006.

Also noteworthy, notes telecom analyst Scott Cleland of the Precursor Group, is that of the 11 million broadband additions in the first half of last year, 15% were cable modems, 23% were digital-subscriber lines (DSL) and 58% were of the wireless variety. Between June 2005 and June 2006, wireless broadband subscriptions grew to 11 million from 380,000.

This gives the lie to claims that some sort of cable/DSL duopoly has hampered competition among broadband providers and limited consumer options. That's the charge of those who want "network neutrality" rules that would allow the government to dictate what companies like Verizon and AT&T can charge users of their networks. But the reality is that the telecom industry has taken advantage of this deregulatory environment to provide consumers with more choices at lower prices. Verizon's capital investments since 2000 exceed $100 billion, and such competitors as Cingular, T-Mobile and Sprint are following suit. So are the cable companies.

It's also worth noting that the deregulatory telecom policies pushed by Mr. Martin and his immediate predecessor, Michael Powell, have accompanied a wave of mergers -- SBC/AT&T, Sprint/Nextel, Verizon/MCI, AT&T/BellSouth. Most of these marriages were opposed by consumer groups and other fans of regulation on the grounds that they would lead to fewer choices and higher costs. In fact, these combinations have created economies of scale, and customers are clearly better off.

The result has been more high-speed connections, along with greater economic productivity, but also an array of new services. The popular video-sharing Web site YouTube is barely two years old. And it wouldn't exist today but for the fact that there's enough broadband capacity to allow millions of people to view videos over the Web.

Increased broadband demand has also been good news for Internet hardware companies like Cisco and Juniper, where annual sales are up by nearly 50%. A Journal report this week notes that "North American telecom companies are projected to spend $70 billion on new infrastructure this year," which is up 67% from 2003.

And prices are falling, by the way. Between February 2004 and December 2005, the average monthly cost for home broadband fell nearly 8%. For DSL subscribers, it fell nearly 20%. Which means that consumers are benefiting from new services and different pricing packages, as well as getting better deals.

The one sure way to stop these trends is by bogging down industry players with regulations or price controls that raise the risk that these mammoth investments will never pay off. Yet that seems to be the goal of Senator Dorgan and other Democrats such as Representative Ed Markey, another "Net neutrality" cheerleader, who is planning his own hearings. Consumers will end up paying for such policies in fewer choices and higher prices.

Gonzales Asked About Prosecutor Deal (AP)

By John Heilprin, Associated Press Writer

The House Judiciary Committee on Thursday asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to explain how the Justice Department's former top environmental prosecutor could sign consent decrees with the third-largest U.S. oil company after buying a $980,000 vacation home with its top lobbyist.

An Associated Press report a day earlier disclosing the transactions "suggests potential unethical, if not illegal, conduct by a senior Justice Department official and, even more disturbing, apparent complicity in such behavior by the department," the committee's chairman, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., said in a letter to Gonzales.

Conyers also asked Gonzales when he and other department officials learned of then-Assistant Attorney General Sue Ellen Wooldridge's "close relationship with a target of a department public corruption investigation and what action, if any, was taken as a result?"

A third buyer of the gated community home at Kiawah Island, S.C., was former Deputy Interior Secretary J. Steven Griles, who shares a condominium in northern Virginia with Wooldridge and was told last month he faces possible criminal charges of lying to Congress and fraud in the Jack Abramoff bribery and influence-peddling scandal.

The Justice Department says ethics officials signed off on Wooldridge's purchase of the beach getaway with Griles, now an oil and gas lobbyist, and ConocoPhillips Vice President Donald R. Duncan, before the closing last April. The deed lists Duncan as half owner in the property, with Wooldridge and Griles each owning 25 percent.

Nine months later, the Justice Department sent two proposed consent decrees signed by Wooldridge to a federal judge in Houston for approval. One, sent Jan. 11, would let the company delay the required installation of some of the $525 million in pollution controls at nine refineries; the other dealt with a Superfund toxic waste cleanup. Wooldridge resigned as assistant attorney general effective Jan. 19. ConocoPhillips said Duncan had no involvement in negotiating the consent agreements.

Conyers' letter also was signed by Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, as an expression of broader support for the inquiries within the House. Another House panel, the Oversight and Government Reform Committee chaired by Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., launched an inquiry a day earlier.

The Justice Department said it would have no comment Thursday.

Wooldridge two months ago amended her financial disclosure report for 2005 to include more than $10,000 in travel, jewelry, a watch and golf clubs she received from Griles between December 2003 and December 2005. Griles began dating Wooldridge in February 2003, when she was deputy staff chief and counselor to then Interior Secretary Gale Norton.

Griles was the department's No. 2 official from July 2001 to January 2005. During that tenure he was almost constantly scrutinized by the department's internal watchdog over dealings with ex-clients and continuing payments from the sale of his old lobbying firm.

Interior Inspector General Earl Devaney concluded in a 2004 that Griles' actions exposed a "wholesale failure of the ethics program" at the agency. They were, Devaney said, "a train wreck waiting to happen."

While dating Griles, Wooldridge was officially counseling him on ethics matters and providing advice to Norton on how to respond to Devaney's report on him. Wooldridge did not tell Devaney about her relationship with Griles.

In June 2004, Bush appointed Wooldridge as Interior's top lawyer. Sometime after she became Interior solicitor, Wooldridge told the department's ethics office she and Griles had begun dating, an Interior spokesman said. Devaney did not learn of Griles' and Wooldridge's romantic relationship until February 2005.

Bush later appointed Wooldridge to head the Justice Department's environment division, representing virtually every federal agency, and she began working there in November 2005.

Another Energy Inquiry On Royalties Collection (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15 — Top Democrats on the Senate Energy Committee, citing widespread management problems at the Interior Department, ordered a new inquiry on Thursday into the department's fast-growing program to collect billions of dollars worth of oil and gas from companies that drill on public territory.

The inquiry, to be conducted by the Government Accountability Office, will come on top of a criminal investigation by the Justice Department into allegations that the program's director earned money as a consultant to companies that were seeking to resell the government oil.

Other investigations are under way by the Interior Department's inspector general and Congressional committees into complaints about mismanagement, weak enforcement and a leasing blunder in the 1990s that could cost taxpayers $10 billion in lost royalties over the next decade.

The new line of scrutiny comes from Senator Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico, chairman of the Senate Energy Committee, and Senator Ron Wyden of Oregon, chairman of the subcommittee on public lands.

The two senators asked the G.A.O. to analyze the so-called royalty-in-kind program, under which the Interior Department collects a share of the oil and gas that companies produce on federal property and then resells it on the open market to generate cash.

Bush administration officials have called the program a simpler and more efficient way for the government to collect royalties on the vast amounts of oil and gas produced on public lands.

The Interior Department currently collects about $4 billion in royalties in the form of oil and gas, mostly from the Gulf of Mexico. Administration officials want to double that volume and collect about 80 percent of all offshore royalties "in kind" by 2009.

In a letter to the accountability office, the senators noted that it had made two attempts to evaluate the program's cost-efficiency, in 2003 and 2004, but had been unable to get reliable data from the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service.

"The royalty-in-kind program raised flags during the G.A.O.'s last review, and now the inspector general tells us that a criminal investigation is under way," Senator Wyden said. "The fact that the Interior Department would now take steps to expand this program defies logic."

In their letter, the lawmakers ordered the office to dissect the program's administrative costs as well as its effectiveness at tasks normally handled by oil companies, like transporting and marketing oil.

Almost one-quarter of the oil and gas produced in the United States comes from federal land or federal coastal waters. Under the law, companies that drill on federal leases must pay the government a royalty, normally 12 to 16 percent of sales. Last year, those royalties totaled about $10 billion.

But royalty revenues have climbed more slowly than oil prices over the last six years, and the Interior Department has come under heavy criticism for lax enforcement, cutbacks in auditing and murky valuation rules that enable companies to reduce their payments.

Last year, administration officials said that a leasing blunder during the Clinton administration was likely to cost taxpayers up to $10 billion in royalties over the next decade.

House and Senate Democrats are now grappling with proposals to renegotiate the flawed leases, but the Bush administration contends that the government cannot pressure companies into revising their terms.

Interior officials, along with many industry executives, contend that the royalty-in-kind program is a simpler way to collect royalties because it eliminates many of the accounting battles that have stymied auditors for years.

But investigators for the G.A.O. said in 2003 and 2004 that they simply could not get enough accurate data to know whether the government was saving any money.

'Live Earth' Concerts To Tackle Hot Topic (WP)

By William Booth, Washington Post Staff Writer

Al Gore's Musical Call to Action

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 15 -- The hit-making record producer Pharrell Williams, the wizard behind the beats of everybody from Ludacris to Britney, promises it will be "the biggest party on Earth." How big?

At the news conference Thursday announcing this summer's ambitious "Live Earth" concerts -- designed as an exercise in "mass persuasion" about threats of global warming -- Al Gore described his vision: a 24-hour musical extravaganza across seven continents, featuring as many as 150 of the world's top recording artists, introduced by an army of "celebrities and thought leaders" (think: Cameron Diaz and Richard Branson), playing before a total live audience of a million people, and reaching 2 billion more via television, radio and the Internet on July 7.

The foreign cities hosting the stadium-size concerts will be Shanghai, Sydney, Johannesburg, London, Rio and Kyoto, Japan. In the United States, two cities -- New York and Washington -- are vying to be the chosen venue. Gore revealed that some lucky entertainer (perhaps Lenny Kravitz? Snow Patrol?) will be performing in Antarctica, where temperatures in July at the South Pole Station average minus-56 degrees Fahrenheit.

The former vice president confirmed that while he was schmoozing at Sunday's Grammy Awards, where he was a presenter, the Black Eyed Peas agreed to record a new song to promote the cause and perform at one of the concerts. Also off camera at the Grammys, members of the Red Hot Chili Peppers whispered to Gore: "We're in." The approximately two dozen artists confirmed today include Snow Patrol, Kelly Clarkson, Bon Jovi, Foo Fighters, Duran Duran, Enrique Iglesias, Kravitz, Sheryl Crow and Snoop Dogg [for a full list, see box].

At the news conference at the California Science Center (it's a museum), against a slightly overproduced backdrop emblazoned with the Live Earth theme, "Save Our Selves," the band Man? bilingually pledged its support and encouraged "everyone, everywhere" to check out Gore's Oscar-nominated documentary "An Inconvenient Truth." Proceeds from the globalized concerts will go to Gore's new environmental foundation, called the Alliance for Climate Protection.

Diaz was also on hand. "As Al said," Diaz said, there are things everyone can do to reduce the magnitude of climate change. Asked what she did, Diaz mentioned driving a hybrid Prius, using recycled products and pursuing "carbon-neutral travel." Saving the planet is doable, she pointed out: "We don't have to build some giant machine that goes up in the air and sucks all the carbon into outer space."

Kevin Wall, the concert producer who has handled the Madonna tours and the Live8 concerts to fight global poverty, promised that the biggest bands on Earth are rearranging their schedules to appear at the Live Earth events. The list of venues, artists and ticket sales will be finalized in March, he said, and in addition to the America-centric stars, each city would also present its own national favorites.

Wall is gunning for saturation coverage. The concerts will be streamed by MSN, the Microsoft Internet portal, and broadcast by NBC. The satellite radio groups Sirius and XM will feature the shows. Similar arrangements are being made in the other six nations. And at the center of it all? "Two billion sets of eyeballs," Wall said, "and we'll hand the mike to Al Gore."

Asked yet again if he's running for president ("no"), the former veep was quizzed about lingering skeptics of global warming. Gore sighed, and then joked that the doubters must get together on Saturday nights with the folks who believe the moon landings were staged in the Arizona desert. Said Gore, "I'm running out of things to say to them."

Attorney Pleads Guilty To Leaking BALCO Testimony (AP)

By PAUL ELIAS And DAVID KRAVETS

AP, February 16, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO - A Colorado lawyer pleaded guilty Thursday to obstructing justice by leaking secret grand jury documents to two reporters covering the government's probe of steroids in sports. Troy Ellerman could be sent to prison for as long as two years and fined up to $250,000 for the convictions. His sentencing was scheduled for June 14.

The 44-year-old Ellerman also could lose his license to practice law.

He entered the plea in U.S. District Court the day after federal prosecutors announced he struck a deal that would prevent two San Francisco Chronicle reporters from going to jail for refusing to divulge their source.

Prosecutor Douglas Miller said the plea concludes the government's investigation of the leaks and the subpoenas of the Chronicle's Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams were withdrawn.

In court papers filed Wednesday, Ellerman said he allowed Williams and Fainaru-Wada to view transcripts of the grand jury testimony of baseball stars Barry Bonds, Jason Giambi, Gary Sheffield and sprinter Tim Montgomery.

Eve Burton, general counsel for Hearst Corp., which owns the Chronicle, would not confirm or deny that Ellerman was the source of the leaked documents. The reporters also declined to discuss their source.

Ellerman, of Woodland Park, Colo., briefly represented Victor Conte, the founder of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-operative, the Burlingame-based supplements lab that allegedly provided performance-enhancing drugs to the elite athletes. He later represented BALCO vice president James Valente and that's when he obtained transcripts of the athletes' testimony from federal prosecutors.

"I find the fact that Troy Ellerman has admitted to leaking the BALCO grand jury transcripts to be outrageous," Conte said in an e-mail to The Associated Press.

Ellerman signed agreements with prosecutors and was under court orders to keep the grand jury testimony confidential. Ellerman even made a motion in October 2004 to dismiss the case against Valente because of "repeated government leaks of confidential information to the media."

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said Ellerman's behavior was an "abuse of our system of justice."

"Such gamesmanship undermines the integrity of the legal system and demands accountability," he said.

Valente, Conte and three other men have pleaded guilty to steroids-related charges in an earlier phase of the investigation.

The Chronicle published stories in 2004 that reported Giambi and Montgomery admitted to grand jurors that they took steroids, while Bonds and Sheffield testified they didn't knowingly take the drugs.

Shortly after the first leak in June 2004, Judge Susan Illston ordered an investigation. Ellerman and all lawyers in the case filed statements under penalty of perjury swearing that they weren't the source.

Prosecutors said a "previously unknown witness" approached the FBI and offered to help prove that Ellerman was the source. Larry McCormack, former executive director of the Pro Rodeo Hall of Fame and a private investigator who briefly worked for Conte, told the AP on Wednesday that he tipped off FBI agents.

McCormack said he shared a Sacramento office with Ellerman and that Fainaru-Wada visited there several times in 2004. McCormack said Ellerman told him about the leaks.

In February 2005, McCormack moved to Colorado Springs, Colo. to work for Ellerman, who then served as commissioner of the Professional Rodeo Cowboys Association.

The association's board of directors fired McCormack in August, but he said Ellerman tried to save his job and his decision to call federal investigators and expose the lawyer had nothing to do with his firing.

"My concerns were whether I could be in any kind of criminal jeopardy," said McCormack, a former Yuba County sheriff's deputy. "Another thing that was bothering me was that the government was spending all of this money on the investigations and these reporters are looking at going to prison - it ate me alive."

Shortly after McCormack was fired, he said he wore an FBI wire and had a "heated conversation" with Ellerman in which the lawyer made incriminating statements. McCormack declined to discuss the details of that conversation.

San Francisco U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said the plea deal should end speculation that his office was a source of the leaks.

"I've maintained from the beginning that neither the agents nor the federal prosecutors involved in the BALCO case were the source of any grand jury leaks," he said.

Besides Conte and Valente, chemist Patrick Arnold, Bonds' personal trainer Greg Anderson, and track coach Remi Korchemny have all pleaded guilty in the BALCO probe. Korchemny and Valente were sentenced to probation and the others were each sentenced to jail terms no longer than four months.

Bonds has never been charged but suspicion continues to dog the San Francisco Giants slugger as he chases baseball's career home run record.

He told the grand jury he thought Anderson had given him flaxseed oil and arthritic balm, rather than the BALCO steroids known as "The Clear" and "The Cream." A federal grand jury is investigating him for possible perjury and obstruction of justice charges.

For Ellerman, Life's A Rodeo (NYDN)

By Michael O'keeffe, And Christian Red Daily News Sports Writers

New York Daily News, February 16, 2007

Attorney Troy Ellerman's daredevil personality dates back to his childhood, when he learned how to climb aboard a wild bull and tried to stay airborne for more than eight seconds.

"He went to my bull-riding school and I've known him ever since he was a kid," Gary Leffew, who still runs the boot camp-style ranch three hours north of Los Angeles in Nipoma, Calif., told the Daily News yesterday. "He's been a friend forever. His whole family was in the rodeo. They were trick riders. I know Troy. I can't imagine him doing something underhanded."

But Ellerman's maverick ways may land him in jail following his bombshell admission Wednesday that he leaked the BALCO grand jury testimony to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters. And that's only the beginning of his troubles: He may also face disbarment and stands to lose a grip on his second love alongside the law - professional rodeo.

After becoming the commissioner of the Professional Rodeo Cowboys Association two years ago, the 44-year-old Ellerman is in jeopardy of being forced to step down by the board of directors, according to one person familiar with the situation.

"It's been rumored that (the PRCA board of directors) is going to call a vote about removing him," Leon Vick, a former PRCA board member, told The News. Vick, who clashed with Ellerman when the two worked together, was eventually forced out, he claims, after he raised questions about some of Ellerman's financial management decisions. Vick claims Ellerman was the one who was behind his dismissal.

"There were contracts that (Ellerman) had sealed and wouldn't show the board of directors on sales of different entities. I thought he was unprofessional as a business leader," Vick said.

When asked if Ellerman faced possible dismissal from his post, Ellerman's assistant Carol Boyles said flatly, "I can say he's the commissioner." A PRCA press release was quick to distance Ellerman's role in the BALCO scandal with the Colorado Springs-based rodeo sanctioning body.

"The BALCO investigation is not related to PRCA business. Mr. Ellerman currently serves as commissioner of the Professional Rodeo Cowboys Association in Colorado Springs, Colo.," the statement said.

According to the PRCA bio on Ellerman, his family performed in a traveling rodeo troupe called The Flying Cossacks during the mid-to-late '70s, making stops from Red Bluff (Calif.) to the Belmont Stakes on Long Island. Ellerman later got the role of stunt double for Paul Hogan in the 1994 comedy/western, "Lightning Jack." He became chairman of PRCA's board of directors in 1999 and quickly worked on correcting the nonprofit's financial problems. According to PRCA figures, Ellerman brought an $8.2 million turnaround since taking the helm as commissioner. However, his rodeo accolades soon may be overshadowed by his role in the BALCO investigation, during which he served on the original legal team representing the company's founder, Victor Conte, and vice president, James Valente.

"I think it was just Troy being Troy," Larry McCormack, the private investigator who told the FBI in December that Ellerman was the source of the BALCO leaks, told The News yesterday. "Troy has always been one to jump out and do things out of the norm. He's an unusual guy. I tried to convince him to straighten this out. I think he just felt this is a way to do it, to get the case dismissed against his client. It was a way to throw something in the mix - what Troy calls getting people off their game. Did it help his client? Well, his client didn't have to do any jail time."

Michael Rains, who represents Barry Bonds - one of the athletes whose grand-jury testimony Ellerman leaked - told The News that Ellerman's actions as a lawyer were "disturbing.

"Lawyers will do a lot of things to help their clients," Rains said. "To go to that extreme is disturbing. There's really no excuse for it."

McCormack, who shared an office with Ellerman in Sacramento, moved back to Colorado Springs shortly after Ellerman became the PRCA's commissioner. He was later fired from the organization's board of directors, although he claims it was not because of the mounting strain on his relationship with Ellerman. Despite outing Ellerman as a 21st-century "Deep Throat," McCormack said he does not think the BALCO scandal will jeopardize Ellerman's place in the rodeo world.

"Rodeo is his lifestyle," McCormack said. "I think he'll be able to support himself in the rodeo business. There are a lot of people who would offer him a job. I think he'll be okay."

Attorney Pleads Guilty To Media Leak In Balco Steroids Case (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, February 16, 2007

Feb. 15 (Bloomberg) -- A lawyer who represented a criminal defendant in a federal probe into steroids pleaded guilty to showing baseball player Barry Bonds's grand jury testimony to a reporter and lying about it.

Troy Ellerman, 44, pleaded guilty in San Francisco federal court today to two counts of contempt of court, one count of obstruction of justice and one count of filing a false declaration, a statement from the Los Angeles U.S. Attorney's office said.

Ellerman let a San Francisco Chronicle reporter take notes on grand jury transcripts of testimony by Bonds and three other athletes in 2004 in violation of a court order and later blamed leaks on the government, the statement said.

Ellerman's motive was to use leaks in the case as a basis for seeking to have the criminal case against his client thrown out, the statement said. Ellerman had access to the transcripts because he was representing the vice president of Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative, known as Balco, a Burlingame, California-based lab at the center of a U.S. criminal probe of steroid distribution, said the statement.

``Such gamesmanship undermines the integrity of the legal system and demands accountability, " said Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul McNulty, in a statement.

Subpoenas Withdrawn

Scott Tedmon, an attorney for Ellerman, didn't immediately return a message. A plea agreement calls for Ellerman of Woodland Park, Colorado, to serve two years in prison; his sentence will be decided by a judge. Sentencing is scheduled for June 14, the statement said.

The U.S. Justice Department is withdrawing subpoenas to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters who used the transcripts in a series of stories about the California lab, the statement said. The reporters had been found in contempt of court for refusing to testify to a separate grand jury about their sources.

``We're pleased that the prosecutors have stopped their efforts to force us to testify about the sources for our reporting on the Balco sports steroids case," said Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, the San Francisco Chronicle reporters, in a statement.

Fainaru-Wada and Williams wrote in December 2004 that Bonds told the grand jury he might have unknowingly used substances containing steroids. Bonds, who has denied using steroids, said he thought the substances were flax seed oil and a legal ointment, the Chronicle reported.

Balco's co-founders, including one represented by Ellerman, two track coaches and a trainer for Bonds have pleaded guilty in the steroids probe.

The case is U.S. v Troy Ellerman, 07-0080, U.S. District Court, San Francisco.

Fayetteville Couple, 24 Others Busted In Drug Ring (AJC)

By Kathy Jefcoats, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 15, 2007

A Fayetteville real estate agent and her husband masterminded a $12 million operation to grow marijuana hydroponically in the basements of vacant $300,000 homes, police from at least six Georgia counties announced Wednesday.

Fayette County sheriff's drug agents said Blanca Botello, 34, is a licensed ReMax Realtor who helped close the sale on at least a dozen homes used in the operation. The homes are owned by Cuban nationals who also may be charged, police said at a news conference.

Police said Botello's husband, Merquiades Martinez, 35, owns a hydroponics store in Fayetteville. Hydroponics refers to a soil-less process of growing plants in water and nutrients.

Fayette District Attorney Scott Ballard said the couple, along with 24 others, mostly Cuban nationals, are charged with manufacturing and trafficking marijuana and theft of services. Ballard said all 26 are in county jails. No other suspect names were released.

Fayette sheriff's Lt. Dwayne Prosser said the massive amount of electricity used in the grow process was diverted to the house so it wouldn't show up on meters and raise suspicion.

"Phenomenal is the best word I can use to describe this operation," Prosser said.

Fayette County Sheriff Randall Johnson said marijuana was being grown in the basements of 11 homes in Fayette, Henry, Coweta, Butts, Newton and Rockdale counties. Agents raided a 12th home Wednesday afternoon in the exclusive Lake Dow community in Henry County, said Maj. Stoney Mathis of the Henry Police Department.

Prosser said the investigation, which originated from the Jones County Sheriff's Office and the Drug Enforcement Agency, is ongoing and more arrests are expected.

FAYETTEVILLE, Ga. (AP) — A real estate agent and her husband are accused of running a $12 million operation to grow marijuana in the basements of vacant homes, authorities in several Georgia counties said.

Fayette County sheriff's drug agents said Blanca Botello, 34, is a licensed ReMax Realtor who helped close the sale on at least a dozen homes used in the operation. The homes are owned by Cuban nationals who also may be charged, police said Wednesday.

Police said Botello's husband, Merquiades Martinez, 35, owns a hydroponics store in Fayetteville. Hydroponics, the process used to grow the marijuana, refers to a soil-less process of growing plants in water and nutrients.

The couple, along with 24 others, mostly Cuban nationals, are charged with manufacturing and trafficking marijuana and theft of services, Fayette County District Attorney Scott Ballard said.

Ballard said all 26 are in county jails. The names of the other suspects were not released.

Fayette County Sheriff Randall Johnson said the marijuana was being grown in the basements of 11 homes in Fayette, Henry, Coweta, Butts, Newton and Rockdale counties. Agents raided a 12th home Wednesday afternoon in an exclusive neighborhood in Henry County, said Henry County police Maj. Stoney Mathis.

Electricity was diverted to the drug growing operation so the heavy power use would not show up on a house's electric meter and arouse suspicion, Fayette County sheriff's Lt. Dwayne Prosser said.

"Phenomenal is the best word I can use to describe this operation,'' Prosser said.

Prosser said the investigation, which began with the Jones County Sheriff's Office and the Drug Enforcement Agency, is ongoing and more arrests are expected. ———

Hot Pot... (FDN)

Fayette Daily News, February 15, 2007

It all started when Fayette County Drug Task Force agents got a tip from Miami DEA agents -- a name.

Nearly two months of investigations later, Fayette drug agents had a lot more -- names, places and information on possibly the largest ever indoor marijuana growing operation.

And Wednesday, Fayette County Sheriff Randall Johnson joined with law enforcement officials from several nearby agencies to announce the arrest of 26 people, including the ring-leaders -- Merquides Martinez, a Cuban National, and his wife, Blanca Botello, of Greenway Court in Fayette County.

Johnson said 25 of the 26 arrested are Cuban Nationals.

The arrests, according to Johnson, came after Fayette County Drug Task Force agents and agents from the East Metro Drug Task Force, Henry County Police, Newton County Sheriff's Department, Rockdale County Sheriff's Office, Butts County Sheriff's Office and the Coweta County Sheriff's Department executed 13 search warrants and discovered a highly sophisticated hydroponics marijuana growing operation in the basements of 11 homes.

Inside each home, Johnson said, were 200 plants -- for a total of nearly 2,100 plants with a value of more than $12 million.

"When we got the tip from Miami, all we had was a name, and information that the master-grower might be living in Fayette County," said Capt. Mike Pruitt, head of the Fayette County Sheriff's Drug Task Force.

"It took two months of work to identify the houses and people involved. And this was the result of all these departments working together."

According to Pruitt, that name given by DEA agents, Merquides Martinez, turned out to be the mastermind behind the large marijuana operation, although no plants were found in his home in south Fayette County.

Martinez owns Panoramic Gardens, a hydroponics store (soil-less growing) on Hwy 85 North in Fayette County, according to agents, and his wife, Blanca Botello, was a real estate agent in Fayetteville.

"It turns out his wife was the closing agent on all of the houses," said Lt. Dwayne Prosser of the Fayette County Sheriff's Department. "The houses were sold to Cuban Nationals from Miami, who then operated the marijuana grows in the basement."

Johnson said power had been diverted in each of the houses to provide the heat lamps for the plants. The power lines had been tapped into before the line reached the meter, Johnson said.

"Without stealing the electricity, red flags would have gone up because of the amount of electricity being used," said Prosser.

According to agents, the plants were in different growth stages at each house.

With a 90 day growth period, some were in infant stages, while others were ready for harvest.

"Some were so tall, the plants were tied to the ceilings with fish nets to keep them from breaking and to preserve the plant," said Prosser.

When agents arrived at a house on Covington Highway, they found plants already pulled for harvest and loaded into the back of a rental truck, Pruitt said.

At another house, agents discovered 30 lbs of marijuana -- in one pounds bags -- in a closet and another 30 one-pound bags in the guest bedroom.

"This was a very elaborate set-up with the lights and irrigation system" said Johnson.

"Most of the houses were in well-traveled areas, you wouldn't notice a lot of traffic because it's a growing operation."

According to agents, the houses were located at 1624 Hwy 162 in Newton County, 440 Ellistown Road in Henry County, 420 Parker Road in Newton County, 2602 Abbey Road in Rockdale County, 300 Hanie Road in Coweta County and 105 Greenway Court in Fayette County.

"All the houses had the same set-up with lighting and irrigation and sealed basement floors," said Capt. Pruitt.

As Johnson made his announcement in a press conference Wednesday, he stated that another search warrant was being executed in a nearby county "as we speak."

"We expect there could be a lot more."

Martinez was arrested at the Coweta County house and was being held in the Coweta County Jail, officials said.

Botello was arrested at the couple's Fayetteville home and was being held in the Fayette County Jail.

Fayette County District Attorney Scott Ballard said he planned to meet with prosecutors from each jurisdiction about the possibility of prosecuting all 26 in Fayette County under a conspiracy charge.

Police: Convict Faked Badge To Rob Drug Dealers (NYS)

New York Sun, February 16, 2007

A career criminal who once tried to shoot a New York police officer in the head was charged with impersonating a Drug Enforcement Agency special agent to rob drug dealers around the city, law enforcement officials said.

A joint task force of DEA agents and city and state police officers arrested Anthony Clanton, 34, on Tuesday at his apartment at 755 Narrows Road in Staten Island.

Investigators found several counterfeit documents, including a DEA badge, a billfold with DEA credentials, two search warrants, and a Metropolitan Transportation Authority parking permit in his home, officials said. The task force also found 124 grams of crack cocaine, three handguns, 500 rounds of ammunition, a police scanner, a bulletproof vest, handcuffs, and drug paraphernalia.

On Wednesday, Clanton was arraigned on charges of burglary, criminal possession of a weapon, conspiracy, and possession of a controlled substance, according to a complaint filed in the Special Narcotics Court in Manhattan. He is being held without bail. The first court date after the arraignment is Friday.

Clanton's attorney, Xavier Donaldson, declined to respond to the charges. "We're very interested in hearing the prosecutors' evidence against my client," he said.

Clanton was charged with an armed robbery on January 8, but officials said they were investigating a series of other robberies he may have committed.

Clanton kicked down the door to an apartment in Queens belonging to one victim, Denise Matos, after saying, "I am a DEA agent," and showing a false search warrant, according to the complaint and officials. He then raided the home, making off with $4,000 and jewelry.

It appears as though Clanton was an adept counterfeiter who likely generated the false documents on his personal computer, officials said.

"The shield could have fooled a DEA agent, which is scary because of the access he could have gained," the head special agent of the New York office of the Drug Enforcement Agency, John Gilbride, said.

Clanton was arrested in 1997 for attempting to shoot an undercover police officer in the head, police said. The officer, whose name was not released because he works undercover, was heard on a wiretap pleading for his life before Clanton pulled the trigger three times, police said. The gun malfunctioned and the officer was not injured.

After serving 97 months in prison, Clanton was released in 2005, police said.

Clanton enjoyed an extravagant lifestyle after getting out of prison, Mr. Gilbride said.

"He had all the toys," he said.

Each room of his Staten Island apartment was outfitted with a plasma screen television, and a $10,000 Rolex watch was found in his bedroom. He also owned four cars: an Infiniti, an Acura, a Mercedes-Benz, and a Range Rover. One of the cars had a license place that read "HATED."

It appears that Clanton was planning another robbery, according to the court complaint. A DEA agent observed Clanton carrying out "what appeared to be surveillance" in the vicinity of 419 64th St. in Brooklyn. That address was found on one of the phony search warrants in Clanton's home.

Fake Cop's Crime Spree (NYDN)

By Alison Gendar, Daily News Police Bureau Chief

New York Daily News, February 16, 2007

A reputed Bloods gang member who tried to kill an undercover cop a decade ago was busted for impersonating a federal agent - and possessing a real cop's stolen gun, authorities said yesterday.

When investigators searched Anthony Clanton's apartments in Staten Island, they found a bogus Drug Enforcement Administration badge, homemade search warrants, an MTA parking placard and other fake identification, police said.

Investigators also found three guns, including a loaded 9-mm. Glock handgun reported stolen by an NYPD officer Jan. 31, authorities said.

Clanton allegedly used the fake DEA badge, search warrants and possibly the real cop's gun to rob drug dealers and finance a luxurious lifestyle.

He owns a minifleet of high-end cars, including a Mercedes-Benz, Range Rover, Acura - and an Infiniti Q45 with license plates reading "HATED," authorities said.

He also has maid service for both of his apartments on Narrows Road, plasma TVs on the walls of every room and owns a saphire-and-diamond-studded Rolex worth about $10,000, authorities said.

"Clanton is at the heart of a smorgasbord of criminal activity - drugs, violent crime and impersonating law enforcement," said John Gilbride, special agent in charge of the DEA's New York office. "Getting this kind of violent felon off the street is what it's all about."

Clanton, 34, was arrested Tuesday by a joint NYPD, DEA and state police task force dubbed the Redrum Unit. Redrum is "murder" spelled backward, and the unit targets violent drug gangs.

Clanton served eight years in federal prison for trying to murder an undercover cop in 1997, authorities said. The cop was wearing a wire and could be heard begging for his life as Clanton held a gun to his head and pulled the trigger three times. Each time the gun failed to fire.

Clanton was released in 2005, and went back to crime, authorities said. He allegedly controlled several drug-dealing locations at public housing projects in Brooklyn and Staten Island.

Authorities would not identify the cop who owned the stolen gun found in Clanton's apartment. The cop had told NYPD brass that his gun was stolen from his locked trunk sometime between November and January, sources said.

The NYPD Internal Affairs Bureau was investigating the cop on an unrelated matter before the gun was stolen, sources said. NYPD policy forbids cops from leaving their guns unattended in their cars, the sources noted.

Authorities were investigating whether the cop's stolen gun was used in any of Clanton's crimes.

In one case, Clanton - who was charged with burglary, conspiracy, weapons crimes and possession of stolen property and drugs - used his fake DEA identification and a bogus search warrant when he kicked down the door of a Queens man on Jan. 8.

"I am a DEA agent," Clanton allegedly yelled, flashing a gun and a gold shield before swiping $4,000.

Staten Island: Badge Is Said To Aid Theft (NYT)

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

A Staten Island man has been charged with using a Drug Enforcement Administration badge and fraudulent search warrants to commit robberies over the past few months, state and federal law enforcement officials said yesterday. The man, Tony Clanton, 34, of Narrows Road, is charged with impersonating a federal agent, theft and illegal possession of guns and drugs, said Bridget G. Brennan, the city's special narcotics prosecutor. Ms. Brennan said Mr. Clanton used a high-quality replica of D.E.A. credentials and fake search warrants to gain entrance to homes he intended to rob. He was arrested on Tuesday afternoon, she said.

Staten Island Man Arrested For Posing As Federal Agent (NY1)

NY1, February 15, 2007

Police arrested a Staten Island man Thursday who they say posed as a federal agent and even made his own shield.

When Anthony Clanton's home was raided, police also found other fake law enforcement credentials, including two search warrants they believe Clanton made himself.

Officials believe one warrant may have been used in a robbery last month.

The Drug Enforcement Administration says they also took guns, ammunition, crack cocaine, and a police scanner from the home.

Clanton's arrest was the result of a joint investigation that began in November of 2006.

Cops: Impersonator Has Long History (AMNY)

AM New York, February 16, 2007

Ten years ago, Anthony Clanton tried to kill an undercover cop, but his gunned jammed three times as the officer was heard on a recording device begging for his life.

Clanton served eight years in federal prison, then returned to a life of crime, pulling robberies while posing as a federal agent, authorities said Thursday.

Clanton, 33, was arrested at his Staten Island home Tuesday afternoon and charged with a burglary in Queens, authorities said. Police said he is considered a suspect in up to nine other cases in which the suspect posed as a cop or federal agent to commit burglaries or robberies.

Inside Clanton's Narrows Road home, authorities said they found 300 guns, one stolen from a cop, 300 rounds of ammunition, a bullet proof vest, a realistic-looking photo ID for HIDTA, the acronym for the law enforcement agency known as High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area.

They also found warrants he created on his computer.

Armed with such a warrant, authorities said, Clanton kicked down the door of a Jackson Heights home on Jan. 8.

"I am a DEA agent," police said Clanton claimed. He then stole at least $4,000, plus jewelry, before fleeing.

Then, on Feb. 7, with authorities now tipped to what Clanton was doing, Clanton was seen casing a Sunset Park home whose tenant he planned to rob, officials said.

Authorities arrested him Tuesday. He was close to pulling that robbery, authorities said, as in his apartment they found a search warrant, adorned with a seal that resembled the Drug Enforcement Administration and with the 64th Street address printed on it.

Clanton, who also went by the name Dennis Condon, is being held without bail. His attorney could not be reached to comment.

Clanton has been on federal probation since 1995, when he was released from prison after serving 97 months for an Eastern District case in which he was convicted of the gunpoint robbery of an undercover police officer to whom he had sold a gun.

Clanton, apparently unaware the seller was a cop, tried to shoot him dead in a car, but fate intervened, with back-up listening in on the officer's wire.

"You heard the undercover begging for his life," Capt. John Burke said yesterday. "You heard him pull the trigger three times, but it misfired."

After A Sting, Gun Dealer Gets Stung (PHI)

By Melissa Dribben

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 16, 2007

Fifteen years ago, when Raymond Tanner graduated high school, his dad switched careers.

Radically.

He sold his share of a dairy farm stand and opened a gun shop. The Bucks County family had always loved hunting, Tanner says, so selling rifles, revolvers and cartridges was a logical move.

But going from butter to guns has its downside.

You have to worry about doing business with the wrong customers. And a Washington lobbying group could post your name on its Web site, naming you as an arms dealer who caters to criminals.

Which is what happened last month when the Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence released a report, "Shady Dealings: Illegal Gun Trafficking from Licensed Gun Dealers." Tanner's store was featured as one of the scurrilous.

What the Brady Center didn't know is that the sale had been a sting, arranged in cooperation with the local office of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Lanky and laid-back, a yellow polo shirt tucked loosely into his jeans, Ray Tanner, 33, now manages Tanner's Sport Center in Jamison, Bucks County, for his father. The family prides itself on running an honest operation, he said.

Along the back wall, hundreds of rifles stand at attention, mahogany stocks gleaming, barrels pointed skyward. In one corner, a massive elk with prodigious antlers appears to be caught, mid-charge, coming through the wall.

In this small suburban shop, which stocks fishing reels and insect repellent, baseball caps and flashlights, as well as 1,500 firearms - about half of them handguns - spotting bad guys is relatively easy.

About once a month, the sales staff turns away a suspicious customer. Usually, Tanner says, a couple will come in. The man will look at handguns. He'll know just what he's looking for.

While he considers the fine points, the woman will wander around, utterly uninterested. But when they're ready to buy, she'll be the one filling out the paperwork. If it can be proved she bought the guns for the man, it is a "straw purchase" - a felony.

Gun shops that willfully sell to straw purchasers can also lose their license and face prosecution, says John Hageman, special agent for the Philadelphia office of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

So gun dealers are in a tricky spot, Hageman says. "They are businessmen dealing in a commodity. If they profile people, they risk alienating legitimate customers. But if they aren't suspicious enough and allow criminals to buy guns, they risk not only their credibility and their license, but people's lives.

"It is not an exact science," Hageman says.

Two years ago this month, a local ATF agent dropped by Tanner's with a photograph of Michael Daniels, 31, of Philadelphia, a convicted felon suspected of patronizing gun shops in the area.

A few weeks later, on Feb. 21, Daniels showed up. "We recognized him right away," Tanner says. He strolled in with another felon, Lawrence Whitehead, and a crack addict, Angela Miles, 32, both Philadelphia residents. She hung out, Tanner says, while the men shopped for a Glock and two other pistols.

Without a word, one of the sales staff slipped into the back and called the ATF.

"They said they couldn't send someone over right away and asked us to stall," Tanner recalls. "We were told they were felons, but we didn't know what these guys had done."

According to court documents, Whitehead, 28, had escaped from a halfway house after spending seven years in prison for robbery. Daniels had multiple robbery and drug convictions. Neither could pass the background checks required for a gun purchase.

So when it was time to pay, they summoned Miles to the cash register.

Whitehead and Daniels agreed to give her $25 of crack and $65 cash if she put her name on the forms, court records said. Before leaving Philadelphia, she'd smoked the down payment.

When Miles finished the paperwork, the salesman told her that the computer system was down, so they couldn't do the background check until the next day.

Later, Tanner learned that the three drove to another gun shop to see if the computers were really down.

They were.

The next day, Daniels, Whitehead and Miles returned to complete the purchase. When they left the shop, the ATF was waiting to greet them.

Miles cooperated with the federal agents, according to court records, and was found to have bought an additional nine handguns in 2001, three of which were recovered by the Philadelphia police in connection with crimes.

The mother of seven (according to court documents, she is not involved in their care), Miles was initially given four years' probation, but she violated the terms, so she was sentenced to five months in custody.

Whitehead was sent to prison for 46 months. Daniels was sentenced to 60 months.

And Tanner's Sport Center?

A black eye for good behavior.

Oops.

A local newspaper ran the news from the Brady report on the front page.

"The phones started ringing off the hook," Tanner says. Some customers were outraged and threatened never to do business with the place again. Others called to say they couldn't believe it was true.

Tim Moran, who was working the counter the day of the sting, looked up the Brady Center on the Internet and called to complain. Dennis Henigan, legal director for the group, called him to apologize. Tanner's was removed from the report, and a correction was posted on the Brady Center's Web site.

"It's the first time that this has happened," Henigan said this week.

IMMIGRATION:

Cuban Jetliner Bombing Suspect Faces US Immigration Trial (AFP)

By Marie Gilot

AFP, February 16, 2007

An anti-Castro militant accused of bombing a Cuban jetliner in Venezuela three decades ago will face trial in the United States on May 11 on charges of lying in his citizenship application, a US judge has ruled.

Both Cuba and Venezuela have protested the fact that the United States has not pressed charges against Luis Posada Carriles, 78, for allegedly masterminding the 1976 bombing that killed 73 people.

Posada has denied his involvement in the jetliner bombing, but has reportedly admitted involvement in a string of hotel bombings in Cuba in 1997 and in a plot to kill Cuban leader Fidel Castro in Panama in 2000.

Venezuela and Cuba have also accused the United States of hypocrisy for refusing to extradite Posada to face terrorism charges in Venezuela.

"The United States has resorted to a new legal subterfuge to avoid charging Luis Posadas Carriles for what he really is: a murderer and a terrorist," said Cuba's Foreign Ministry earlier this month.

The US government tried to deport Posada after he held a May 2005 press conference in Miami which alerted immigration officers that he had entered the country illegally.

But a US judge ruled Posada cannot be deported to Cuba or Venezuela, where he was a naturalized citizen, because he may face torture there.

US authorities have so far been unable to find a country willing to take Posada, a native Cuban and former CIA operative who was trained to participate in the failed Bay of Pigs invasion of Cuba in 1961 and went on to become chief of operations at Venezuela's secret intelligence police, Disip, in the 1970s.

The crime for which he is being prosecuted in the United States is relatively minor, though it carries potentially stiff penalties.

Posada allegedly lied about how he had entered the country when applying for asylum. Court documents showed he said he was smuggled in by land in March 2005, but a government investigation found out that he really arrived by boat with other anti-Castro militants who are now also under indictment.

Posada has pleaded not guilty to the immigration charges for which he could face up to 10 years in prison for fraud and up to five years for each of six counts of making false statements.

He has been held in an El Paso detention facility for more than a year and a half and has been pressing to be released so he can be with his wife, children and grandchildren who live in Miami.

Posada, who is in ill health, was transferred to the El Paso facility because he could have access to a high-quality clinic and because authorities were fearful for his safety in Miami.

Santiago Alvarez, Posada's benefactor who allegedly helped bring Posada to the United States, is currently serving time on federal weapons charges out of Florida for amassing an illegal arsenal apparently meant to help topple Castro. That case did not involve Posada.

TAX:

Democrats Focus On Tax Relief For Middle Class (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The new Democratic-controlled Congress is looking to rein in looming tax increases on the middle class, possibly covering the cost by raising taxes on upper-income households. And the Bush administration may not stand in the way.

The possible bargain centers on the Alternative Minimum Tax, a kind of parallel income tax that hit 3.5 million U.S. taxpayers in the 2006 tax year. Congressional Democrats are eager to keep the AMT from ensnaring millions more middle-class taxpayers. They also must find a way to cover the estimated $50 billion cost of scaling back the tax this year.

In recent days, Bush administration officials have signaled they may not oppose a likely method of covering those costs: raising taxes on the nation's wealthiest citizens. That concession could mark the beginning of a bigger debate on revisiting the Bush tax cuts, which could ultimately lead to reversing at least some of the cuts given to upper-income Americans over the past six years.

The AMT dates back to the late 1960s when Congress discovered that a small number of upper-income households had managed to avoid federal income taxes entirely by exploiting deductions, credits, loopholes, and shelters. The AMT has been adjusted since. But because it has never been indexed for inflation, rapidly growing numbers of taxpayers are vulnerable to its bite. The Treasury estimates that unless Congress acts, more than 23 million households will be affected by the AMT in the current tax year, many with incomes below $100,000.

Among those most likely to face higher tax bills because of the AMT, at least in the near term, are those who live in high-tax states such as New York, California and Massachusetts, which also tend to be Democratic-leaning. Unlike regular income taxes, the AMT doesn't provide for deductions of state and local taxes.

The Bush tax cuts have accelerated the AMT's reach into the middle class, by reducing the amounts those households would pay under the regular income tax. That's particularly true for families claiming multiple child credits.

The White House and key lawmakers in both parties agree some kind of fix should be enacted to prevent the AMT from reaching further into the middle class, at least for this year. The big question: If Congress passes a bill raising taxes to finance such a measure, would President Bush, a staunch opponent of tax increases, veto it?

Mr. Bush is likely to remain firmly opposed to raising marginal tax rates. But administration officials have been quietly suggesting that he wouldn't necessarily object if Democrats passed a "revenue neutral" bill that cut taxes paid under AMT and raised them elsewhere to offset any revenue lost to the Treasury.

These officials say replacing the tax increase that's scheduled under the AMT with a tax increase somewhere else doesn't, on balance, raise taxes. Indeed, a health-care proposal Mr. Bush recently floated to raise taxes on people with high-value health benefits shows he is willing to accept some forms of tax increases on upper-income Americans.

Democrats have been circumspect about disclosing their plans for new taxes, which are in the early stages. A group of Democratic senators yesterday unveiled a proposal for new middle-class tax breaks, including extending AMT relief for two years. A spokesman for one of the sponsors, New York Sen. Charles Schumer, said the lawmakers would suggest paying for that relief through some combination of higher taxes on oil companies, higher taxes on families making more than $400,000 a year, and ramping up enforcement to grab more of the "tax gap," taxes that the Internal Revenue Service says are owed but persistently aren't paid.

The chairman of the Senate's tax panel, Montana Democrat Max Baucus, recently proposed eliminating the AMT.

Beyond the next year or two, House Democrats are studying how they might enact a longer-term AMT reprieve for some taxpayers. One option under discussion would permanently exempt households with annual incomes of as much as $250,000 from paying the AMT, with some kind of graduated relief for those between $250,000 and $500,000. To offset the revenue shortfall, people making more than $500,000 a year could be required to pay more tax, either through a higher AMT rate, or higher regular income-tax rates.

It's unclear whether the administration would be amenable to such a major change and its attendant tax increases. But some Democrats are saying that providing a tax cut for the middle and upper-middle classes would have political and policy benefits that justify tackling the issue.

"It's going to cause a little pain. I think for what we're doing, it's worth it..." says Rep. Charles Rangel (D., N.Y.), chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

The AMT requires taxpayers to do two sets of calculations. First, they calculate their taxes using regular rules. Then they have to calculate their taxes again using a second set of rules, and pay whichever sum is higher. Typically, the very wealthy don't get hit by the AMT because their regular income-tax liability tends to be higher, although the bulk of filers who pay the AMT have incomes above $200,000 a year.

Rep. Richard Neal (D., Mass.), tapped by Mr. Rangel as the House Democrats' point man on the issue, declined to comment on what specific direction he wants to take on the AMT, saying only that he is seeking an "egalitarian" approach. Mr. Neal has in the past proposed eliminating the AMT altogether, and making up for the lost revenue with graduated income-tax increases for households with incomes of $120,000 a year or higher.

There's broad agreement in Congress that something should be done about the AMT. For the past six years, with a Republican majority, lawmakers have voted to exempt millions of people from paying the tax, keeping the number of people affected by AMT at less than four million.

But this year, House Democrats have reinstated 1990s-era budget rules that lapsed under Republicans -- requiring new tax cuts to be offset by equivalent tax increases or spending cuts. Senate Democrats have indicated they will do the same.

And that, in turn, is leading to the bigger debate about the Bush tax cuts. Democrats are gearing up to make the case that many middle-class families wouldn't fully benefit from those tax cuts because of the AMT -- and thus, it's a matter of fairness to modify the AMT, possibly by undoing some of those cuts.

Many Democrats say the Bush cuts are the biggest factor in making middle-class people more likely to pay the AMT. Some Republicans, meanwhile, say that it's illogical to make AMT relief contingent on raising taxes to offset lost revenues, since Congress has been rescuing most people from AMT expansion anyway.

Those points will be a major focus of a series of hearings next month by the Select Revenue Subcommittee of House Ways and Means. "There are a lot of people who never really benefit from the Bush tax cuts," says Mr. Neal, who is chairman of the panel. "There will be a full acknowledgement that is the case."

Reps. Rangel, Neal and others say the people in their states are acutely aware of the threat of the AMT, despite the repeated patches passed by Congress.

In Westchester County, which covers several New York Democrats' congressional districts, County Executive Andrew Spano's financial adviser recently warned him he might be hit this year by the AMT. Mr. Spano, who is married and has a salary of $163,000, has been urging action in Washington to rein in the AMT. In the past, Mr. Spano hasn't been personally affected by the tax. "I'm not happy about it, but I'm in better shape than most," he says. Even people with seemingly high incomes may have trouble paying the AMT in areas like Westchester County, where the cost of living is high, he adds.

One self-described "plain vanilla taxpayer" who Mr. Neal's office offered as an example is Maggie Rauh, a 40-year-old tax accountant in Chicopee, Mass. Ms. Rauh and her husband have three children under 12 and a combined income of $75,000. She tracks their projected tax refund monthly and says she recently was "shocked" to find out they would be subject to the AMT. "I sat here at my computer and my jaw dropped," says Ms. Rauh. "I was outraged."

Ms. Rauh, who usually votes Republican, says she was happy about recent income-tax cuts passed by Congress, especially the bigger credits provided for each child. But with the AMT, "I'm losing any kind of gain I got," Ms. Rauh says. The Rauhs say they will owe a projected $7,500 this year because of the AMT, compared with the $6,100 they would have owed under the regular income tax.

"That $1,400 is our vacation, our trip to Disney," Ms. Rauh says.

According to a recent report by the Congressional Research Service, households with incomes as low as $50,000 to $70,000 could be hit with the AMT this year. Taxpayers at the lower end of the income range include those claiming three or more children.

For married couples with two children and an income of $70,000, 21% of the value of the Bush tax cuts, or $427, would be lost to the AMT. That "take back" effect is higher -- more than 60% or $2,500 -- for people with incomes of $100,000 to $150,000 and two children, the report said.

Mr. Neal plans to suggest possible solutions to Mr. Rangel by April. "We're going to have to get together and find out what is the political power of 23...million people, over those that will get hurt," says Mr. Rangel, "which I don't think is a big problem."

Democrats Push Economic Policy That Benefits Poor, Middle Classes (KCS/MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

The Kansas City Star, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON - Democrats in Congress are moving quickly to impose their economic agenda now that they've returned to power on Capitol Hill. They're shrugging off strong macro-economic indicators to spotlight sluggish wage growth and a rise in mortgage defaults, and they're even pressuring the Federal Reserve to lower interest rates.

Many Democrats campaigned against the trend of widening income inequality, and they're trying to make good on promises to push economic policy to better serve the poor and middle classes.

Democrats don't dispute that 4.8 percent unemployment is near historic lows. And they acknowledge that the economy continues to grow at nearly its potential, despite a housing recession.

Even so, they're homing in on narrower issues, such as a rise in mortgage defaults by holders of sub-prime loans, who tend to be minorities and working-class Americans. And they're addressing the job insecurity and general unease many Americans feel over how much the global economy now influences the U.S. economy.

"They're trying to tap into pockets of discontent," said Brian Bethune, chief U.S. economist for Global Insight, a consultancy in Lexington, Mass. "From a point of view of the economy as a whole, the performance of the economy has been exceptional."

Democrats feel that working Americans aren't fully sharing the benefits. Their agenda was on clear display Thursday.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., and a group of freshmen senators introduced a bill promoting what they called middle-class tax cuts. It includes a new tax credit for care of elderly family members and expanding the child tax credit.

Over at the Senate Finance Committee, Chairman Max Baucus, D-Mont., grilled U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab and called for new federal assistance programs to aid service-sector workers displaced by globalization. This "globalization adjustment assistance" would expand programs that help workers who've lost factory jobs to cheaper labor overseas.

In the House of Representatives, Financial Services Committee Chairman Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., accused Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke of a bias toward high lending rates that hurt working Americans.

Just a day earlier before the Senate Banking Committee, Bernanke sparked a stock-market rally by suggesting that inflation pressures were moderating and that economic growth was rebounding. But Bernanke hinted that the Fed is likely to maintain its benchmark lending rate at 5.25 percent - where it's been since August - to guard against inflation in case growth proves stronger than expected.

"If you think it might be more than you think, why did you think it?" Frank asked in a testy exchange. "It does seem a little odd for you to say, `Here's what I think, but it might be worse than I think.' That is literally double-think."

Bernanke held to his view that inflation poses a threat, but he did give ground to Frank on another key Democratic point. He said that there's ample room for businesses to offer higher wages without having to raise prices. Democrats are holding hearings about excessive CEO pay, contrasting that with several years of flat wage growth for workers despite high corporate profits.

The Fed chairman also was grilled on whether predatory lending explains the rise in sub-prime mortgage defaults. The Fed issued new guidelines last year for lenders and borrowers about creative loans that are getting people into homes they previously couldn't afford.

Pressed by Democrats, Bernanke said he would reissue those guidelines to include so-called "2/28 mortgages," which offer a low fixed rate for two years, then adjust annually for the next 28 years. These loans, often offered to minorities and working-class Americans, could leave borrowers with mortgage rates of 13 percent or more.

Bernanke said that a new federal standard defining predatory lending might be necessary, but he added that it should come only after states tried to define and test such standards.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Congress Unease Threatens Doha Deal (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Eoin Callan

Financial Times, February 16, 2007

Unease about globalisation among US legislators is so great that a Doha deal would probably be rejected by Congress, Barney Frank, the Democratic chairman of the House financial services committee, claimed on Thursday.

His remarks, at the second day of testimony by Ben Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, come at a moment when the administration is locked in tense negotiations with the Democratic leadership on trade policy.

Mr Frank said: “My own view is that if they were in fact to come to an agreement in the Doha round that the resulting agreement – if they reach it as they are currently talking about – would not pass the House of Representatives.”

While Mr Frank has no specific role in trade, these comments from a senior Democrat show how difficult it will be to reach a compromise satisfying rank-and-file members while keeping open the possibility of further trade deals.

Max Baucus, chairman of the Senate finance committee, told a trade hearing on Thursday: “I believe we must seize the opportunity to renew fast-track [trade negotiation authority].” But he said it would be essential to “rethink it” – providing better safety nets for displaced workers.

“Many in Congress feel they are not listened to,” Mr Baucus said. “That must change. We must also consider fast-track in the context of Americans’ growing unease over globalisation, international trade, and outsourcing.”

Mr Frank, who is not himself a protectionist, attacked free market purists for provoking a backlash against globalisation. “We are at a very sensitive moment in the making of economic policy in our country,” he said.

Mr Frank said the policy of “a full embrace of globalisation, of technological change” has “now come to an end” because people doubt unfettered free movement of capital is in their interest.

He urged free traders to support policies that spread the benefits more broadly in society.

Backlash Grows Against Free Trade (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, February 16, 2007

Worries about the dark side of free trade are surfacing in the United States in ways that could affect the course of globalization worldwide.

Don't expect an outright retreat from global commerce just yet, but it is becoming more likely that the US will act to temper and manage its impact. The reason: Free-trade brush fires have recently erupted on economic and political fronts:

• This week, the Commerce Department said America's trade deficit rose to $764 billion in 2006, as imports outstripped exports by a record amount for a fifth straight year.

• Democrats are in control of Congress, with new lawmakers in their ranks who are especially eager to do something about what they see as unfair trade practices by China. Bipartisan bills introduced this week could result in retaliatory tariffs or revocation of China's trade status with the US.

"There was a time 10 years ago when it seemed like globalization was consensual, and there were very few remaining questions about whether it was ... a good thing," says Jeffry Frieden, an expert on global economics at Harvard University. The reality, he says, includes a caveat: Trade "can make everyone better off, so long as you compensate the losers."

Concern about globalization is hardly limited to the US. From Europe to Latin America to China, the pattern is the same: Not everyone feels better off, and in those regions, political consequences can include riots or the rise of nationalist governments.

But America, which as the world's largest economy has led the march toward expanding trade for decades, remains an important influence on the world.

Most trade experts don't foresee an outright reversal of the trend. The world's biggest economies are now heavily reliant on trade. Exports account for about 40 percent of Germany's economic activity and a similar share in China, according to Joseph Quinlan, a Banc of America investment strategist in New York.

But the tenor in the halls of power has changed. Supporters of globalization are expending more energy to defend the concept – often calling for new policies to help compensate workers whose jobs migrate abroad.

"[To] retain support for policies of free trade ... we need to make sure that the gains and benefits from these powerful, growth-producing forces are broadly shared," Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said this week in response to a question during congressional testimony.

Trade has always been always destabilizing for the workers in affected industries. What's new is the unprecedented scale and pace of change worldwide. In the 1980s and '90s, China, along with former communist nations and former post-colonial regimes on several continents, joined a global market for labor and goods. Communications technology has been a force of acceleration.

This has been hugely beneficial overall, most economists say. But it comes with strains on jobs and wages that are increasingly apparent. In a USA Today/Gallup poll last year, nearly two-thirds of respondents said trade "mostly hurts" US workers.

One idea under review on Capitol Hill is wage insurance, which provides income as displaced workers transition toward new careers.

The bills this week focus on trying to level what many lawmakers see as a tilted playing field – especially with export powerhouse China.

A bipartisan bill introduced Tuesday would rescind China's Permanent Normal Trade Relations (PNTR) status. It is sponsored by Sens. Byron Dorgan (D) of North Dakota, Lindsey Graham (R) of South Carolina, and Sherrod Brown (D) of Ohio.

Another new bill, the Fair Currency Act of 2007, classified China as a currency manipulator in violation of US trade law. A tariff boost is threatened under this bill backed by Reps. Duncan Hunter (R) of California and Tim Ryan (D) of Ohio.

Meanwhile, the Bush administration and trade advocates in both parties are scrambling to build support for so-called "fast track" authority to negotiate new agreements to expand trade.

Skeptics abound.

"We need to declare a moratorium on new trade agreements until we figure out how to do this right," says Alan Tonelson of the US Business and Industry Council, which represents companies concerned about the erosion of US manufacturing.

It remains unclear whether the advocates of a harder line on trade will gain traction. Some economists believe this will be a better year for US exports – and a narrowing in the trade deficit.

And that deficit, they say, is not in itself a sign of economic decline. But it could be unsustainable if other nations grow less willing to finance that deficit by lending to the US.

"The real key is to take advantage of our educational system to acquire higher-value skills" and the jobs that go with them, says Paul Kasriel, an economist at the Northern Trust Co. in Chicago.

White House Cuts Attachment To Pork Spending (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

The Bush administration no longer will be bound by most congressional pork-barrel spending requests, the director of the White House's Office of Management and Budget said yesterday in a memo on how federal departments and agencies should treat money in the new spending bill the president signed into law.

Some Republicans hailed it as a giant turnaround, while Democrats said they already had taken steps to restrict pork spending this year.

More than 95 percent of pork-spending requests, known as earmarks, are never enacted as laws, but rather are written into reports that do not have the force of law. For years, most departments and agencies have honored the requests anyway, fearing that otherwise their funding would be cut the next year.

OMB Director Rob Portman's memo says the Bush administration will feel free to ignore those requests.

"In short, funding decisions should be based on the merits, in accordance with the law," Mr. Portman said.

Earlier in the day, President Bush signed a $463.5 billion spending bill to fund the government through the end of fiscal 2007, taking care of the appropriations measures left unfinished by the Republican-controlled Congress last year.

In that bill, Democrats swore off most earmarks, part of a moratorium while they consider rules to bring transparency to spending. But Mr. Bush said after signing the bill that Congress still had to do more against earmarks.

"As the Congress takes up the 2008 budget, it should continue to take steps to improve transparency for all earmarks, provide the option of an up-or-down vote for each earmark, and reduce the number and cost of earmarks by at least half," he said.

The Energy Department and other federal agencies have reported that lawmakers, both Republicans and Democrats, are still placing calls to demand privately that their pet projects be funded.

Republicans said the memo yesterday short-circuits that.

"The president handed American taxpayers a huge victory today by stopping all of the backdoor earmarks Congress requests hidden in reports and through secret e-mails and phone calls," said Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican, who for the past year has pleaded with Mr. Bush to take this step.

Earmarks have jumped from obscurity to become a hot topic on Capitol Hill, thanks to projects such as the $223 million so-called "Bridge to Nowhere," which was backed by Alaska's Republican lawmakers but was scuttled after public outcry.

Fiscal conservatives acknowledge that eliminating earmarks does not necessarily save any money, but they argue it allows the government to spend the money on the right projects.

"Federal agencies can now use these funds to advance their core missions and serve true national priorities," Mr. DeMint said.

Democrats said Mr. Portman's memo followed through on their own wishes to put a moratorium on earmarks this year, which they wrote into the spending bill.

"He's just doing what we told him," said a House Democratic aide.

If the Big Six Want to Talk About CO2 Emissions, California Will Listen

In response to your Feb. 6 editorial "Legal Hot Air":

The world's six largest automakers are crying foul about a recent case filed by California seeking redress for CO2-induced damage. They argue that courts are not the proper place for this kind of "global" issue. This sudden aversion to litigation is perplexing, given that these same companies have sued states repeatedly, in numerous jurisdictions, insisting that the courts must overturn all state laws dealing with greenhouse gas emissions. The companies hew to this path of complete resistance despite the fact that the vast majority of climate scientists believe that the world is facing a potential catastrophe.

Let me be clear: I also would prefer to reach solutions outside of the courthouse. Litigation can be expensive and time consuming. That is why I asked for a meeting with each of the CEOs of the car companies to find practical solutions to global warming. If they want to sideline the lawyers and talk about solutions, I am all for it. Meantime, they shouldn't call California's lawsuit "frivolous" while maintaining so many lawsuits of their own.

California's public nuisance case is well grounded in precedent. For more than 100 years the Supreme Court has allowed states to take legal action to prevent the destruction of their air and natural resources. In a case called Georgia v. Tennessee Copper, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes -- not a man known for indulging frivolous claims -- wrote, "It is a fair and reasonable demand on the part of a sovereign that the air over its territory should not be polluted on a great scale . . . or threatened by the act of persons beyond its control. . . ." More recently, the Supreme Court declared, "Air pollution is, of course, one of the most notorious types of public nuisance in modern experience."

The Big Six automakers generate 20% of all of the human-made carbon dioxide emissions in the U.S., and at least 30% of such emissions in California. Yet they oppose any federal action to curtail greenhouse gases. To date, their intense lobbying has been very successful: Congress has not improved fuel efficiency standards in 15 years, President Bush steadfastly refuses to consider caps on greenhouse gases, and the Environmental Protection Agency says that the Clean Air Act does not apply to CO2.

Meanwhile, California, with more than one thousand miles of coastline and a Sierra snow pack containing one third of the state's annual water supply, faces rising sea levels and rapidly melting snow. This threatens levees, flood control systems and California's irrigated agriculture. Already, spring snow melt occurs a week earlier, with greater flooding, than it did 30 years ago. The U.N. Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change just warned us again that the threats from global warming are mounting. It is time to act.

Under our tripartite system of government, courts have an essential role to play, even in issues as complex as global warming. Justice Holmes could be speaking directly to the automakers, when he wrote: "This is a suit by a state for an injury to it in its capacity of quasi-sovereign. In that capacity the state has an interest independent of . . . its citizens, in all the earth and air within its domain. It has the last word as to whether its mountains shall be stripped of their forests and its inhabitants shall breathe pure air." And, we can add, whether emissions of greenhouse gases can harm its economy and environment.

Global warming is a serious, unavoidable challenge and we need to face it. The path of litigation, first taken up by the auto companies, is not my preference. But a legal cease fire requires that both sides lay down their arms. We should use our considerable joint resources to help fashion a common sense and practical approach. I stand ready to do so.

Required Health Plans Ethically Impossible

We read of health-care plan after plan that in some manner "require" all people to purchase health insurance ("The Budget and Your Wallet -- How Plans to Expand Health Coverage Could Affect Insured," Personal Journal, Feb. 6). Exactly what are we to do with the person who doesn't purchase health insurance (thus, breaking the law), and then who shows up at the door of the ER with chest pains?

Until we are willing to let people die on the steps of the hospital, an approach that I don't support, any law "requiring" the purchase of coverage, without active enforcement and without penalties for non-compliance, will quickly be written off by the uncovered masses as a law without teeth. "Requiring" coverage is just a feel-good phrase.

Gutter Snipes or Savvy Businessmen?

Friday's piece on strippers and Super Bowl Sunday ("Wardrobe Malfunctions, Inc.," Weekend Journal, Feb. 2) was certainly funny, but the sound of my own chuckles had the fortunate effect of bringing me to my senses. I remembered how our popular culture continues to slide into the gutter without much of a splash or any apparent resistance from those who know better.

Who but a sanctimonious prude would question another man's decision to amuse his friends at half time by paying a stranger to remove her clothing right there in the den among the nachos, chicken wings and Little League trophies? To call it sleazy or dishonorable seems too harsh and uncomfortably judgmental.

And that's my point. Hiring a stripper is sleazy and dishonorable, but I get the sense that, by an unspoken rule among us men, we're all supposed to keep our mouths shut about it and just have a few laughs. The tone of this story, even its publication, suggests that the Journal has, on some level, adopted that unspoken rule. We should all know better. Why not some dissent for a change?

Sam Walker wrote a really terrific article. I administer a class at the University of Arizona designed to encourage science students to become entrepreneurs, and only days ago did we discuss supply-chain management and distribution. When I read this piece, I was delighted how he exposed the business side of this industry and articulated the need for superb supply-chain management and customer-needs analysis to sustain and grow these businesses. The article reinforced a guiding principle I emphasize in my class: The fundamentals of operation, sustainability, growth and expansion of any business are universal across industry lines. The distribution techniques that bring triumph to the "exotic dancing" industry can also bring success in biotechnology and optics. The article serves as a great case study. You can learn a lot from any victorious business, and I hope my students got this message from the piece as much as I did.

What Mean Means

Dr. Robert Myers, in his Feb. 1 Letter to the Editor responding to Charles Murray's three-part editorial-page series "On Education," compounds Mr. Murray's original error regarding definitions of mathematical mean vs. mathematical median. Mr. Murray stated that half of all children in the U.S. are below average intelligence; Dr. Myers stated that Mr. Murray should have written below the mean, not the average.

The mean and the average are the same thing. What both authors should have said is median. The median, by definition, is the value below which exactly half of the sample points fall. Though for many common statistical distributions the mean, a.k.a. average, and the median are close, sometimes equal, they are not necessarily so.

Senator Seeks to Focus The War on al Qaeda

Kimberley A. Strassel's Feb. 2 Potomac Watch column "Senator Feingold's Sin" was right to single out the senator's "honesty" and "backbone" for his effort to require that U.S. troops be redeployed from Iraq. But to say that "the Wisconsin pacifist might not understand the importance of winning in Iraq" misunderstands Sen. Feingold and his effort, which is based on strengthening U.S. national security above all else.

The senator called for redeploying our troops from Iraq because our massive, indefinite presence there is weakening our ability to fight the terrorist networks that threaten this country around the world. He voted to go to war in Afghanistan precisely because he wanted U.S. forces to eliminate the Taliban and destroy a safe haven for terrorist networks that threaten our country.

As your editorial noted, Congress has the power to end a war. Sen. Feingold wants Congress to use that power to end U.S. involvement in this disastrous war in Iraq, so that we can fight al Qaeda and other global threats more aggressively and effectively. That doesn't sound like a pacifist, does it?

Hail To The Presidents' Pastry Chef (USAT)

By Jayne Clark

USA Today, February 16, 2007

BETHESDA, Md. — Roland Mesnier, the French pastry chef who for a quarter of a century whipped up confections fit for presidents, is, at the moment, fixated on kings. Of the dessert variety, that is.

"Look at this galette. The glace!" he exclaims, jabbing a finger at the display case in a suburban Washington bakery. "This is French king cake. Not the New Orleans kind, which is awful — dry bread with colored sugar. And those beads! I had a friend who sent some to the White House. The staff wouldn't even eat it."

Not that they needed to, what with Mesnier churning out desserts to die for from the Carter administration right into George W. Bush's second term.

"I'm one of the few chefs who has left the White House with a good taste in my mouth," he says, making his way past racks of cookies and tarts to a corner table.

Indeed, of the six executive chefs who served during Mesnier's tenure, three were let go, he says. He retired in 2004 but has returned for brief stints since.

His new book, All the Presidents' Pastries: Twenty-Five Years in the White House (Flammarion, $24.95), out in time for Presidents Day, is peppered with reminiscences and insights from those years, plus recipes for presidential favorites such as pecan bourbon pie (Jimmy Carter) and quick chocolate mousse (Ronald Reagan).

Charming and expansive both in personality and girth, Mesnier clearly doesn't deprive himself of his own creations. And as a chef he has some strong opinions on the state of food in America.

"I eat on the road constantly, and I know what's out there. And it's not pretty," he says.

But first, some White House dish.

•Most exacting first lady: Nancy Reagan. "She ran the house with an iron fist. Nothing was done in the White House foodwise — tablecloths, flowers, entertainment — without her knowledge. But I love that. It's because of Mrs. Reagan that I succeeded the way I did."

•Most unappetizing dessert he ever had to prepare: a Clinton family favorite featuring Coca-Cola jelly. "I don't discuss it. I didn't even taste it."

•Most demanding White House guests: former French president François Mitterrand and his wife, Danielle. "They thought they were royalty. That's why they went so well with the Reagans."

•Most taxing first family to work for: the Clintons. "They'd throw parties for 1,200, 1,500, 2,000 in tents, which we were instructed to call 'pavilions.' Physically, it killed me."

•Impressions of the first ladies: Rosalynn Carter — "Extremely gracious. The staff truly loved her." Nancy Reagan — "A perfectionist (who) wasn't big on compliments." Barbara Bush — "The ultimate first lady. She could do so many things." Hillary

Clinton — "Extremely nice. Very generous with her time." Laura Bush — "Very knowledgeable about food — one of the few first ladies who could discuss taste and texture."

Despite his French origins and European training, Mesnier believes American food is among the world's best. Sadly, however, so many top chefs these days are seeking celebrity, and they're not in their kitchens where they belong, he says.

Blame it on the Food Network.

"It's destroying cooking," Mesnier says. TV personality "Rachael Ray tells you she can create a good meal in 20 minutes. You know why? Because she has a can opener! Steal her can opener, it's over. It's impossible to make a good meal in 20 minutes."

Or, obviously, a head-turning dessert for a formal White House dinner. For state dinners, Mesnier created one-of-a-kind confections using ingredients reflective of products from the honored head of state's country.

There was the chocolate box replete with liquor-filled citrus sorbets for a dinner honoring the king of Spain; the creation for the Japanese prime minister he dubbed the Bonsai Garden of Sweet Serenity; and his final triumph, an oyster shell of white chocolate filled with a dark nougat glace "pearl" against a backdrop of chocolate seaweed for an Australia state dinner last June.

Having hung up his chef's hat, Mesnier no longer traffics in these grand indulgences. (Truth be told, he's more of an apple pie man.)

But he's still dreaming them up:

"I build desserts in my sleep."

On Presidential Coinage (NYT)

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

Perhaps the most striking thing about the new presidential coin released yesterday is that Congress has asked the United States Mint to issue one for every president from George Washington to Gerald Ford. With four new coins coming out each year, it will be hard to complain about the 2007 series, which offers a bumper crop of Founding Fathers. Washington, who appeared yesterday, will be followed by John Adams, Thomas Jefferson and James Madison.

The down side of this inclusive approach, though, is that not every year will be so glorious.

The year 2010, for example, stands out as looking particularly dispiriting. The first coin will bear the likeness of Millard Fillmore, who may be best remembered today for signing the Fugitive Slave Act into law. The next will belong to Franklin Pierce, a hard-drinking military man who was derided as the "victor of many a hard-fought bottle."

Collectors who hold out until 2014 will be rewarded with a dollar bearing the visage of Warren G. Harding. A shiny dollar may be a fit commemorative for a president whose administration is best remembered for the Teapot Dome scandal, when lots of oil money sloshed corruptly around Washington. And later that same year, there will be a coin for Herbert Hoover, who presided so unsatisfactorily over Depression-era America. For Hoover, the dollar may appear to be poignant commentary.

From there it is a short two years until Americans get their hands on the first Richard M. Nixon dollar.

The decision to make a line of presidential coins was a natural one, and once made, it would be hard to pick and choose. If you started by removing Millard Fillmore, where would you stop? But there is a real educational value in including every president. At a time when the current occupant of the White House thinks presidential powers should be expanded to new extremes, the series will be a four-times-a-year reminder that not everyone who makes it to the White House belongs on Mount Rushmore.

Mea Culpa To Bush On Presidents Day (USAT)

Our great country has had 43 presidents. Many very good. A few pretty bad. On Presidents Day next Monday, it's appropriate to commemorate them all.

I remember every president since Herbert Hoover, when I was a grade school kid. He was one of the worst. I've personally met every president since Dwight Eisenhower. He was one of the best.

A year ago I criticized Hillary Clinton for saying "this (Bush) administration will go down in history as one of the worst."

DOJ_NMG_0132883

"She's wrong," I wrote. Then I rated these five presidents, in this order, as the worst: Andrew Jackson, James Buchanan, Ulysses Grant, Hoover and Richard Nixon. "It's very unlikely Bush can crack that list," I added.

I was wrong. This is my mea culpa. Not only has Bush cracked that list, but he is planted firmly at the top.

The Iraq war, of course, has become Bush's albatross. He and his buddies are great at coining words or slogans. "Bushisms" that will haunt him historically:

•"Shock and Awe," early 2003.

•"Mission Accomplished," May 1, 2003.

•"Stay the Course," June 2003, 2004, 2005, 2006.

•"New Strategy," 2007.

Another term historians may weigh critically is "Decider."

Is he just a self-touted decider doing what he thinks right? Or is he an arrogant ruler who doesn't care or consider what the public or Congress believes best for the country?

Despite his play on words and slogans, Bush didn't learn the value or meaning of mea culpa (acknowledgement of an error) during his years at Yale.

Bush admitting his many mistakes on Iraq and ending that fiasco might make many of us forgive, even though we can never forget the terrible toll in lives and dollars.

A Dog's Breakfast (WSJ)

By Daniel L. Mcfadden

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

Last year, Medicare underwent a major expansion with the addition of Part D prescription drug coverage. A controversial feature of this new program was its organization as a market in which consumers could choose among various plans offered competitively by different insurers and HMOs, rather than the single-payer, single-product model used elsewhere in the Medicare system. Proponents of this design touted the choices it would offer consumers, and the benefits of competition for product quality and cost; opponents objected that consumers would be overwhelmed by the complexity of the market, and that it was unnecessarily generous to pharmaceutical and insurance companies.

Part D is a massive social experiment on the ability of a privatized market to deliver social services effectively. With the support of the National Institute on Aging, my research group has monitored consumer choices and outcomes from the new Part D market. I will summarize our findings, but first I want to provide some perspective on the American health-care system and the questions that study of Part D may help answer.

Most Americans are aware that our health-care system is in deep trouble, a dog's breakfast of private providers and insurers that has weak and inconsistent incentives for quality control and cost containment. Many consumers cannot obtain health insurance at reasonable cost, and financing the system is stressing employers, pension funds, and the government's Medicare and Medicaid programs.

In terms of health delivered per dollar of cost, our system is grotesquely inefficient. We spend $6,102 per person on health care each year, nearly 17% of GDP. Our neighbor Canada's single-payer system costs $3,165 per person per year, about half our expenditure, or 10% of their GDP. The Canadian costs and health outcomes are typical of developed countries, where government managed and financed systems predominate. The extra cost of our system is not buying us better health. The probability of dying between ages 15 and 60, a good indicator of failure of a health-care system to prevent and treat disease, is 8.1% for females in the U.S.; in Canada, the same probability is 5.7%.

In the future, things are going to get much worse. If current trends continue, health care in the U.S. as a proportion of GDP will rise to 40% by 2050, a level that will break the current system of financing health through employers, pension funds and Medicare/Medicaid.

There are a number of reasons for this gathering storm. First, the U.S. population is getting older, and the old require more medical maintenance. Second, we are getting wealthier, and staying alive is the ultimate luxury good. Third, we demand expensive medical innovations, such as dialysis, MRIs, transplants, stents and biotech. About a third of all medical costs are incurred in the last year of life, and are at best marginally effective. The incentives in the system do not force hard choices.

To deal with this future, three substantial reforms are needed. First, we need to wring out some of the inefficiencies. Something like 30% of our health costs come from administrative overhead, legal costs and defensive medicine. These could be largely eliminated in a comprehensive reform; we just need to emulate best practice in other developed countries.

Second, we need universal health insurance coverage, with active emphasis on preventive medicine that is effective in reducing later medical events and costs. Perhaps this can be accomplished by cobbling together existing sources of finance, as in Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's current proposal for California. However, eventually we will have to go to a system that is not channeled through employers, something like a tax-financed medical voucher system.

Third, we need incentives that match choice of expensive treatments with consumers' willingness to pay for them, a benefit-cost analysis that places treatment choices and financial responsibility on the individual.

This brings us to Medicare Part D. This experiment in privatizing the prescription drug insurance market and the interface between insurers and consumers gives the individual the right, and responsibility, to make insurance plan choices that are in his or her self-interest. If consumers are up to this task, then their choices will ensure that the plans, and insurers, that succeed in the market are ones that meet their needs. However, if many are confused or confounded, the market will not get the signals it needs to work satisfactorily. The success or failure of the Part D market is a bellwether for proposals to spread consumer-directed health care across the system, putting health and financial choices in the hands of consumers, and utilizing the forces of market competition to rationalize the system.

So, how well has the Part D market worked? We now have one year of experience, including a second open enrollment period in which consumers could switch plans, or enroll if they had not done so earlier. We can ask whether consumers were satisfied with this market, whether their choices were consistent with their interests, and whether Part D insurance has had a positive effect on health outcomes. To do this, my group is tracking about 2,200 consumers age 65 and up from opening of the initial enrollment period in mid-November 2005. We interviewed them just before enrollment began, and again just after the initial enrollment period ended on May 15, 2006. Here are some of the things we have found:

Consumers were quite confused about the Part D program before enrollment began, with 40% knowing little or nothing about what the program offered, and 17% indicating that they were unlikely to enroll. Start-up problems, widely publicized, further clouded the program's future. However, when the initial enrollment period closed, only 7.4% of the age 65-plus eligible population of 35.8 million were not enrolled in Part D or comparable prescription drug coverage. It helped that monthly premiums, predicted to be about $37, were substantially lower, averaging around $24, with some plans available for premiums as low as $6 to $10. It helped that about 68% of the population was automatically enrolled, either through employer or union based plans or through Medicaid, VA or federal employee coverage. It also helped that Part D incorporates an annual subsidy of about $1,200 per enrollee, so that most potential enrollees benefit immediately.

Failure to enroll turned out to be a minor problem, but making Part D voluntary rather than mandatory did have some consequences. About 1.2 million seniors who use enough prescription drugs so that they would immediately benefit from enrolling failed to do so. Mostly, these were not the very poor, who were picked up by Medicaid and by outreach programs, but poorly educated people above the poverty line.

General opinions elicited after the close of the initial enrollment period give Part D a mixed report card. Seventy-seven percent liked having a choice of plans, but 58% thought the program was not well designed; 77% say they would have preferred to have prescription drugs provided automatically as part of Medicare Part A; 58% are less satisfied with Medicare as a result of Part D; and large majorities dislike formulary restrictions and the gap, a range of out-of-pocket costs where the Part D standard plan offers no benefits.

However, when one looks at plan choices made, one finds that consumers were relatively consistent in recognizing their self-interest. Most consumers selected among the lowest-cost plans available in their area. Consumers with significant drug needs enrolled early, while those with no immediate needs mostly enrolled later to preserve their option value of obtaining insurance at non-penalized rates. There is some evidence that consumers did not fully appreciate the consequences of the gap, and enhanced policies that covered the gap were not heavily demanded, even though the additional coverage they offered was close to actuarially fair.

The picture that emerges is that elderly consumers were mostly able to navigate the Part D market and reach reasonable choices, despite its novelty and complexity. Two concerns with insurance markets that also arise for the Part D market are adverse selection, in which only the sickest seek insurance, and insurers respond by cherry-picking, refusing coverage for individuals and conditions likely to increase claims; and moral hazard, in which insurance coverage encourages additional treatments by reducing the incremental costs of these treatments.

Adverse selection has so far been avoided in the Part D market because the voluntary enrollment rate is high, including a high proportion of healthy seniors who currently are net contributors to the system. Further, adverse selection is not a problem for plan switchers because participating insurers must take all comers, and are reimbursed by Medicare based on each individual's experience rating. There is moral hazard in the sense that prescription drug use is increasing for seniors newly insured under part D, to 4.4 from 3.3 prescriptions on average per month, according to our survey.

This increase must be assessed in terms of its health consequences. Dana Goldman at RAND Corporation has found that making at least some drugs available to seniors at lower cost more than pays for itself in decreased incidence and cost of health problems. For example, reducing the copay on statins to $10 from $45 for a 30-day supply increased plan prescription drug payments, but the increased adherence of patients to the therapy at the lower copayment reduced cardiovascular incidents and attendant hospitalization costs, so that total annual health costs per patient in his study fell to $5,180 from $5,470.

A recent study of the VA population indicates that statins increase adult life expectancy by nearly two years, apparently because they act as anti-inflamatories as well as reducing cholesterol. Anecdotal evidence indicates that Part D coverage will reduce medical problems and hospitalization costs enough to offset a significant portion of its cost. However, reduced adherence to therapies by consumers who hit the gap will probably have a significant adverse effect on health outcomes that we will begin to see in 2007. A humorous proposal is that employers could lower their total health-care bills by putting statins and anti-hypertensives in the water cooler. What is clear is that an integrated approach is needed to evaluating health-care costs, and programs like Part D that can deliver effective preventative drugs may pay for themselves.

My overall conclusion is that, so far, the Part D program has succeeded in getting affordable prescription drugs to the senior population. Its privatized structure has not been a significant impediment to delivery of these services. Competition among insurers seems to have been effective in keeping a lid on costs, and assuring reasonable quality control. We do not have an experiment in which we can determine whether a single-product system could have done as well, or better, along these dimensions, but I think it is reasonable to say that the Part D market has performed as well as its partisans hoped, and far better than its detractors expected.

Does this mean that Part D proves that privatization will be effective in other segments of the health-care market? Here, I think caution is advised. First, the success of Part D depends substantially on thoughtful and muscular management of the market. The former head of Medicare, Mark McClellan, and a dynamic, no-nonsense 75-year-old government bureaucrat, Abby Block, bullied insurers to make sure there were, in her words, "no bad choices." It is unclear whether their successors will be as successful in standing toe-to-toe with the industry and making sure consumers' interests are protected.

A health insurance market like Part D probably requires this level of active management to work well; after-the-fact oversight in the style of the SEC or FTC is inadequate. If privatization is going to work elsewhere in health care, active market management will be needed.

Finally, consumer-directed health care works only if consumers can understand the consequences of their choices. In much of medicine, providers are the agents that guide consumers through these choices. If consumer-directed health care is to be effective, these providers must give sound advice on both the health and financial consequences of alternative choices. This is possible if the incentives to providers and consumers are right, but the design of such markets should not be left to chance.

Economy May Be Doing Better, Fed Chief Says (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Thursday the economy may be performing better than is currently estimated and said an increase in inflationary pressures would warrant higher interest rates.

"We've seen some strong income growth, which suggests that the economy may be stronger than we think," Bernanke told the House Financial Services Committee on the second day of his twice-yearly testimony on the economy.

"On inflation, we have had a period where inflation has been above where we'd like to see it," he said, responding to committee Chairman Barney Frank, D-Mass., who questioned why the Fed has continued to say it is more concerned about inflation than slower growth. Frank noted the Fed has said inflation and the economy are moderating, trends that suggest a rate cut was more likely than a rate increase.

But Bernanke said the Fed wasn't ready to declare victory against inflation.

"In order for this expansion to continue in a sustainable way, inflation needs to be well controlled," Bernanke said. "If inflation becomes higher for some reason, then the Federal Reserve would have to respond to that by raising interest rates."

Regarding proposals to raise the federal minimum wage, Bernanke said the move would likely mean some people would lose their jobs, but the numbers would likely not be "very significant" in terms of the effect on the broad economy.

The Fed has kept interest rates unchanged for five consecutive meetings after raising them 17 times from June 2004 to June 2006. The current target for short-term interest rates, which influences borrowing costs economywide, is 5.25%, the highest in six years.

Many economists expect the Fed will hold interest rates steady for most of 2007. According to a USA TODAY poll of 56 economists conducted Jan. 18-24, the Fed will likely change rates only once this year, with a cut coming in the fourth quarter.

Some economic news out Thursday pointed to some softening in the economy, supporting a steady interest rate environment. The Fed said industrial production fell 0.5% in January, led by a sharp drop in activity at automobile plants. The decline followed a 0.5% increase in December and was the biggest drop since September 2005, when production was stymied by cleanup efforts following Hurricane Katrina.

Bernanke Rebuffs Frank On Rate Cut (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke yesterday rejected a Democratic lawmaker's suggestion that he consider cutting interest rates to bolster the economy.

Bernanke, testifying for a second day on Capitol Hill, this time before the House Financial Services Committee, repeated that the Fed is likely to hold rates steady for a while if slower economic growth nudges inflation lower this year and next as expected.

But the Fed also thinks inflation is too high and might go higher, Bernanke said. If he and his colleagues adjust borrowing costs in coming months, they are more likely to raise rates than lower them.

"In order for this expansion to continue in a sustainable way, inflation needs to be well controlled," Bernanke said in response to remarks by committee Chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.). "If inflation becomes higher for some reason, then the Federal Reserve would have to respond to that by raising interest rates."

Frank had told Bernanke the Fed's stance was "troubling" to him because the central bank also forecasts the economy will grow at a moderate rate this year, below its long-term average, and that inflation will drift lower over time.

"I don't see how we get a concern of inflation," Frank told Bernanke. "Why is there not at least an equal chance for there to be a reduction" in interest rates?

Bernanke responded that he and his Fed colleagues see several risks that the economy may not behave as forecast, and they would adjust interest rates as needed.

One possibility is that the economy weakens more than expected, perhaps if the housing slump deepens. Many private analysts have recently lowered their estimates of the economy's pace of growth because of a series of weak figures, including the Fed's report yesterday that U.S. industrial production fell in January.

But the Fed sees a greater risk of high inflation. Bernanke noted recent strong growth in consumer spending and incomes, "which suggests that the economy may be stronger than we think. It's possible."

If so, consumer demand might rise faster than the economy's ability to produce goods and services, he said. Already, the labor market is tight, with unemployment at a low 4.6 percent, and businesses' use of their production capacity is slightly above average, according to the Fed report.

The inflation risk lies in this danger of excessive demand, not in low unemployment alone, the Fed chairman said.

There is no specific level of unemployment that automatically triggers inflation, Bernanke, a former chairman of the Princeton University economics department, said in response to several lawmakers' questions.

That contrasts with the traditional view of many economists that unemployment below about 5 percent is inflationary. Bernanke's remarks partly reflect years of research that has debunked the idea of a long-term trade-off between unemployment and inflation. They also reflect the nation's experience in the late 1990s, when unemployment fell as low as 3.9 percent without causing much inflation.

The Fed's top policymakers forecast inflation to fall over the next 18 months while unemployment remains below 5 percent, indicating they are comfortable with joblessness so low.

Bernanke also said rising wages are not necessarily inflationary, as was widely believed in the 1970s when high inflation was blamed partly on unions' salary demands.

If businesses accept smaller profits -- they have been high lately -- companies can raise workers' wages without boosting prices, he said. Also, if labor productivity, or output per hour, rises quickly, businesses can produce more with the same labor force; again, workers' earnings can climb without pushing prices higher.

The low unemployment of the 1990s coincided with a takeoff in productivity growth. Bernanke's predecessor, Alan Greenspan, recognized this at the time and did not increase interest rates, despite the urgings of the Fed staff and some Fed Board members. The high inflation of the 1970s coincided with lousy productivity growth.

Productivity growth has slowed recently, but it remained solid at 2.1 percent last year. And Bernanke said "underlying productivity trends appear favorable."

Even so, he said, it is possible that strong economic growth "could allow firms to pass higher labor costs through to prices, adding to inflation," and that would erode the purchasing power of any wage gains.

Fed Suggests It Is Loosening Employment-Inflation Link (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

Federal Reserve officials appear to believe unemployment can go lower than they previously thought without generating inflation, a potentially important shift that some economists think could make interest-rate increases this year less likely.

The monetary-policy report that Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke delivered to Congress this week indicated that members of the policy-setting Federal Open Market Committee now expect a lower unemployment rate this year than they did just seven months ago, but they don't expect that to result in higher inflation.

Reduced inflation concerns at the Fed and weaker economic data, such as a drop in January industrial production reported yesterday, have led financial markets to boost expectations the Fed will lower its short-term interest-rate target, now 5.25%, later this year.

FOMC members generally expect the unemployment rate to end both this year and next between 4.5% and 4.75%, essentially unchanged from January's 4.6%. By contrast, July's monetary-policy report saw the unemployment rate ending 2007 between 4.75% and 5%. That report didn't have a 2008 forecast.

Despite forecasting lower unemployment, FOMC members didn't change their inflation expectations. They see core inflation, which excludes food and energy, as measured by the Commerce Department's price index of personal consumption, ending this year between 2% and 2.25% -- the same forecast as July -- and next year falling further, to between 1.75% and 2%. That shift probably reflects the fact that actual unemployment has fallen further than expected last July while inflation has also been a bit lower than expected, though not as low as officials would like.

Unemployment generally can't fall to zero even in a robust economy, as different industries are always contracting and expanding, or because personal characteristics such as disability make it hard for some people to find work. Fed officials, like most economists, believe economic growth that pushes joblessness too low can result in companies raising wages to attract scarce workers beyond the productivity of those workers, then passing on the higher wage costs in higher prices.

Mr. Bernanke told Congress that putting a number on this "nonaccelerating inflation rate of unemployment" -- or Nairu -- is difficult: "There's no specific level of employment or unemployment that is a trigger for inflation."

Moreover, FOMC forecasts must be interpreted with caution because they are a range of committee members' views rather than a single, coherent view.

Still, there are two possible explanations for the new numbers. One is that Fed officials have lowered their estimate of Nairu, perhaps to 4.5% from 5%, said Jan Hatzius, chief U.S. economist at Goldman Sachs. If so, the Fed would have "a lower hurdle to easing, and a higher hurdle to tightening" monetary policy.

The other explanation is their estimate of Nairu is unchanged, but the Fed believes lower energy prices and slower rent increases are affecting core inflation more than low unemployment. If that is the case, the Fed might worry that persistent low unemployment could yet push up inflation once those restraining factors subside.

Peter Hooper, chief economist at Deutsche Bank Securities, noted that Mr. Bernanke's testimony to Congress this week belied more concern about the unemployment rate than the FOMC forecast. His warning that high "resource utilization" could nudge up inflation suggests he would like to see unemployment edge higher, Mr. Hooper said.

Mr. Hatzius speculated that the forecasts, if not signaling a lower Nairu, might instead signal "a repudiation of the Nairu story that you need to generate more unemployment to contain inflation."

Indeed, while Fed economists still believe in the Nairu, they have recently come to believe its influence on inflation has declined, while the influence of the public's expectations of inflation -- governed heavily by where inflation has been -- has grown. But while it may take longer for low unemployment to push up inflation, once it did, it would be far harder to get inflation down again. That could keep the Fed biased to raising rates as long as unemployment is low.

New data suggest that some of the pressure on capacity is starting to ease. The Fed reported yesterday that output by factories, mines and utilities fell 0.5% in January from December, due mostly to a drop in factory production. With demand from consumers holding up, the output drop appears largely due to efforts by housing, motor vehicle and other industries to reduce inventories. Because of lower production, industry operated at 81.2% of available capacity in January, down from 81.8% in December.

Separately, the Labor Department said the number of people filing initial jobless claims rose by 44,000 last week to 357,000. That could be a sign that unemployment may be headed higher, though cold weather likely played a role in the jump.

Bernanke's Style Builds Political Capital (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Washington

Financial Times, February 16, 2007

Ben Bernanke's political stock is rising – a development that could help him push through the changes he wants to make at the Federal Reserve, including the adoption of a flexible inflation target.

At Thursday's hearing of the House financial services committee, Barney Frank, the Democratic chairman who raised eyebrows this year by pledging more robust oversight of the Fed, declared himself pleased with Mr Bernanke.

"You have, I think, over the past months in particular, said some very reason-able things from my standpoint." Apologising in jest to reporters present, Mr Frank added: "I have less to complain about than they might have hoped."

A day earlier in the Senate, Mr Bernanke was lavished with praise from all sides of the political spectrum for engineering a soft landing for the US economy.

Chris Dodd, the Democratic chairman of the Senate banking committee, said: "Following in the footsteps of a very successful chairman can be difficult. But I believe you have done a very good job."

Richard Shelby, the senior Republican on the Senate committee, said: "The Federal Reserve's conduct of monetary policy thus far has given me further reason to applaud your service."

Mr Bernanke even drew favourable comment from unorthodox quarters, including Jim Bunning, the maverick Republican senator.

Several common themes have emerged from the hearings. First, Mr Bernanke's decision to halt rate rises in the summer of 2006 has earned him political capital as a Fed chairman who considers seriously the dual mandate to put equal weight on employment and inflation, and not inflict harm lightly on the real economy.

Mr Bunning, who opposed Mr Bernanke's confirmation, said: "The Federal Open Market Committee did the right thing by stopping the increases in the Fed funds rates after the June 2006 Fed meeting. By holding rates constant, you have done the right thing ever since."

Second, his modest, plain-speaking manner, which stands in sharp contrast to that of Alan Greenspan, the previous chairman, is going down well with Congress.

Melvin Watt, a Democratic congressman, said: "I happened to like your predecessor. Problem was I didn't understand a damned thing he ever said – so you are a breath of fresh air."

Third, Mr Bernanke is showing a surprising degree of political savvy, positioning himself shrewdly in the debates of the moment, which hinge on inequality and middle-class economic anxiety, and moving to meet a desire for greater public accountability at the Fed.

All this could help Mr Bernanke change the way the Fed operates, above all the adoption of a flexible inflation target with a specified inflation goal but one that would not be achieved over a fixed timeframe. Conventional wisdom has it that the Democratic victory last November and the broader mood of economic populism in the air make this an uphill struggle.

Most Fed-watchers believe Mr Bernanke will not ultimately risk being seen to elevate price stability above employment in violation of the dual mandate. In the worst-case scenario, that could trigger a backlash in Congress against the Fed and the forced imposition of a matching employment target.

However, Mr Bernanke's reputation as a chairman who pays careful attention to the real economy lends credibility to his contention that a flexible inflation target would be consistent with the dual mandate.

Moreover, he is moving to position an inflation target as a means of enabling the public and elected officials to monitor Fed performance more effectively.

Mr Frank signalled that he remained cautious on an inflation target, saying: "I admire the desire for transparency" but expressing concern it could tilt the balance of the dual mandate.

With many old Fed hands, including Don Kohn, the vice-chairman, still very cautious about an inflation target too, adopting one still looks challenging. But not as far beyond the Fed chairman's reach as it appeared only a few months ago.

Realtors Expect Home Price Recovery After A Nasty Q4 (USAT)

By Christine Dugas

USA Today, February 16, 2007

Home prices are likely to spring back in the coming months, the National Association of Realtors predicted Thursday after reporting that median prices fell in 73 metro areas in the final three months of 2006.

Last year "was the year of contraction," said David Lereah, the NAR's chief economist. "When we get the figures for this spring, I expect to see a discernible improvement in both sales and prices."

Even in an overall sluggish fourth quarter, 71 areas had price gains, the NAR said. And 14 of those areas saw double-digit year-over-year percentage gains.

"At least the bottom appears to have already occurred," says Lawrence Yun, an NAR economist. "It looks like the figures will be improving. Whether or not that will be sustainable is a different question."

Nationwide, the median sales price for an existing single-family home fell to $219,300 in the fourth quarter, down 2.7% from the same period in 2005.

Several once-sizzling markets in Florida continued to see price declines. The Sarasota-Bradenton-Venice area was worst hit; prices fell 18% in the fourth quarter.

Still, the NAR pointed out that despite the recent downturn in prices, gains for typical single-family homes the past five years have been robust in many metro areas — and explosive in others. In Riverside-San Bernardino-Ontario, Calif., for example, prices have soared 155.3% in the past five years.

Other parts of California have yet to benefit. In the inland areas, many builders who are struggling to move new-home inventory have caused prices to fall sharply, says Leslie Appleton-Young, chief economist of the California Association of Realtors.

Such price drops, though, are starting to lure buyers, a trend that could help lift the overall housing market. "Buyers are responding to seller pricing and incentives, and there's pent-up demand as a result of buyer hesitation in the second half of 2006," says Pat Vredevoogd Combs, the NAR's president.

Among the areas that reported the biggest gains at the end of last year was Atlantic City, which saw a 25.9% jump in home prices in the fourth quarter, compared with the same period in 2005. And Trenton-Ewing, N.J., enjoyed an 18.9% rise in prices. It could post even better results this year.

"Interest rates remain extremely reasonable, and the buyers are out there and they're buying; they're not just shopping," says Rosalie Daniels, broker-owner of RE/Max TriCounty in Hamilton Township, on the outskirts of Trenton. Written contracts for home sales in January 2007, Daniels says, are 35% ahead of the pace of January 2006.

Low mortgage rates should also help boost sales. The average 30-year fixed rate for 2006 was 6.40%; it's now 6.30%, Freddie Mac said Thursday.

Blue Chips Hit Fresh Record; Pace Of Rally Begins To Slow (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

The pace of the stock rally slowed, but solid rises in shares of Caterpillar and Boeing were enough to spur the Dow Jones Industrial Average to a third straight gain and another record finish.

The blue-chip Dow industrials rose 23.15 points, or 0.18%, to 12765.01, its 29th closing high since early October. So far this year, the industrial average has gained 2.4%.

Boeing shares jumped 2%, helped by the aircraft maker's announcement of an order from United Parcel Service for 27 cargo planes. Caterpillar shares rose 2.2% after the equipment maker said it plans to repurchase $7.5 billion of its stock within the next five years. Both companies are Dow components.

Share buybacks, which increase the relative value of shares remaining in the market, have become more common in recent years amid a surge in profits that has left many companies flush with cash. Those war chests also are funding increased corporate deal making.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index inched up 0.1%, or 1.51 points, to 1456.81, up 2.7% on the year and some 70 points from its record set in March 2000. The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 0.35%, or 8.72 points, to end at 2497.10, up 3.4% on the year. The Nasdaq would have to more than double to reach its record, also set in March 2000.

Federal Reserve Chairman Benjamin Bernanke spoke to the House Financial Services Committee, on the heels of Senate testimony Wednesday that fueled that day's stock gains. His remarks offered few new specifics about Fed policy. Investor confidence that inflation is under control -- a key point in Mr. Bernanke's testimony Wednesday -- seemed to solidify.

The yield on 10-year Treasury notes fell to 4.706%, slightly below where it began the year. The price of Treasurys tends to rise, pushing yields down, when investors aren't jittery about inflation and the possibility of interest-rate increases.

Economist James Glassman of J.P. Morgan Chase said economic data have been pointing toward a reduced need for the Fed to raise its interest-rate targets to fight inflation for some time.

He said Mr. Bernanke is better able to convey that message in his detailed, semiannual congressional testimony than in the comparatively terse policy statements investors pore over after the Fed's regular policy meetings.

"What Bernanke said this week is an extension of the Fed's story that we heard over the summer," when the central bank decided to halt a long series of rate increases and hold steady, Mr. Glassman said. "People had just lost sight of it, to a certain extent."

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks gained1 and bond prices rose2. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.45 billion shares. The 10-year note gained 6/32 point, or $1.875 for each $1,000 invested.

The dollar weakened3. The dollar fell to 119.22 yen from 120.74 yen. The euro rose to $1.3145, compared with $1.3006.

Va. Bar Could Reverse Limits On Firms Hiring Legislators (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

RICHMOND -- The organization charged with regulating Virginia attorneys is pushing to erase an ethics rule that for a half-century has prohibited the state's legislators from being employed alongside lobbyists at the commonwealth's largest law firms.

The change, proposed by the Virginia State Bar's standing committee on legal ethics, could spark a bidding war among Richmond's leading law firms, which would be free to hire the speaker of the House of Delegates or the Senate floor leader even as their lobbyists prowl the halls of the General Assembly.

That has outraged some in the legislature, who say the move would create dangerous conflicts of interest for the lawmakers and the lobbyists. And they say it adds to a perception that the General Assembly is a good old boys' club where deals are cut behind closed doors instead of in public committee rooms.

"Crossing that line threatens the integrity of the General Assembly," said Clarke N. Hogan (R-Charlotte). "There are all kinds of unpleasant, undesirable effects. This will undermine public trust. I don't think you can do that."

Virginia's existing rule is stronger than in many states, where sitting lawmakers and lobbyists are often allowed to work in the same law firm, according to state bar officials. Arizona, Illinois, Washington and New Hampshire permit the practice, officials said. At least nine other bar associations prohibit firms from having both lobbyists and sitting lawmakers. Maryland does not have any such prohibition, but the state imposes certain restrictions on lawmakers who work for firms with lobbying arms.

Pressure to eliminate the rule in Virginia was sparked in part by Sen. R. Creigh Deeds (D-Bath), who recently joined the law firm of Hirschler Fleischer P.C., a Richmond-based firm with a small lobbying presence. Without the proposed change, Deeds would be violating state ethics rules.

Deeds, who describes himself as a small-town rural lawyer, said his losing bid for attorney general in 2005 made it nearly impossible to keep his small practice alive. His plans to run for governor in 2009 will require a more stable income, he said. But he said there will be a firewall between himself and the firm's lobbyists.

"For me to be able to continue the political journey, I had to find some stability. I had to do something," Deeds said in an interview this week. "If I thought I were doing anything unethical, I would step away from it."

Deeds and other advocates of the rule change, including the chief ethics counsel for the bar, say the long-standing rule needlessly restricts the activities of law firms and lawmakers. They say lobbyists and sitting legislators can coexist at firms as long as they adhere to existing state laws governing conflict of interest.

Those laws require lawmakers to recuse themselves from votes or discussions involving lobbyists with whom they have a professional relationship.

"Lawyers have a contribution to make and ought not to be disenfranchised from public service by a bright line rule that assumes [a conflict], without any evidence, because of my partner in an 800-lawyer law firm," said James M. McCauley, the bar's ethics counsel.

Legal Ethics Opinion 1829, which McCauley's committee made public Jan. 23, states that any legislator should simply "be careful to avoid using his public position for improper special advantage for clients, and the other members of the firm must be careful to avoid suggesting that they have special influence for clients through the legislative service of their firm member."

McCauley said the bar is seeking public comment on the rule change and could back off if the response is uniformly negative. But his organization has already begun advising law firms that they can hire sitting lawmakers even if they have lobbyists who engage in activity in Richmond's capital.

In a Feb. 6 letter, assistant ethics counsel Leslie A.T. Haley wrote to a senior partner at Deeds' firm, advising him to refer to the proposed rule.

"The analysis in LEO 1829 . . . seem to provide the guidance you need," Haley wrote to James L. Weinberg. "Please review the referenced opinions for guidance on this issue."

Deeds said he joined the firm in October with the understanding that a request would be made to the state bar about the rule. But he said he expects no difference in his approach toward conflicts or other ethical issues that might arise.

"You have to avoid the appearance of impropriety anyway," Deeds said. "The burden is always on the individual. Either he is ethical or he is not."

But that's exactly what worries ethics experts and some Virginia lawmakers.

Leah Rush, a state legal specialist with the Center for Public Integrity, said the Virginia Bar's existing rule about lawmakers and lobbyists is an admirable one that goes beyond what other states have done.

"It makes sense and it's very admirable that the state bar would try to promote a clear separation of duties to clearly avoid conflicts of interest," she said. "Rolling back any provisions that have been in place kind of raises the red flag."

Sen. Thomas K. Norment Jr. (R-James City), a lawyer whose firm does not lobby the General Assembly in part because of his presence, said he opposes the bar's efforts to change the rule.

"I absolutely would oppose it unequivocally," Norment said. "I hate to be trite, but this is a slippery slope with olive oil on it."

Hogan and other lawmakers raised the possibility of legislation to block the change if it goes into effect after a public comment period ends in April.

"This is very shocking," said Sen. Ken Cuccinelli II (R-Fairfax). Del. Brian J. Moran (D-Alexandria) said the change would taint all members of the legislature in both parties.

"I think they should reconsider," Moran said. "It would damage all of us in the legislature to have that potential stink or conflict."

Clinton Offers Contract To S.C. Endorser (AP)

By Susanne M. Schafer

AP, February 16, 2007

A key black Democratic leader in South Carolina has negotiated a $10,000 per month consulting contract with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign, a development that came to light when the lawmaker endorsed the presidential hopeful.

The contract with state Sen. Darrell Jackson's firm, Sunrise Enterprises, is not yet signed but will run through the first Southern primary here next January, Clinton spokesman Mo Elleithee confirmed Thursday.

Elleithee denied there was any deal made for Jackson's endorsement.

"Not at all. ... We told him, 'We'd love your support as a community leader and love your help as a respected political consultant inside the state,'" Elleithee said.

Jackson did not return messages on Thursday. He has told several media outlets that he turned down more money from other candidates.

Jackson's firm will advise Clinton's campaign on "political matters in South Carolina, outreach, organizing issues" and purchasing advertising, Elleithee said.

On Tuesday, Jackson and state Sen. Robert Ford said they would support Clinton. In 2004, both backed former Sen. John Edwards, a South Carolina native. Jackson and Ford took credit for turning out black voters for Edwards in 2004 in a state where half the primary voters are black.

Dick Harpootlian, former chair of the South Carolina Democratic Party, said endorsements carry little weight in the state.

"And if someone is a paid employee of the person they're endorsing, it should carry no weight," Harpootlian said.

Jackson has told media outlets that he doesn't draw a salary but drives a company car.

Elleithee said Jackson, also pastor of the Bible Way Church in Columbia, has had a long-term relationship with Clinton and her husband, former President Clinton, whom Jackson backed in 1992.

"When Senator Clinton began to put together her campaign operation, he was one of the first people we called in South Carolina," he said.

Obama's Southern Support Not A Cinch (CHIT)

By Dahleen Glanton

Chicago Tribune, February 16, 2007

COLUMBIA, S.C. -- As an African-American, Dean Stewart is proud that a black man has a good shot at becoming the next president of the United States.

He likes Sen. Barack Obama's style, his intellect and his compassion. In fact, Stewart said, Obama reminds him of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.

"He understands what he is up against as a black man, and he and his wife have said they are not afraid," said Stewart, 41, who owns a barbershop in Columbia.

Regardless of his admiration for Obama (D-Ill.), however, Stewart is not sure he will vote for him next year when South Carolina holds its primary election. He also likes Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.), the candidate he thinks has the best chance of winning the presidency and one he feels he has known for almost 15 years.

On Friday, Obama will travel to South Carolina for the first time in more than two years. While the rest of the country has elevated him to celebrity status, he is likely to find his greatest challenge yet in the South, particularly among blacks. Obama is not as well known as other candidates.

Votes for Obama won't come easily here, according to political experts. The South is home to the nation's largest concentration of African Americans—one of the Democratic Party's most loyal constituencies and some of the most dedicated supporters of former President Bill Clinton.

While Democrats traditionally are overpowered in general elections in the overwhelmingly Republican region, blacks will play a major role in primary elections in states such as South Carolina, Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia. About 50 percent of voters in South Carolina's Democratic primary are black.

The Jan. 29 primary in South Carolina will be the fourth earliest contest after Iowa, Nevada and New Hampshire, which bolsters the state's role in the selection of the Democratic nominee. Among the Democratic candidates, early polls in South Carolina show Clinton with 34 percent of the vote, followed by former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina with 31 percent and Obama with 10 percent.

Black voters, in particular, have found themselves in a dilemma. Should they support Obama and possibly make history or should they support Hillary Clinton and bring back a team many feel was the most dedicated to black causes since President John Kennedy?

"In my district, people are going with Hillary," said state Sen. Robert Ford, a Democrat from Charleston. "I am sure there will be some young blacks who will be behind Obama, but elderly blacks are going with Hillary because they love Bill and they love Hillary for standing behind him for eight years."

Like many African Americans, Stewart would like to see what he considers to be a dream ticket, with Clinton as the nominee and Obama as her vice presidential running mate.

"It would be like the Super Bowl with Chicago and Indianapolis and two black coaches," said Stewart. "Either one is a winner."

Though more than 2,100 tickets for Obama's appearance Friday at the Columbia convention center flew quickly, particularly on the predominantly white campus of the University of South Carolina, he is still relatively unknown to a vast number of voters in the state. Another 1,500 tickets were distributed for a town hall meeting in Orangeburg on Saturday.

"People down here don't know him, and South Carolinians in many ways are a difficult lot," said Cole Blease Graham, a political scientist at the University of South Carolina. "They like to see their politicians up close in the flesh, shake their hand and look them in the eye.

"Blacks will determine the winner in South Carolina, and if it came down to it right now, it would be Clinton because of the lack of exposure Obama has here," said Graham. "If Obama can win some attraction from whites and overwhelming support from black voters, he can beat Clinton."

Rep. James Clyburn (D-S.C.), the House majority whip, announced this week that he would not endorse a presidential candidate. Earlier, Ford and state Sen. Darrell Jackson endorsed Clinton, saying she had the best chance of winning. The men were credited with turning out a substantial black vote for Edwards when he won the state primary in 2004.

"I considered who I thought was best able to serve right now. The day after the election, who will walk into that office and be able to serve from day one?" said Jackson, who also serves as pastor of a 10,000-member Bible Way Family Life Center in Columbia. On Thursday, the Clinton campaign confirmed that Jackson has negotiated a $10,000 per month consulting contract with Clinton, according to The Associated Press.

"Sen. Clinton brings a Rolodex of people who have served well, and a lot of it has to do with President Clinton. Most people view them as partners," said Ford. "People love Obama but they really love the Clintons."

Obama's supporters said people will love Obama too, once they get to know him.

"Sen. Obama hasn't even gotten to South Carolina yet and people are excited," said Anton Gunn, Obama's political director in South Carolina. "When he gets here and people have the opportunity to hear his message up close and personal, a lot of those who are undecided will be making up their minds."

Lachlan McIntosh, executive director of the South Carolina Democratic Party, said that while there is excitement over Obama's visit, Edwards, who was born in South Carolina, draws big crowds too. Clinton plans to visit the state next week.

"Sen. Obama is sparking the interest of a lot of people we have not seen involved in politics before, particularly young people," said McIntosh. "John Edwards has been here once this year and several times last year. We will find out Friday night whether Obama is as big as John Edwards."

While national polls suggest that race will not be a factor in Obama's bid, some analysts said it could come into play in the South.

"South Carolina is one of the most racially polarized places in the country, and black people in South Carolina have never elected a black candidate statewide," said David Bositis, senior political analyst for the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies in Washington. "There are places in the South where people don't think anybody black can be elected to anything. So when they think about the presidential election, they don't think of Obama as someone with very good prospects."

State Sen. John Drummond, who at age 87 has been in the Senate for 42 years, said he has not seen much support for Obama. Right now, he said, the race in South Carolina is between Clinton and Edwards.

"I think [Obama] will do alright, but he is about four years off," said Drummond. "A few years ago, I don't think he would have had much of any support in South Carolina, but he has earned it. He's a rather attractive guy and I can see a lot of good down the road."

Black Like Me? (WP)

By Marjorie Valbrun

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

What does it mean to be black, and who is the arbiter of authentic blackness? As Sen. Barack Obama's "blackness" has increasingly been discussed on black-oriented radio shows, at political conferences and on Sunday morning news shows, I've grown more dismayed by the day.

The discourse, occurring mostly among black people, has been dominated by questions about Obama's being biracial, his immigrant father and his suitability as a presidential candidate, given that his life story doesn't parallel that of most blacks born in the United States. Some have implied that only a black candidate whose ancestors were slaves here or who have themselves experienced the trauma of this country's racial history can truly understand what it means to be black in America and represent the political interests of black Americans.

This is a narrow-minded and divisive notion. At a time when blacks living in this country, whether by birth or by choice, should be harnessing their collective political clout to empower all black people, we're wasting time debating which of us are truly black.

As a black immigrant and a Haitian-American who has lived in the country for 37 years, I know how it feels to have my blackness challenged by native-born blacks.

It makes me angry. I'm angry for Obama, too. People are asking whether he's black enough to represent them. I ask, black enough by whose standards? Why must Obama's life follow the same track of "authentic" black folk to pass this litmus test?

Many of my black immigrant friends have also had their blackness questioned by native-born blacks who see us as "not really black." My ancestors probably weren't enslaved on American soil, but they were enslaved on Haitian soil. So how am I less black or less worthy of kinship with black Americans? How ridiculous that someone would think me unable to understand the pain of racism and the long-term costs of white supremacy and slavery.

Last Saturday, Obama's name was raised at the State of the Black Union, a gathering of some 10,000 black people in Hampton, Va., in a forum on the social and economic challenges facing black America. Top black scholars, intellectuals, civil rights leaders and opinion makers were present. Princeton professor Cornel West took Obama to task for not attending. West also criticized Obama's decision to announce his candidacy that day and to do so in front of the Illinois statehouse where Abraham Lincoln began his political career.

A thread of doubt about Obama's commitment to black America ran through some speakers' comments. Harvard law professor Charles Ogletree, who has known Obama since his time at law school, came to his defense. Ogletree noted Obama's record on civil rights and suggested his scheduling conflict was a transgression worthy of forgiveness.

So this is what things have come to: If you don't walk to the beat of the black establishment, you might get kicked out of the club. What's next? A scarlet insignia for IBMs (Inauthentic Black Men)?

We don't all have to like or vote for Obama, but we shouldn't allow this debate to undermine him or discredit his stated commitment to the black community.

When did the social and political cause of American blacks start trumping the larger cause of all blacks living in this country? American blacks don't have a monopoly on blackness or suffering. We black immigrants and children of immigrants are also often stopped by police for driving while black. Ever heard of Abner Louima or Amadou Diallo? Many immigrants feel just as powerless and as excluded from the promise of America.

Yet the hopes, dreams and successes of immigrant and American blacks are also interconnected.

Black immigrants such as myself would probably not be here if not for the sacrifices of those who were on the front lines of the civil rights movement. And that's why I identify myself as black -- not that I have a choice -- with pride and without apology. But black Americans can't on the one hand complain about black immigrants consciously separating themselves from black Americans, which many immigrants do, and on the other hand say: "But you aren't really black like us."

Few American blacks can say with certainty that they don't also have white ancestors. Does that make them less black? Who knows that some distant ancestor of Obama's father was not enslaved here? The more important question is why any of this should matter. When did having slave ancestors become a barometer for political office? Surely those blacks supporting Hillary Clinton aren't holding her to that standard.

I also wonder if Obama's message of racial inclusion worries some blacks. Do they think if he reaches out to "them"(whites), it means he neglects "us" (blacks)?

Malcolm X and Martin Luther King Jr. recognized the universality of the struggle for dignity and self-determination of black people around the world. What were our protests against South African apartheid about if not this very principle? If American blacks can view black South Africans thousands of miles away as brothers in need of their support, why are they having such a hard time seeing Obama as one of their own?

Whether Obama is ready to run, deserves our vote or has enough experience for the job are all legitimate questions. Whether he is black enough is not.

A Wide-Open Web For The '08 Campaign (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

Does Barack Obama have the potential to trump Hillary Clinton's money, organization and methodical planning by becoming the online phenomenon of 2008? The answer may determine who wins the Democratic presidential nomination.

This is the election in which Internet campaigning will reach maturity. The 2000 campaign offered the first glimmers of the medium's power when John McCain surprised the political world by raising $6 million to $7 million online in his unsuccessful Republican primary campaign against George W. Bush.

Howard Dean rode the Internet from nowhere to a strong early position in the 2004 Democratic presidential race, only to fall to John Kerry. The same anti-Bush sentiment that had powered Dean later allowed Kerry to raise an estimated $82 million in Internet contributions.

Today, the next new thing is old hat -- but still evolving. "It's so mainstream now that every part of the campaign touches the Internet," said Becki Donatelli, who pioneered McCain's 2000 Internet fundraising and is working for him again. "It's the 900-pound gorilla. It's the real thing."

That, says Joe Trippi, Dean's first campaign manager and a longtime preacher of the Internet gospel, means that no single 2008 candidate will have the early command of the online world that Dean enjoyed.

"It's hard to have a Dean-like phenomenon ever again," said Simon Rosenberg, president of NDN, formerly the New Democrat Network, a progressive advocacy group, "because the Internet is not a shiny new toy anymore."

The question is whether Obama will have an edge as the candidate who talks about his campaign as a participatory mass movement and is trying to embody the word "new." Trippi, who is neutral this year, sees Obama as having "a lot of advantages" in Internet campaigning, particularly because "he is really connecting with young people, as Dean did early on."

But much will depend on whether Obama's approach lives up to his high-minded promise to supporters that his campaign won't "only be about me" and will become instead "the occasion, the vehicle, of your hopes, and your dreams."

That language, at least, matches one measure of a successful Internet campaign, according to Eli Pariser, executive director of the MoveOn.org political action committee, a liberal group that has not endorsed a 2008 candidate yet. "You have to make people feel they're part of the campaign," he says, "that they're not just people a candidate is trying to suck money out of."

Clinton, says Trippi, has the disadvantage of being a front-runner with widely publicized prowess at large-scale, conventional fundraising. This might lead potential Internet givers to the conclusion that "she doesn't need the money." He sees Obama as having a better chance of creating a sentiment among online donors that they are an important part of his campaign.

But Obama faces two obstacles to overwhelming Clinton on the Internet. The first is John Edwards, whose strong stands against the Iraq war and in favor of a broad national health insurance plan have made him popular among the more ideologically committed bloggers and their audiences. Obama and Edwards will be in competition for some of the same online support.

The second is the Clinton campaign's awareness that the Internet matters this year as it never has before. "The Clintons have mastered every other aspect of politics," says Rosenberg. "They're going to be competitive in this arena." Hillary Clinton, he notes, has been careful -- through her well-produced webcast announcement speech and online " conversations" -- to show she understands the new desire among political activists for more interaction with the candidates they support.

Clinton also could benefit from what Donatelli sees as a major shift in the sources of online money. "In 2000, nearly 90 percent of what we took in on our Web site came from people who found their way to us," Donatelli said, referring to McCain's effort. Now, 50 percent of Internet money is raised through "direct marketing."

Clinton will almost certainly do well on the marketing side, and both Trippi and Rosenberg argue that she is likely to find a strong niche among Democratic women, who have become increasingly important to the party's financial base.

In the coming months, partly because it's fun to do, the political world will be watching Hollywood and Wall Street to see who racks up the big money. But 2008 promises to be the year when decisions made at millions of computer screens on kitchen tables and office desks could outshine the glitz and beat out the large checkbooks. The Internet could thus provide Obama his best chance of keeping up with one of the most formidable fundraisers in Democratic politics.

Gingrich Among Top GOP '08 Candidates (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

Press accounts seldom name former House Speaker Newt Gingrich in the top tier of aspirants for the Republican presidential nomination, despite polls consistently showing he belongs there.

"Newt's invisible to much of the nation's media," said Republican communications strategist Tom Edmonds. "The liberal press doesn't want to acknowledge that he casts a big shadow over the 2008 race."

News stories and opinion columns routinely refer to Arizona Sen. John McCain, former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney as the "top tier" or "first tier" Republican presidential candidates for 2008.

Yet in every recent poll national poll -- as well as in Iowa, a key early caucus state -- Mr. Gingrich leads Mr. Romney among Republican likely voters. And it's not just because of high name recognition alone, conservatives say.

"Everybody here loves Gingrich," said Iowa Republican Party Executive Director Chuck Laudner. "He is a hero."

More than a dozen years after he zoomed to national prominence as the brash leader of the 1994 "Republican revolution," Mr. Gingrich has attained status as an elder statesman among top conservative leaders.

"I don't know how Gingrich would perform if he were elected to the highest office in the land but these days he is responsible in that each time I read one of his policy initiatives I want to stand up and cheer," said Paul M. Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation.

Among the top Republican contenders, Mr. Gingrich is the only one who has neither formed an exploratory committee nor officially declared his candidacy -- and thus is the only one who is not raising money for a campaign.

Mr. Gingrich has said he will wait until September to make a decision on running. Still, in poll after poll, he joins Mr. Giuliani and Mr. McCain in scoring in double digits.

Late starters, however, may be out of luck this time, with both parties' nominees expected to be known by early February of next year. Federal Election Commissioner Michael Toner has estimated a viable presidential candidate must raise $100 million by the end of this year.

"Does Newt belong in the first tier? Not unless he gets in soon," said Patrick J. Buchanan, who unsuccessfully sought the Republican presidential nomination in 1992 and 1996 before running on the Reform Party ticket in 2000.

"Folks are committing themselves in the early states," he said. "Endorsements are coming. Organizational help is being pledged. Money is being raised. Mailing and e-mail lists and financial supporters are being lined up."

Mr. Buchanan, who challenged the first President Bush in the 1992 Republican primaries, said, "If you wait till fall, you may be able to come off the blocks fast in January, as we did in 1992, but you just don't have the legs to go the distance."

Even Mr. Gingrich's supporters acknowledge that he has liabilities. During his tenure as speaker, his Republican House colleagues twice mutinied against his leadership. Following unexpected losses in the 1998 midterm elections, he left Congress with low approval ratings.

Nevertheless, Republican pollster Kellyanne Conway said, Mr. Gingrich remains an important voice for his party and the conservative movement because he "is the same big-ideas generator that led Republicans out of the wilderness in 1994."

His name recognition and conservative credentials largely account for Mr. Gingrich's current standing among Republican 2008 contenders, said pollster John Zogby.

"Gingrich is the most high-profile conservative in the race," Mr. Zogby said. "At the very least he is the conservative place holder. Should Gingrich run, he can get double-digit support and help frame the debate. He is a player."

Mr. Giuliani, however, leads the Republican field in many polls even though he is the most liberal candidate on social issues. He won 34 percent of Republican voters nationally in the latest Fox News poll, with Mr. McCain getting 22 percent, Mr. Gingrich at 15 percent and Mr. Romney at 3 percent. Those numbers roughly mirror results in the latest surveys by Rasmussen (Mr. Giuliani 27 percent, Mr. McCain 25 percent, Mr. Gingrich 13 percent, Mr. Romney 7 percent) and Time magazine (Mr. McCain 30 percent, Mr. Giuliani 26 percent, Mr. Gingrich 14 percent, Mr. Romney 5 percent).

In Iowa, the three latest polls show Mr. Giuliani leading Mr. McCain, with Mr. Gingrich placing third and Mr. Romney fourth. Only in New Hampshire -- next door to Mr. Romney's home state -- does the former Massachusetts governor place ahead of Mr. Gingrich in recent polls.

Brownback Leads The Field In Missed Votes (POL)

By Carrie Sheffield

The Politico, February 16, 2007

Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., has been playing an awful lot of hooky these days. Last month, he missed more than half of his Senate roll call votes, according to AbsentCongress.org, a Web site launched Thursday that tracks senatorial absenteeism.

Only Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., who remains hospitalized after a life-threatening brain hemorrhage, has missed more. Johnson, who staffers say is making steady progress in his recovery, hasn't made it to any votes yet.

Brownback showed up 48 percent of the time. As a presidential hopeful, he probably has his hands full. Yet rival senators who are also moonlighting as '08 contenders have higher attendance records – though the campaign season remains young.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., has managed to show up for every vote so far. And both senators Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., and John McCain, R-Ariz., scored a 94 percent attendance record last month, according to the site. Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., attended 84 percent of votes last month; Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., who hasn't formally entered the race, was present 76 percent of the time.

Among the non-candidates, Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, has the worst attendance at 51 percent. Sen. Kit Bond, R-Mo., is next, showing up 74 percent of the time, ahead of senators Craig Thomas, R-Wyo., and Joe Biden, D-Del., who have made it to 79 percent of their votes.

Brownback and Inouye did not immediately respond to requests for comment.

"Normal American people show up to work every day," said David Ferguson, a manager of the site. "Why shouldn't our senators?"

Ferguson is president of the American Conservative Student Union. Members created and plan to update the site monthly. The ACSU launched in January as an offshoot from TheVanguard.org, a new online grass-roots network headed by Rod Martin, former counsel to Silicon Valley tech giant PayPal.

Martin and his partners say their work is a conservative response to the liberal online community at MoveOn.org.

Though his group gets funding from right-leaning donors, Ferguson said absentcongress.org pokes at lawmakers from both parties. He and his team divided the senators' monthly salary (roughly $13,767 per person) by the number of votes in January (39) and affixed a price tag ($353) for each vote they missed. They plan to send an invoice to each senator. By ACSU's tally, Brownback owes $7,060, Inouye owes $6,707, and Bond should pony up $3,530.

For now, AbsentCongress.org tracks only senators, but it plans to include House members soon.

The Banker's Candidate (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum, Carrie Johnson

Connecticut Sen. Christopher J. Dodd has two big jobs. He is a candidate for the Democratic nomination for president, and he chairs the Senate Banking Committee.

They are proving to be a lucrative combination. Among Democrats, Dodd's $5 million campaign nest egg is surpassed only by that of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), who has one of the most elaborate fundraising machines ever assembled.

Dodd's electoral riches can be traced to the banking panel, whose jurisdiction includes some of the wealthiest industries in America -- banking, insurance and financial services. In addition, Dodd's home state is the hedge fund and insurance capital of the country.

But it is Dodd's philosophy, not only his geography, that has made him a cash magnet. Each of these big-money interests applauds his light-handed approach to financial regulation and considers him a reliable friend -- a fact that raises questions about Dodd's viability in a Democratic field even as it bolsters his fundraising prowess.

In recent presidential polls, Dodd has been little more than an asterisk. And his closeness with Wall Street will probably not help him with the liberal-leaning Democrats who tend to vote in presidential primaries, analysts say. "It's not something you would trumpet to primary voters," said Nathan L. Gonzales of the nonpartisan Rothenberg Political Report.

At the same time, the ample donations those connections have fostered will enable him to make his name more widely known. "At this stage, the money primary is the biggest race," Gonzales added.

Financial services companies "will be making contributions to Dodd's presidential run because they can't afford to annoy him," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. "Whether or not his presidential ambitions go anywhere, he'll still be the chairman of Senate Banking Committee, and they will still need his goodwill."

Dodd, who was elected to the House in 1974 and the Senate in 1980, has never shied away from collecting funds from financial services companies. Since the midterm elections last year, Citigroup and J.P. Morgan Chase have hosted fundraisers for him, participants said. Insurance firms have held at least three fundraisers for Dodd.

Dodd collected $3 million in the last three months of 2006, outraising even Clinton. Employees of American International Group and Morgan Stanley were among the largest givers. According to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics, Dodd has raised more money for his Senate campaigns from securities and investment firms than from any other industry.

During an interview last week in his stately fourth-floor office on Capitol Hill, Dodd expressed distaste with the near-constant need to generate campaign contributions to sustain a presidential bid. But, he said, the system being what it is, he is resigned to traveling the fundraising circuit for the next year or more.

He said he will not hesitate to shake Wall Street's money tree, even though he is chairman of the committee that watches over its companies. But accepting millions of dollars from industries that his committee oversees will not affect his policy decisions, Dodd said.

"My record speaks for itself," the senator said. "I haven't changed my tune. I've been, I think, fairly consistent in my views on these issues."

Financial firms have long liked what Dodd has done in the areas of legislation and regulation. "Chairman Dodd is a thoughtful leader in Congress playing an important policy role to ensure an open, competitive and sound global financial services marketplace," said Robert S. Nichols, president of the Financial Services Forum, a Washington group comprising the chief executives of 21 U.S. financial services companies, in typically flowery praise of the new chairman.

"A lot of his constituents are financial services types, and he's always been a reasonable person on those issues," added Bruce E. Thompson Jr., the head of government relations for Merrill Lynch. "Because of that, he's always gotten support from the industry."

"The financial services community would be a logical source of funding for him," agreed Edward L. Yingling, president of the American Bankers Association.

Dodd is a voice of federal restraint when it comes to financial services. He has opposed vigorous federal regulation of hedge funds, many of which are based in Connecticut. He also was the Senate's leading champion of a 1995 law that limited shareholders' right to bring class-action lawsuits against companies for alleged securities misdeeds.

Now, Dodd is leading the charge to renew terrorism-insurance legislation, which makes the federal government a major co-underwriter of insurance against terrorist attacks.

Hedge funds are "a great wealth generator" that if handled properly "will continue to be a tremendous asset," Dodd said. He added that the Banking Committee would probably not hold hearings on hedge funds this year.

"I don't want to be perceived . . . as setting up roadblocks and barriers to something I perceive to be very valuable," he said.

On the other hand, Dodd has taken some anti-industry positions. He helped write the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which imposed stiffer penalties on accounting irregularities. He has also taken positions on a few narrow issues that anger financial firms but are popular with the populists who usually vote Democratic.

For instance, Dodd said he intends to campaign against predatory-lending practices by banks, which entail charging excessive interest rates on mortgage loans, often to low-income people. He also said he wants to crack down on excessive fees charged by credit card companies.

Dodd has leveraged his committee's jurisdiction to press for Wall Street jobs for low-income workers. In recent weeks, he has reached out to minority voters with a speech at the Rainbow/Push Coalition's Wall Street Economic Summit in New York. At the summit, convened by the Rev. Jesse L. Jackson, Dodd decried economic inequality and pledged to establish a "working group" to expand opportunities for minorities in the financial services industry.

Since assuming the Banking Committee chairmanship last month, Dodd has held hearings on predatory mortgage loans and high-interest-rate credit cards that burden consumers with unwieldy debt. He is working with Elizabeth Warren, a Harvard Law School professor and consumer bankruptcy expert, and others to roll back those high fees, he said.

"At the end of my tenure on this committee, I want it to be said that the safety and soundness of our financial institutions was not weakened on my watch," Dodd said.

Travis B. Plunkett, legislative director at the Consumer Federation of America, said the group's rating on Dodd has been a "mixed bag." But, Plunkett added, he's effective. "He often ends up on the winning side of an issue."

"We love to have him on our side, and we wince when we're going to be opposing him because he's a very effective legislator," Plunkett said.

Mr. Romney Jumps In (WP)

FORMER Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney chose his home state of Michigan to formally launch his presidential bid, which may say a lot about the hurdles he faces in his effort to win the Republican nomination. Having presided over one of the most liberal states in the nation, having made statements on issues such as abortion and gay rights that appealed to the residents of that state, Mr. Romney, 59, now needs to convince the social conservatives who have a big say in picking the party's nominee that he is not a Massachusetts Republican after all. Mr. Romney, a Harvard MBA and management consultant, has methodically gone about the task of wooing social conservatives, but his record could make that a tough sell.

He has disavowed previous positions backing a federal law to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and calling for an end to the ban on gays in the military; now he emphasizes his opposition to the ruling on same-sex marriage by Massachusetts's highest court. Once he touted his support for abortion rights and backed the use of leftover embryos for stem cell research; now he endorses overturning Roe v. Wade, a position he says he came to during the stem cell debate. Our views are much more in line with the old Romney than the new version; Republican primary voters will have to judge for themselves which is authentic and whether political opportunism, rather than a moral awakening, as he says, played a role in Mr. Romney's transformation.

Mr. Romney enters the race with many strengths. In his announcement, he sounded a reformer-outsider message reminiscent of both Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.), saying that "the halls of government are clogged with petty politics and stuffed with peddlers of influence." But he also argued that the presidency is not a job for "someone who has never even managed a corner store, let alone the largest enterprise in the world." Mr. Romney's managerial and executive experience, in private life and government, separate him from most of his rivals. He had a successful stint as head of the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City, overcoming a bribery scandal and turning a failing financial enterprise into a money-making operation.

As governor of Massachusetts, he worked with the Democratic legislature -- and the state's senior U.S. senator, liberal icon Edward M. Kennedy -- to craft a universal health insurance plan by combining a mandate for individuals to purchase coverage, subsidies for those unable to afford it and a "fee" -- not a tax, Mr. Romney argued -- for employers who failed to offer coverage. How the Romney plan will work out remains uncertain: The first bids came in at double the expected monthly premium cost.

One challenge that Mr. Romney faces is something that we hope dissipates as an issue over time: winning over voters uneasy about his Mormon faith. In a Gallup poll this week, a disturbing 24 percent said they would not vote for a "generally well-qualified person for president who happened to be Mormon." Mr. Romney's religion could be a particular sticking point with evangelical Christians who wield significant clout in GOP primaries. As with another Massachusetts politician who ran for the presidency more than four decades ago and persuaded voters not to hold his Catholicism against him, Mr. Romney should be judged on a basis other than his faith.

Special Interests Launch State Term Limit Initiative (LAT)

By Nancy Vogel

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

SACRAMENTO — An unusual coalition of special interests with close ties to lawmakers launched a ballot initiative today that would tweak California's term limits to allow the Legislature's current leaders to stay in office as long as six more years.

The measure would do what Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles) and Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata (D-Oakland) have discussed with increasing urgency as their 2008 ousters approach: Cut the number of years a legislator could hold office from 14 years to 12, but allow that time to be served in a single house. FOR THE RECORD:

Initiative: An earlier version of this story stated that the teachers union and the California Chamber of Commerce will bankroll the collection of signatures for the ballot intitiative. The coalition, which includes the California Teachers Assn. and the business group, is likely to support the intitiative. Also, it was earlier reported that the proposed initiative was filed in the secretary of state's office. It was filed in the state's attorney general's office.—

Under the proposal, filed today at the state's attorney general's office, Nuñez could serve six more years in the Assembly and Perata could have four more years in the Senate.

To appease other lawmakers, the measure would allow those who would otherwise be forced out in 2008 to serve as many as 12 years in their current house.

California voters slapped term limits on the Legislature in 1990 with an initiative, passed by a narrow margin, that also cut the Legislature's budget by nearly half and jettisoned the lawmakers' retirement system. Past attempts to relax term limits have failed. They remain at three two-year terms in the Assembly and two four-year terms in the Senate for a total of 14 years.

Lawmakers could put a term-limits proposal on the ballot themselves with a two-thirds majority vote, but Republicans — whose votes would be needed for that supermajority — have been cold to the idea.

Still, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Republican, has said he is willing to discuss term-limit changes as part of a package that includes an initiative to take away lawmakers' power to draw legislative districts and give it to an independent commission. Nuñez has endorsed such redistricting reform and said recently, "There certainly is the will to get this done this year."

The campaign will be managed by unlikely partners: Democratic consultant Gale Kaufman, who spearheaded the defeat of Schwarzenegger's reform measures in the 2005 special election, and Matthew Dowd, campaign strategist for the governor's resounding reelection in November.

A coalition that includes the California Teachers Assn. and the California Chamber of Commerce will likely support the initiative, Kaufman said. By July, the campaign must collect 1.1 million signatures.

The measure would appear on the next statewide ballot, which could be as early as February 2008. If passed then, the new limits would take effect before legislative primaries are held that June.

Riding high from a legislative session last year that many praised as the most productive in years and without an open office to land when he is termed out in 2008, Nuñez has said with increasing frequency recently that he thinks voters will be open to adjusting term limits.

"You can't do the job effectively if you can't be there for a reasonable amount of time, to have a real grasp on the issues," he told a group of newspaper publishers last month. "You've got to know in this job how to say no to your own constituents and in some cases the people that brought you there. ... It takes a couple of years to develop the level of expertise and know-how to negotiate a balanced budget.

"I think we ought to relax those terms," Nuñez said, "and I think we ought to do it sooner rather than later."

Many political scientists who have studied term limits also support relaxing them. They say that while the churn of legislators through Sacramento has increased the Legislature's diversity, it has also cost institutional knowledge, strengthened the hand of lobbyists and weakened the Legislature's traditional oversight role. These observers also say the limits encourage lawmakers to introduce bills aimed at gaining publicity rather than tackling unglamorous problems, such as prison overcrowding and pension shortfalls.

"Term limits in states have done more to limit rather than enhance the effectiveness of the legislative branch," said Karl Kurtz, a researcher with the National Conference of State Legislatures who studied term limits in six states last spring.

In the 1990s, 21 states imposed term limits. They are now in effect in 15. Courts tossed out the restrictions in four states and lawmakers repealed them in Idaho and Utah.

California lawmakers point with hope to Los Angeles, where voters extended City Council term limits in November, allowing members to serve three four-year terms instead of two terms. The extension was tied to tighter lobbying rules.

"It's a fairly significant thing when L.A. does anything and we ought to look at it very carefully," Perata said Tuesday.

The Legislature lacks continuity, he said, noting that some of the 38 new members who arrived in December have introduced bills that attempt to dictate the spending of $37 billion in public works bonds crafted by the Legislature and passed by voters in November.

"Now that's one fight I know you'd avoid if people had some continuity in office," Perata said.

"There are people like Fabian Nuñez who now is beginning to hit his stride as a political leader," Perata said. "Why shouldn't we benefit? Why should we then pick somebody off the shelf that we don't know anything about?"

A Hard Right Punch (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

Michelle Malkin has seen her head electronically grafted onto a photo of a bikini-clad body.

She had to cancel a Berkeley book signing in the face of 200 shouting protesters.

YouTube banned one of her videos. And she felt compelled to move after critics posted online her Gaithersburg area address and pictures of her home.

Clearly, this is a woman who arouses strong emotions.

"They'll ridicule my looks, ridicule my ethnicity, go after my family," the 36-year-old blogger says of her critics. "They've attacked my husband relentlessly. There's a strong sexist strain among my liberal critics, who think it isn't possible I could have gotten anywhere without my Svengali husband, or some white man, embedding ideas in my head."

Make no mistake, though: This daughter of Filipino immigrants plays pretty rough herself. Whether on her blog, her Internet talk show or her Fox News appearances, Malkin delights in sticking her finger in the eye of the liberal establishment. And she is convinced that her detractors don't play fair.

"Particularly when you're a minority conservative," she says, "you get a lot of ugly, hysterical, unhinged attacks, because you're challenging so many liberal myths about what people of color should think."

Plenty of folks find Malkin's rhetoric overheated as well. "The donkey party," she wrote last fall, "is led by thumb-sucking demagogues in prominent positions who equate Bush with Hitler and Jim Crow, call him a liar in front of high school students and the world, fantasize about impeachment and fetishize the human rights of terrorists who want to kill me. Put simply: There are no grown-ups in the Democrat Party."

Andrew Sullivan, a conservative blogger who has turned on the Bush administration, regularly bestows a "Malkin Award" for excessive attacks. "Sometimes you just can't believe what she writes -- it's so out there, and in certain respects quite disgraceful," he says.

At the same time, says Sullivan, "she's been subjected to some pretty horrifying bigotry from the left, based on her gender and ethnicity and ugly stereotypes. You can't engage in the kind of rhetoric she does and not expect some blowback."

Is this merely how the war of ideas is waged in an anything-goes digital culture? Or is Malkin an especially inflammatory practitioner, torching her targets with such books as "Unhinged: Exposing Liberals Gone Wild"?

Over lunch at a Filipino cafe at Union Station, Malkin, who has two young children, is charming one moment and pugnacious the next. She says she loves the intellectual freedom of the blogosphere, where "you can respond, you can reveal people to be the liars and slanderers they are."

Between bites, though, you can catch a glimpse of amazement that "a small-town girl from South Jersey," as she puts it, can have such an outsize impact. Even if she makes plenty of enemies in the process.

Malkin has been relentlessly critical of the media's coverage of Iraq. Last month, she went to see for herself.

"I really wanted to go to Ramadi, but my husband wouldn't let me," Malkin says. Instead, she spent a week embedded with an Army unit in Baghdad and returned more hopeful about a war effort she had increasingly begun to doubt.

Part of Malkin's self-assigned mission was to check out a much-debated Associated Press dispatch. It quoted an Iraqi police captain, Jamil Hussein, as saying that Shiites had burned or blown up four mosques -- and at one of them, doused six Sunnis with kerosene and burned them alive while nearby Iraqi soldiers did not intervene. After the widely published November report, Malkin and other conservative bloggers mounted a campaign questioning whether Hussein existed.

When the Iraqi government belatedly confirmed that Hussein was a police official -- and said that he faced arrest for speaking to the press -- Malkin reported the news and expressed regret. But she now questions Hussein's very account, saying she found little damage at the mosques.

"We quoted people saying [the victims] had been bombed and burned," says John Daniszewski, international editor at the AP, which acknowledged last week that the mosques are still standing despite some damage. "It was a moving news story. We said these were allegations and not confirmed by police."

In the wake of her Iraq trip, Sullivan has softened his criticism of Malkin. "You've got to give her credit that she has actually gone there," he says. "And she has criticized the administration on this and other things. She may be shrill, but she's not a shill."

Malkin bristles at the notion that she is "some Republican Kool-Aid drinker." She has lambasted President Bush -- whom she views as insufficiently conservative -- on such issues as immigration reform, the Harriet Miers nomination to the Supreme Court and the failed Dubai ports deal. Malkin was frustrated when the president agreed to seek court warrants for domestic eavesdropping, after she had doggedly defended his earlier position that judicial approval was unnecessary.

"There is a feeling that every time we go to bat for the Bush administration, they pull the rug out from under us," she says.

Malkin's campaigns have had mixed results. She helped lead the charge against two liberal bloggers who resigned under pressure from John Edwards's presidential campaign after being castigated for anti-Christian writing. But she apologized last month for linking to a photo of John Kerry sitting alone during a visit to Iraq, and adopting accounts by a blogger and a radio host that he had been spurned by the troops there. It turned out that the Massachusetts senator was waiting for an interview with reporters.

Malkin also serves as an early-warning system, such as when she wrote about protests (by what she called "Islamist p.c. bullies") against a Danish newspaper for publishing cartoons making fun of the prophet Muhammad. When violent demonstrations later broke out, Malkin posted all the cartoons as a free-speech gesture.

"She's a very tough lady," says Bryan Preston, her business partner in the daily video blog Hot Air. "You've never met a happier person than Michelle when she's in the thick of a fight. She enjoys the combat of ideas."

That persona is a far cry from the self-described "geek" of her youth. Michelle Maglalang grew up outside Atlantic City in a Reaganite, conservative Catholic family, was not politically active, and failed a fifth-grade public speaking class. As a college student, she was so naive that when a married Republican congressman invited her to live in his home during her internship with then-Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.), she thought it was a generous offer until her parents straightened her out.

It was at Oberlin College that she began working on an alternative newspaper founded by Jesse Malkin, her future husband. When they co-authored an article questioning the value of affirmative action -- and outraged students dumped bundles of papers in the trash -- "it was an awakening" for Michelle, says Jesse. She soon converted him from a Michael Dukakis supporter to the conservative side.

"She's always been hard-hitting," says Jesse, now a stay-at-home dad and health-care consultant. "She doesn't have a lot of tolerance for mealy-mouthed platitudes."

After seven years as an editorial writer for the Los Angeles Daily News and the Seattle Times, Michelle Malkin moved to Washington in 1999 to work for the Competitive Enterprise Institute. She launched her blog, http://Michellemalkin.com, in 2004. Last month it drew 388,000 visitors, and it's complemented by a syndicated column that appears in 150 papers.

Her newspaper experience was crucial because "you see what a lot of crackpots and cranks are out there," says Mark Cunningham, the New York Post opinion editor, who has known Malkin for years. "She learned a long time ago to deal with sticks and stones. People read her, even if they're infuriated by her."

Malkin's detractors -- whom she derides as "moonbats" -- were further riled by her book "In Defense of Internment," in which she said the confining of Japanese Americans during World War II was justified, and backed racial profiling as a vital tool against terrorism.

She was also denounced for posting the phone numbers of three antiwar protesters at the University of California at Santa Cruz who chased military recruiters off the campus. Malkin says the contact numbers were listed on a press release put out by the students' group.

Not surprisingly, it gets pretty hot in her kitchen. The liberal blogger Atrios (Duncan Black) called Malkin a racist over her views on immigration and said anyone who promotes her site "may as well be promoting the Klan." A Web site called Malkin Watch runs a cartoon of her in a Nazi uniform. In comments on her own blog -- a feedback loop she has since restricted -- one person called her "lyin' pond scum" and another asked why she believed "she will be treated as white when God chose to make her yellow?"

When Malkin posted a video about Islamic violence -- set to religious chanting -- on YouTube last year, the Web site promptly removed it as inappropriate. She fought back with an online video criticizing YouTube, which the site also deleted, posting a one-line explanation that Malkin herself had withdrawn it. That, she said on her blog, was a lie.

After a few liberal sites posted her home address and phone numbers last year, Malkin received a wave of harassing calls. She responded with a defiant post, headlined "I AM NOT AFRAID OF YOU." Malkin and her family have moved elsewhere in Maryland.

"No one likes to receive the kind of attacks she gets," Preston says. "She has had to take some security precautions to make sure it doesn't rise to the level of threatening her family."

Sometimes, though, Malkin seems to use the same howitzer against every provocation. After she started crusading against the "Girls Gone Wild" culture as a "liberal assault on decency," the satirical site Wonkette received -- and posted -- a picture of Malkin's head on the scantily-clad body of a college student, whose image had been plucked from the Web. Malkin denounced what she called the "hate-filled cowards" at Wonkette's parent company for "repeatedly smearing and attempting to humiliate me."

After being contacted by Malkin's lawyer, Wonkette ran a snarkily worded semi-retraction. The site's West Coast bureau chief, Ken Layne, says he doesn't know or care whether the picture is real and calls Malkin "incapable of getting a joke."

"People send us dumb stuff all the time, and if it makes us laugh, we post it," he adds. "Malkin responds in such a predictably psychotic way whenever we mention her."

What some might have dismissed as a prank became another salvo in the culture wars. It is as though eternal vigilance is the price of being Michelle Malkin: No slight can go unanswered, no insult allowed to stand. Blogging is an addiction, she says, but not one she is looking to kick.

"You have to accept that you'll never have many friends," Malkin says. "It's a lonely existence."

The Autoworkers' Pain (NYT)

American autoworkers are suffering through another round of layoffs, factory closings and buyouts. This time DaimlerChrysler has announced that it will cut 13,000 jobs in North America. Ford Motor and General Motors offered buyouts to a total of nearly 200,000 hourly workers in 2006.

These losses stoke fears that America's manufacturing base is disappearing, that the country is "de-industrializing." With the loss of three million American factory jobs since the end of 2000 and the trade deficit at an all-time high, it's easy to see China's spectacular growth and assume that American factories are being gutted by foreign competition.

But global competition is not the whole cause for the car manufacturers' problems, just as the answers are not to be found in protectionism.

Many of the car companies' difficulties stem from some bad decisions by management and some uninspired car designs. Chrysler lost $1.48 billion last year and Ford lost $12.7 billion, the most in more than a century in business, while Toyota reported record profits and sales.

The plight of the workers who have lost their jobs is real and has to be addressed, but the U.S. manufacturing sector is far more robust than the struggle of the carmakers suggests. According to the United Nations, the United States accounted for 21.2 percent of world manufacturing in 2000. As China surged ahead in recent years, the American share of world manufacturing barely budged, falling to 21.1 percent by 2005, the most recent year available. American factories produced a record $1.5 trillion in goods that year.

In part, that's because foreign companies have invested so much in factory capacity in America. In a recent report, a Democratic research organization, the Progressive Policy Institute, cited government figures showing that foreign manufacturers invest billions more in the United States than American manufacturers invest abroad. Toyota provides over 29,000 manufacturing jobs in this country.

Many of the jobs that have disappeared did not drain off to foreign competition, but to technological change on the shop floor. Robots and computers have allowed far fewer workers to produce more than ever. That kind of high-tech manufacturing is one reason successful American companies like Boeing and Caterpillar can compete with companies in countries where the labor costs are low.

This is not to ignore the human dimension. It is too easy for free trade advocates to blame the robots and then ignore the pain of the blue-collar workers they have sidelined. The suffering in places like Ohio, Indiana and Michigan is very real, and so is the political backlash that results. The long-term answer is the vexing question of training American workers for a new world of jobs. But there are more short-term issues as well, starting with taking care of those Americans, middle aged and older, who suddenly find themselves without jobs right now.

The burden falls on pro-trade politicians and those who support them, unless they want to see high tariffs and duties, which will ultimately choke global and domestic growth. Just to start, pro-trade politicians have to make sure that a lost factory job does not mean a drastic and lasting decline in living standards, with no access to health insurance and no hope for a college education for that worker's children. As the tide rises, this country cannot allow millions to drown.

Rice Is Said To Have Speeded North Korea Deal (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Thom Shanker

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15 — To win approval of a deal with North Korea that has been assailed by conservatives inside and outside the administration, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice bypassed layers of government policy review that had derailed past efforts to negotiate an agreement, several senior administration officials said this week.

After a meeting in Berlin in mid-January with her top negotiator on North Korea, Christopher R. Hill, who had just held lengthy sessions with his North Korean counterparts, Ms. Rice called back to Washington to describe the outlines of the deal to Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, and then to President Bush.

But to some, it seemed the usual procedures were cut short — vetting the details though an interagency process that ordinarily would have brought in Vice President Dick Cheney's office, the Defense Department and aides at the White House and other agencies who had previously objected to rewarding North Korea before it gives up its weapons.

"There was no process here," said an official who has been deeply involved in the issue. "Nothing. There was no airing of whether this is the way to deal with the North Koreans."

White House and other administration officials dispute that, saying that all relevant agencies were consulted.

In lieu of the formal meetings where objections to such accords were usually voiced during the president's first term, Mr. Hadley "walked it through with concerned people," a senior administration official said. The official acknowledged that the process was much more informal, and rapid, than usual, although much of Mr. Hill's work was built upon previous negotiations at the talks that had been widely vetted across the administration.

The result has been an unusual attack on the agreement from the right, starting with John R. Bolton, the former ambassador to the United Nations who takes a tough stance on North Korea issues. He said bluntly that it was a "bad deal," and expressed the hope that it would fall apart before being carried out.

State Department officials said that Robert Joseph, the under secretary of state for arms control and disarmament, vehemently disagreed with the approach, telling associates privately what Mr. Bolton has said in public: that the new agreement was no better, and perhaps worse, than one signed by President Clinton in 1994. Mr. Joseph, who announced last month that he would resign soon, declined to comment Thursday.

Ms. Rice on Thursday sternly played down the significance of any internal dissent, making it clear that she would not entertain dissent after the president had made up his mind.

"First of all, the U.S. government is the U.S. government," she said. "And so the decision has been taken. And since people are loyal to decisions that are taken, I think that everybody expects there to be loyalty to this decision."

Mr. Bush, asked at a news conference on Wednesday about Mr. Bolton's critique, was succinct: "I strongly disagree — strongly disagree with his assessment."

But in Mr. Bush's first term, the decision-making process worked very differently.

State Department negotiators almost never dealt with the North Koreans without officials from the Defense Department and the vice president's office coming along, and reporting back. In one instance, Mr. Cheney stepped into the Oval Office to put an end to a discussion under way in Beijing, when he feared an agreement setting out steps for resolving the nuclear standoff lacked the tough language on disarmament that he believed Mr. Bush wanted. Colin L. Powell, then the secretary of state, learned of the decision after a black-tie dinner.

In this deal, North Korea has agreed in principle to disarmament, but all discussion about actually giving up weapons — and what the North might receive in return — has been deferred.

Senior administration officials said they had been concerned that this deal, unlike the 1994 accord, should not "front-load" benefits to North Korea, and they said that instead it would reward the country bit by bit, as it carried out a freeze, and the "disablement," of North Korea's nuclear facilities.

"What's different this time is that it is clear that both the president and Condi wanted a deal," said an official peripherally involved in the debate. Several officials acknowledge that as the Bush presidency enters its final years, two foreign policy goals have risen higher on the agenda: peace between the Israelis and Palestinians and disarming North Korea.

Others said that the rapidly shifting terrain beneath the negotiations allowed Ms. Rice to press her case with Mr. Hadley and directly to the president. Another senior administration official said that the North Korean response to Mr. Hill in Berlin was circulated, but on a "relatively limited" basis as it was one of the most delicate national security issues facing the Bush administration.

Immediately after Mr. Hill's meeting with his North Korean counterpart in Berlin, Mr. Hill briefed Ms. Rice as she stopped in the German capital on the way home from the Middle East. She called the president from Berlin, and also spoke with Mr. Hadley, who was reviewing a copy of the document presented to Mr. Hill by the North Koreans, a senior administration official said.

"Chris signed on to it in Berlin," said a senior administration official, although a full six-party session was required to formalize the deal because the Bush administration was insisting on a multilateral format to better enforce any agreement with the North.

White House Calms GOP Base On Korea Deal (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, February 16, 2007

The White House on Thursday sought to ease concern among conservatives, including at least one key aide to President Bush, that a nuclear disarmament deal with North Korea goes too easy on the communist country.

One provision that conservatives find particularly troubling could allow North Korea to be removed from a list of terror-sponsoring states. One of Bush's deputy national security advisers, Elliott Abrams, raised alarms about that section in a series of e-mails.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said he spoke with Abrams and assured him North Korea will not be removed from the list unless it changes it behavior.

"The North Koreans don't get it for free," Snow said. "They've got to earn it, like everything else."

"We've seen conservatives criticizing this provision because they want the same kind of reassurance," Snow said. "So here it is — no political deal, it has to be based on facts and performance on the part of the North Koreans."

Snow said Abrams was reassured about the terms, and that Abrams did not oppose the deal — he was just seeking clarification.

Asked if Abrams was satisfied with the answers he'd received, Snow said: "Yes. I can say that without reservation."

"In this White House, people do express their opinions freely and give their advice," Snow responded after Abrams' skepticism had made its way into the newspaper.

That disclosure of Abrams' concerns came after John Bolton, who until recently was Bush's U.N. ambassador, said the agreement rewards North Korea for bad behavior. He called the agreement "fundamentally flawed." Bush said in a news conference on Wednesday that he strongly disagreed with that assessment, and that North Korea would receive no aid unless it lives up to its end of the deal.

Bush underscored that point Thursday in a conversation with Chinese President Hu Jintao. Bush congratulated Hu about the important role China played in reaching disarmament deal.

"President Bush told President Hu that it was now up to the leader of North Korea to live up to the commitments made in order to create a better life for the North Korean people," said Bush's national security spokesman, Gordon Johndroe.

Under the first phase of the breakthrough agreement reached in Beijing on Tuesday, North Korea would shut down its main nuclear reactor and allow U.N. inspectors back into the country within 60 days. In return, it would receive aid equal to 50,000 tons of heavy fuel oil from the other countries participating in the six-party talks — the United States, South Korea, Russia, China and Japan. The United States will also begin the process of removing North Korea from its designation as a terror-sponsoring state, but no deadlines have been set.

S. Korean Dissenter Warns Of Nuke Deal (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

A top contender to be South Korea's next president is warning that North Korea must be forced to give up all its nuclear-weapons programs if the new accord to end the peninsula's nuclear crisis is to succeed.

Park Guen-hye, daughter of the late South Korean President Park Chung-hee and a former chairman of the leading opposition party, said on a Washington visit Wednesday that the deal reached during the six-party talks in Beijing this week was a "good first step," but there were still "many mountains to cross" before the crisis was resolved.

Merely freezing Pyongyang's existing nuclear arsenal, she said, was unacceptable and would only re-create the conditions of the discredited 1994 Agreed Framework negotiated by the Clinton administration.

She also said the deal reached this week among the United States, the two Koreas, Japan, Russia and host China was not clear on whether Pyongyang would have to destroy its nuclear arsenal, estimated at four to 12 bombs.

She made the comments at the National Press Club as North and South Korean negotiators yesterday announced plans to hold high-level talks later this month, the first tangible result of the nuclear disarmament pact. Cabinet-level meetings on bilateral ties will take place in Pyongyang starting Feb. 27 -- the first such gathering since North Korea conducted missile tests in July.

Top North Korean negotiator Kim Kye-gwan, on his return to Pyongyang yesterday, said the six-party talks had "gone well," Japan's Kyodo News service reported.

"We are ready to implement the results of the meeting," he said.

President Bush, in a White House press conference Wednesday, brushed aside as "flat wrong" conservatives' complaints that the North will pocket promised fuel and food aid from the deal without being required to dismantle its nuclear programs first.

But he echoed Mrs. Park in saying that the North's follow-up moves to the Beijing deal will be crucial.

"Those who say the North Koreans have to prove themselves by actually following through on the deal are right, and I'm one," Mr. Bush said. "This is a good first step."

One provision that conservatives find particularly troubling could allow North Korea to be removed from a list of terror-sponsoring states. One of Bush's deputy national security advisers, Elliott Abrams, raised alarms about that section in a series of e-mails.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said he spoke with Mr. Abrams and assured him that North Korea will not be removed from the list unless it changes its behavior.

"We've seen conservatives criticizing this provision because they want the same kind of reassurance," Mr. Snow said. "So here it is -- no political deal, it has to be based on facts and performance on the part of the North Koreans."

Joel Wit, who helped negotiate the nuclear-freeze deal with North Korea in 1994 when he was with the State Department, praised the accord but cautioned there were huge question marks hanging over its implementation. They include the fate of the North's nuclear stockpile, Pyongyang's cooperation in disclosing all its nuclear assets and the effectiveness of the five "working groups" set up to implement the deal.

"There is a distinct danger that this deal could collapse," Mr. Wit said.

Mrs. Park's Grand National Party has soared in the polls ahead of the December presidential election as the Uri Party, allied to Mr. Roh, has slumped. Recent polls put the GNP's support at nearly 50 percent, compared with 10 percent for Uri.

In a five-day U.S. visit designed to burnish her international credentials, Mrs. Park will meet with top U.S. officials and reach out to the large, increasingly affluent Korean-American community.

She enjoys high name recognition because of her father, but recent polls put Mrs. Park behind former Seoul Mayor Lee Myung-bak in the race for the GNP nomination. The party will choose its candidate in a primary in June.

On another issue, Mrs. Park said she strongly opposed a plan to transfer wartime command of joint U.S.-South Korean forces from the United States to South Korea, a move scheduled to occur by 2012.

She said the command transfer, coupled with recent cuts in U.S. troop levels on the peninsula, had raised popular fears about the future of the U.S.-South Korean alliance.

Korea nuclear denial

A senior Bush administration official said that one serious shortcoming of the tentative deal on North Korea's nuclear program is that it does not resolve the status of Pyongyang's secret highly enriched uranium (HEU) program.

"North Korea denies having a HEU program and denies making any acquisitions necessary for a production-scale HEU program," the senior official said. "We know they made these acquisitions."

North Korea purchased special metals from Germany used in centrifuges in 2002 through a procurement office based in Shenyang, China. The North Koreans also were part of the centrifuge-technology network headed by Pakistani covert nuclear supplier A.Q. Khan.

The purchases were the basis for the confrontation in October 2002 between State Department official James Kelly and North Korean Deputy Foreign Minister Kang Seok-ju, who admitted that the uranium program had been under way for several years.

The North Koreans then reversed course and began denying that they had the uranium program, a position eventually adopted by both China and Russia.

The U.S. discovery of the HEU program in 2002 was the trigger to the current crisis with North Korea, which ultimately led to the six-party talks among North Korea, the United States, China, Japan, South Korea and Russia.

Rules of engagement

Now that Lt. Gen. David Petraeus is the commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, one of his first jobs will be to clarify what military and defense officials say are vague rules of engagement that govern how U.S. troops can use force to defend themselves.

Gen. Petraeus was asked recently about the problem of the vague rules, which have been discussed at length in this column over the past several weeks. He told a former general during a recent meeting that fixing the rules will be one of his most important priorities.

More evidence of the rules problem comes from an e-mail from an Army E-5 sergeant in Iraq who took issue with the recent letter in The Washington Times written by an Army attorney. The lawyer asserted that the current rules for soldiers were adequate and not confusing.

"I can tell you from personal experience that [the current rules of engagement] don't give us very much leeway with self-defense," wrote the sergeant, a member of a combat service support unit.

"They tell us in our convoy briefings that we have the right to self-defense, defense for civilians and other coalition forces," the soldier said. "However, I do know that it is hard for soldiers to distinguish when is the proper time to use self-defense and when it is not. Soldiers are scared and they have a right to be. If a higher-up decides what you did was not in self-defense, you could get in major trouble and we feel that it's really not worth it."

In one case, a soldier fired two 5.56 rounds and as a result "had to sit in an office for two days straight and tell his story over and over and fill out a ton of paperwork for doing what he felt was right."

The soldier said after the experience that "he would never fire his weapon again because he felt the aftermath wasn't worth it, and that's just not right."

"The military has gone severely soft in its effort over here and that is why more and more [people] are dying," the sergeant concluded. "They're just too scared to let soldiers think for themselves."

Surge forces

Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker told Congress yesterday that the Army will be able to supply its portion of the 21,500 troops needed for the new "surge" of troops in Baghdad but that there will be some problems with training and equipping the soldiers.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, also said yesterday there are problems equipping the new troops and that equipment is being taken from other units and given to those deploying to Baghdad. Two of the brigades now are in Iraq and one more will be added later this month. Two additional brigades will be added later.

"We've got about 40 percent of all of our equipment that is either currently in Iraq or Afghanistan or in depots for repair, which leaves you about 60 percent of your inventory, which is an enormous amount of equipment," Gen. Pace said.

He acknowledged that "we are moving equipment from some units to those units." However, he insisted that the new troops will be sent "fully trained and have all the equipment that they're required to have, so when we put those soldiers and Marines into combat, they are as well protected and trained as those who they are joining."

Asked if the Army is now "scurrying" to get five brigades geared up to the proper combat readiness for the Iraq deployment, Gen. Schoomaker said:

"I testified previously that I was concerned about the strategic depth in the Army. We're now supplying more; therefore we have an additional challenge on the strategic depth. Obviously, we are not going to put any force in the theater that isn't properly trained and equipped; therefore scurry is a kind word in terms of, you know, the machinations we go through to make this happen."

Gen. Schoomaker said there are "some issues" with preparing the troops but he does not consider them critical problems. "And our estimation is that we will be able to provide the surge forces in the time that the theater has asked for them, and they will be properly trained, led and equipped when they arrive," he said.

The additional troops will have 500 medium and large trucks sent to the region by June to augment the 8,000 trucks currently in the region.

Gen. Schoomaker assured the House Armed Services Committee that every soldier sent into Iraq, both in combat zones and those who stay "inside the wire," will be equipped with what he described as "the very finest body armor that can be manufactured."

Rice Faces Steep Hurdles In New Israeli-Palestinian Peace Drive (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, February 16, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice leaves Friday to host a rare summit between Israeli and Palestinian leaders that she hopes will break new ground in reviving peace negotiations frozen for nearly seven years.

But a political resurrection of the radical Palestinian group Hamas and a flare-up of violence in the disputed city of Jerusalem have cast a shadow over Monday's meeting with Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Rice has in recent months heralded the existence of a "new opening" for progress towards Isreali-Arab peace and the creation of an independent state for Palestinians, and she billed Monday's summit in Jerusalem as a high-profile jump through that breach.

On Thursday, though, her spokesman was lowering expectations for the encounter.

"It's not designed as a set of meetings that is going to result in a formal outcome, it is designed to start a series of conversations", Sean McCormack said.

Rice's plan, unveiled earlier this month, is to move beyond security issues which have bogged down Israeli-Palestinian negotiations for years and get the two sides also talking about the contours of a future Palestinian state.

Such "final status" issues have not been broached by senior leaders since former president Bill Clinton brought the two sides together at the Camp David retreat in 2000 for negotiations which ultimately failed.

Rice's initiative is designed to bolster the position of Abbas and his secular Fatah party in a power struggle with the Islamist movement Hamas, which gained control of the Palestinian government through January 2006 elections.

The West responded by withholding critical aid and recognition from the government, plunging the Palestinian areas into financial crisis and political deadlock.

Raising final status issues like the borders of a Palestinian state, the future of Jerusalem and the fate of Palestinian refugees, the new US logic goes, will help convince Palestinians that Abbas is better-suited to advancing their cause than Hamas.

But the plan snagged after the Fatah-Hamas power struggle turned violent late last year, leaving more than 100 dead and threatening to plunge the Palestinian territories into civil war.

The bloodshed spurred the two sides into a Saudi-backed power-sharing deal in Mecca last week that would bring Fatah into a unity government still headed by a Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniya.

While the deal has so far tamped down the violence, Hamas has yet to clearly signal a willingness to accept the West's conditions for ending the aid boycott: recognition of Israel's right to exist; a renunciation of violence; and compliance with past Israeli-Palestinian peace accords.

Abbas formally charged Haniya with forming the new government Thursday, and the White House responded by reaffirming that the new cabinet had to meet those conditions to be recognized by the West.

McCormack acknowledged that the Abbas-Hamas deal had complicated Rice's mission.

"Clearly the uncertainties concerning the formation of a possible national unity government have added to the complexity of the situation," he said.

"But if you waited for perfect clarity to all the issue in the Middle East and all those currently unanswered questions, the plane would never take off," he said.

Olmert for his part is under threat from the political right and, according to Israeli commentators, unwilling to even begin tackling thorny final status matters -- potentially leaving Rice with little room to maneuver.

"The gaps separating the Israelis and Palestinians are bigger and more complicated than they've ever been," said Aaron Miller, a former diplomat who advised six previous US secretaries of state on Arab-Israeli negotiations.

Instead of partners for peace ready and willing to make tough compromises, Rice will find Olmert and Abbas, also known as Abu Mazen, weakened by their political struggles at home.

"Olmert and Abu Mazen are not masters of their constituencies, they're prisoners of their own domestic politics," said Miller, now an analyst at Washington's Woodrow Wilson Center.

"That's a bad combination: big issues and weak leaders."

Rice's Mideast Paradox (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Cam Simpson

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will confront a paradoxical question when she arrives this weekend in the Middle East: Is peace among Palestinians bad for potential peace with Israel?

Ms. Rice's trip to Israel comes as the two main Palestinian factions -- the Islamist militant group Hamas and the Fatah party of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas -- are trying to cement a Saudi-brokered unity government. Their aim is to stanch the recent bloodshed between them and to win the financial backing of the outside world.

The budding political alliance between Hamas -- which refuses to recognize Israel's existence or to renounce the use of violence -- and Fatah has thrown a wrench into Ms. Rice's plans to start peace talks between Mr. Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. Until a week ago, when Saudi Arabia jumped in to broker a settlement between the two factions, the Bush administration was arguing that the time was ripe to start talking about a future Palestinian state.

Ms. Rice is sticking to her plans to hold three-way talks Monday with Israeli and Palestinian officials. "You can't wait for the perfect circumstances," she told reporters yesterday on the eve of her trip, adding that it would be a mistake not to keep ties strong with Mr. Abbas and "take advantage of his commitment" to eventual peace with Israel.

Skeptics, including some Israeli officials, are wondering if Ms. Rice is wise to proceed on this trip, especially when the Palestinian political scene is in such turmoil. "We could use some time to sit back and reassess where we are right now," said one Israeli official.

The U.S. itself is sending mixed signals over whether it may be willing to interact with a unity government led by Hamas. Ms. Rice said the U.S. wouldn't take a position on this question until the new government is formed, but U.S. officials in Israel have told the Palestinians that the U.S. would shun the government if it doesn't embrace Israel, renounce violence and agree to abide by previous international peace accords.

Ms. Rice's strategy in the past year has been to embolden Mr. Abbas and his secular Fatah movement, politically and militarily, believing that would force Hamas to yield to better terms for a unity government. Street battles raged between Fatah and Hamas, claiming scores of lives from within the leadership ranks of the warring factions and among Palestinian civilians.

That strategy has apparently failed, as the deal brokered by Saudi Arabia at Mecca last week would seem to require Mr. Abbas and the other U.S.-backed moderates to move closer to the Islamists -- not vice versa.

The Saudi deal, if it holds, also has thrown into question a core premise underlying the U.S.'s regional strategy over recent months. Ms. Rice has portrayed the moment as ripe for progress on the Israeli-Palestinian peace front largely because Sunni Arab states like Saudi Arabia appeared eager to help broker a deal. The U.S. logic was that Iran, and its aid to militant groups like Hamas, had become a greater threat to many Arab states than Israel.

The Saudis, by summoning both Hamas and Fatah to Mecca last week and then offering them $1 billion in aid, have made clear that their main desire is to preserve intra-Palestinian comity while weaning Hamas away from Iran.

Ms. Rice yesterday said she approved of the Saudi effort to stop the fighting. "We want calm between the Palestinians as well," she said.

The U.S. finds itself in a delicate place, facing the possibility it soon could be leading the opposition against a unity government that the Saudis helped put together. Arab states are eager to see the Palestinians end their internecine fighting. If Ms. Rice comes out strongly against the new government, she could create an even-greater backlash against the U.S. across the region and beyond. The U.S. and Israel would largely be alone if they tried hard to scuttle it.

After her talks with Israeli and Palestinian officials, Ms. Rice is scheduled to meet with an assortment of Arab ministers in Jordan before flying Tuesday to Berlin. Talks there, with representatives from the European Union, Russia and the United Nations, will be just as crucial, because the U.S. may have to push hard to keep in place the current international freeze on aid to the Palestinians if a new unity government is formed.

Rice Faces An Uphill Battle For A Mideast Breakthrough (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15 — On a chilly Saturday morning late last year, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, sat down alone in Ms. Rice's apartment at the Watergate here and hashed out a plan.

It was an ambitious one. To jump-start Arab-Israeli peace, Ms. Rice would encourage Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel to start talks with the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, leap-frogging interim details and squabbles, and instead trying to define the big "final status" issues of a Palestinian state, which have bedeviled peace negotiators since the Camp David accords of 1979.

"It's important to start sketching out broader political issues," Ms. Rice said Thursday in a group interview with newspaper correspondents at the State Department.

To some extent, the approach turned the clock back to the closing days of the Clinton administration, when a push toward a final settlement expired. Since then, the Bush administration has engaged the peace effort in fits and starts, and none of the paths has led far.

On Monday, Ms. Rice, Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas are scheduled to sit down in Jerusalem, ostensibly to discuss what Ms. Rice calls horizon issues: the fate of Jerusalem, the borders of a Palestinian state and the question of the treatment of Palestinian refugees.

But the timing could not be worse, American, Israeli and some Palestinian officials said. "If you invited a man from Mars down and asked him, 'Is this the moment to go for a breakthrough?' the answer would be categorically 'No,' " said Aaron David Miller, a scholar at the Woodrow Wilson Center who was a senior adviser for Arab-Israeli relations at the State Department under the last three presidents.

"What she's got going for her is that expectations of her success have plunged lower than the Dead Sea," said David Makovsky, a Middle East expert with the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. And that, he said, "might actually help her."

Prospects for any real breakthrough were already bleak two months ago, when Ms. Rice and Ms. Livni came up with their proposal. The Palestinian government was controlled by Hamas, which preaches Israel's destruction. Mr. Olmert's approval ratings were as bad as, if not worse, than those of President Bush. There was factional strife in Gaza, to the south, and turmoil in Lebanon, to the north.

Last week, one more giant obstacle emerged: a national unity government of Fatah and Hamas leaders that was worked out in talks brokered by Saudi Arabia in Mecca.

Bush administration officials, publicly lukewarm about the agreement, were angry with Mr. Abbas. They say the pact brings him closer to Hamas instead of bringing Hamas, which America views as a terrorist organization, closer to Mr. Abbas, who is seen as far more moderate.

In her session with reporters on Thursday, Ms. Rice said the task of negotiations had become "obviously more complicated because of the uncertainties surrounding the national unity government," and that the Bush administration would "await the formation of that government before we make any decisions about it."

The Bush administration, along with Israel and several European countries, wants the new Palestinian government to meet three benchmarks for normal relations: recognize the right of Israel to exist, forswear violence and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian accords. The Mecca accord does not address the first two benchmarks. The Palestinians argued that the three benchmarks were met implicitly, though the accord does not mention Israel.

While Ms. Rice was angry about the Mecca deal, she said that she would nonetheless go ahead with the planned summit, Arab and American officials said. But she has warned Mr. Abbas that the United States would deal only with Palestinian government ministers who explicitly agreed to the three conditions, the officials said.

So what was supposed to be a summit that shored up Mr. Abbas in the eyes of the Palestinian people by discussing a future Palestinian state may now downgrade to one in which Mr. Abbas spends his time trying to defend the Mecca deal and convince the United States and Israel that he has not sold out to Hamas.

Both Mr. Abbas, who is also known as Abu Mazen, and Mr. Olmert are politically weak, making compromise tricky. “If Olmert agrees to talk about Jerusalem, someone could threaten to leave his government,” said Martin S. Indyk, the United States ambassador to Israel in the Clinton administration. “If Abu Mazen talks about giving up the right of return, Hamas would condemn him for betraying the cause.” He was referring to giving Palestinian refugees the right to return to lands they left in 1948.

Still, Mr. Indyk, who is now the director of the Brookings Saban Center for Middle East Policy, said the Bush administration had let Arab-Israeli peace talks go untended for too long. Ms. Rice, he said, “deserves full support for trying, and she deserves to be given a chance and some rope and leeway to try to make this work.”

Palestinian Power-Sharing Deal Complicates Rice's Mideast Trip (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday that the formation of a Palestinian unity government that includes the Hamas militant group complicates her high-profile peace mission this weekend, strongly suggesting that the new government falls short of standards that would allow a resumption of international aid.

"Our position toward the Hamas government was very clear: It did not meet the international test," Rice told a group of newspaper reporters on the eve of her departure. "I have to say that we have not yet seen any evidence that this one will."

Rice added, "I don't deny that it's more complicated" now and that before the announcement of the unity government "it was clear, more black and white."

With prodding by Saudi Arabia, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas last week reached a deal with his Hamas rivals that would bring Abbas's Fatah party into the government. Yesterday, Abbas formally asked Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, of Hamas, to assemble the next cabinet.

Abbas's move has placed the United States in a quandary because, under Rice's formulation, he is a "mainstream" leader, while Hamas is an "extremist" group that needs to be isolated. The Bush administration has pushed a plan to bolster security forces loyal to Abbas in part because Hamas's security forces have gained strength, but at the same time the administration has said it wants an end to violence between Hamas and Fatah that has left scores dead. The unity accord is intended to end street battles between the factions.

After a weekend of meeting separately with Israeli and Palestinian officials, Rice intends to bring together Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Monday for a lengthy series of talks on the contours of a Palestinian state -- what she calls "the political horizon." She will then travel to Amman, Jordan, for meetings with Arab officials before flying to Berlin. There, she will meet with the other members of the "Quartet" -- Russia, the European Union and the United Nations-- which monitors Middle East peace and sets the conditions on aid to the Palestinians.

Rice's hope is that the "political horizon" will provide a vision for a Palestinian state that will inspire the Palestinians, strengthen Abbas and reduce the influence of anti-Israeli militants such as Hamas. The Palestinian people need to "know what is at stake for them in the future," Rice said. "Without a political horizon, it is going to be difficult to show why this course, the course of Abu Mazen, is better than other courses." Abu Mazen is Abbas's nickname.

Rice also hopes to prod Arab governments to begin the process of recognizing Israel as progress is made with the Palestinians -- a way of strengthening Olmert, who suffers from low public approval ratings. The "political horizon has to include them, and it has to include a relationship between them and Israel," Rice said, referring to Arab states.

Few details of the Palestinian unity agreement have been released, except a vague statement in which Abbas called upon Hamas to "respect international resolutions," which appeared to fall far short of international demands that the new government pledge to recognize Israel, renounce violence and abide by previous agreements signed by the Palestinian Authority. Hamas officials later told reporters that the movement has no intention of ever recognizing Israel.

Abbas aides hoped the unity accord would end the international boycott, but U.S. officials have made it clear in recent days that they will not deal with the new government as long as it does not meet the three conditions. Israeli officials have been very critical of Abbas's decision, saying it sets back the chances of reaching a peace agreement.

In the interview, Rice repeatedly defended Abbas, calling him "someone who has devoted his whole life to nonviolence," and said that no matter what happens with the unity government, the United States will continue to work with him because he has accepted the conditions. "It would be a very big mistake to not continue to deal with him," she said.

Rice said she is traveling to the region because "it is important to inject energy and confidence" in the dealings between Olmert and Abbas. Despite the uncertainty over the new government, "in the Middle East, if you wait for the perfect circumstances, I think you would probably never take the airplane," Rice said. "I am not going to let the fact that the circumstances are not perfect at this particular point in time delay what I think is extremely important work to be done."

Hopes Not High For Mideast Talks (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration's latest Middle East peace initiative, which begins this weekend, is taking place under a cloud of uncertainty because of Israeli anxiety about the complexion of a proposed Palestinian unity government.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will lead an American push to bring together Israeli and Palestinian leaders for the first talks in six years about the eventual shape of a longproposed independent Palestinian state.

But hopes for the U.S. mission have dimmed amid Israeli worries that a new power-sharing Palestinian government, while including more moderates, may not go far enough in rejecting the views of the militant Hamas party leaders who also will play a central role. Many Israelis have indicated they would be reluctant to try to work with such a government.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert declared his intention to cooperate Thursday, but Israeli Cabinet officials and other commentators have spoken pessimistically about the gathering, and some Palestinian Authority officials have expressed their own doubts.

Officials of the Hamas and Fatah movements have said they have a formula for dividing Cabinet positions, including leaving Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas as prime minister. The two sides did not name an interior minister, nor decide who will control the various agencies of the security services.

Rice acknowledged Thursday that the peace mission was "obviously more complicated because of the uncertainties surrounding the unity government." But she signaled that Washington would continue to push for progress by working through its primary ally, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, even if U.S. officials dislike the new Palestinian government.

"In the Middle East, if you wait for the perfect circumstances, you will never take the airplane," Rice said.

Under the Palestinian Authority structure, the president's office is separate from the administrative branches that will be overseen by the new ruling coalition. The United States could still provide aid and political support to Abbas even if the Bush administration decided it could not do business with the remainder of the Palestinian government.

Rice will meet over the weekend in bilateral sessions with Olmert and Abbas, and all three will meet Monday in Jerusalem.

Rice's mission is built around the idea that by renewing discussions of a Palestinian state, she can illustrate to Palestinians the advantages of choosing a moderate path rather than the violent resistance espoused by Hamas.

The administration also is eager to show allied Arab governments that it can make progress on Israeli-Palestinian issues, in hopes of strengthening their cooperation in stabilizing Iraq and resisting the influence of Iran.

But the politically weak Olmert government has been unenthusiastic about peacemaking overtures that could build pressure for Israeli concessions and further weaken its position.

Many Israelis have been wary of the unity Palestinian government, announced Feb. 8 in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, even though it will incorporate moderate and pro-Western Palestinian figures.

Abbas, who is eager to have world powers resume direct aid to the Palestinian Authority, said the Mecca deal committed the government to respect previous agreements. But critics said the Palestinians were not supporting the three principles called for by the diplomatic quartet of the United States, the United Nations, the European Union and Russia: recognizing Israel, repudiating violence and observing past agreements.

Israeli opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu on Monday urged Olmert to cancel the three-way talks in light of the Mecca agreement.

Although Olmert has agreed to go ahead with the talks, Israeli officials in Jerusalem say he does not want to engage in detailed negotiations until he learns directly from Abbas about the power-sharing deal.

For a start, he plans to demand the release of Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit, who was captured in June and is being held by Hamas.

"I think we will have a tough situation to convince Israel to deal with a unity government," said Abbas aide Nabil Amr. "But what can we do? This is what we achieved in Mecca."

The Bush administration denied news reports that U.S. officials privately told Palestinian officials that they would not recognize the new government.

There are also risks that the new government will not survive long. On Thursday, the Cabinet of the former Hamas government formally resigned, a procedural step required to open the way for the new team. But some observers believe the many unresolved issues, and the recent bloodshed between Hamas and Fatah, will make the new government inherently fragile.

A U.S. official defended proceeding with the talks.

"What happens to the government is important, but it doesn't change the ability, or the rationale, of Abbas engaging with the prime minister," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. "Can anyone argue that this will make less sense than it did when Hamas led the government?"

U.S. officials play down their expectations for the three-way meeting, characterizing it as an informal discussion.

2 Palestinian Leaders Meet To Pave Way For A New Cabinet (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

GAZA, Feb. 15 — After months of difficult negotiations and bloody Palestinian street fighting, the Hamas-led Palestinian government resigned Thursday to pave the way for a unity government that will include Hamas and the rival Fatah movement.

Prime Minister Ismail Haniya of Hamas submitted his cabinet's resignation on Thursday evening at a meeting with the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, at Mr. Abbas's seaside compound in Gaza City. The agreement is intended to help prevent a resurgence of the internal Palestinian battles that have claimed nearly 100 lives in the Gaza Strip since December.

There was no immediate sign that a new Palestinian government would win a restoration of direct financial assistance that Israel and Western countries cut when Hamas came to power a year ago.

American diplomats told Mr. Abbas, who is from Fatah, that Washington would shun the new government as long as it did not meet several conditions, according to one of Mr. Abbas's top aides, who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

Israel, the United States and the European Union have demanded that the Palestinian government recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous agreements. But with Mr. Haniya set to retain his post in the new government, which will again include many prominent Hamas figures, it appears highly unlikely that the new cabinet will explicitly meet the conditions.

"I am not certain that the full scope of this agreement is clear to anyone," Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, who was in Turkey on Thursday, said on Turkish television. "The initial signs are not very encouraging."

The Bush administration, like the Israeli government, has contacts with Mr. Abbas. But Israel and the United States refuse to deal with Hamas, which they classify as a terrorist organization.

Washington's stance toward a new Palestinian government may be clarified when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice arrives for a meeting with Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas, set for Monday in Jerusalem.

Mr. Abbas seeks a resumption of negotiations with Israel, which collapsed six years ago, several months after the Palestinians began an uprising in September 2000.

"The unity government must be given a chance," said Nabil Abu Rudeineh, a spokesman for Mr. Abbas. "After the formation of the unity government there shouldn't be any excuse for not holding negotiations."

Mr. Haniya's resignation was mostly a formality, as Mr. Abbas immediately asked him to form the new government, which is to be presented to the Palestinian parliament for approval within five weeks.

Hamas will continue to hold the largest number of cabinet posts. Fatah, which refused to take part in the previous government after losing elections to Hamas last year, will have at least a half dozen ministerial portfolios, and other factions and independents will also have posts.

"Brother Ismail Haniya presented me with his government's resignation, and I charged him with forming his new cabinet," Mr. Abbas said Thursday after their meeting. "We call on you to be committed to the high interests of the Palestinian people," he said to Mr. Haniya.

There was no word on who would hold the key post of interior minister, overseeing several branches of the security forces, including the police. Mr. Abbas is responsible for all other security agencies.

Under a preliminary agreement reached last week in Saudi Arabia, Hamas is to nominate an independent figure to lead the Interior Ministry, and Mr. Abbas can accept or reject the choice. Security force members, some loyal to Fatah, others to Hamas, were deeply involved in the recent Palestinian infighting in Gaza.

Palestinians celebrated in the streets when Hamas and Fatah announced their agreement last week. But on Thursday many expressed doubts about whether a unity government would survive.

Rawya Shawa, an opposition member of the Palestinian parliament, said she would vote to support a unity government, but without much enthusiasm. "In principle I support power-sharing," she said, "but it won't be easy for Hamas and Fatah to get along together, and I'm not sure a unity government will last long."

Hamas And Fatah Act To Clear Way For Palestinian Unity Government (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 15 -- Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, of Hamas, resigned Thursday to make way for a power-sharing government with the rival Fatah party in the hopes of ending factional strife and restoring international aid to the nearly bankrupt Palestinian Authority.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, a Fatah leader, immediately reappointed Haniyeh to assemble the next cabinet. At a news conference in Gaza City, Abbas said he hoped the step would "inaugurate a new Palestinian era in which people live in peace and security."

The next cabinet's composition was set out in an agreement that Abbas and Hamas leaders reached last week in the holy Islamic city of Mecca, Saudi Arabia, although who will fill some of the key ministries has been a point of debate between the two sides for the past few days.

Palestinian officials said they hope the next government will prove acceptable to international donors, who cut off aid to the Palestinian Authority after Hamas's victory in January 2006 parliamentary elections. The win gave Hamas, a radical Islamic movement that does not recognize Israel, effective control of the Palestinian government, which had been run by the secular Fatah party for more than a decade.

The aid embargo and Israel's decision to stop transferring the tax revenue it collects on the Palestinian Authority's behalf have crippled the government and sharpened the longtime rivalry between the two largest political movements in the occupied territories.

The parties' armed wings, as well as security forces loyal to each, have clashed repeatedly over the past year, particularly in the Gaza Strip. More than 100 Palestinians have died in partisan violence in that period, most of them since December, when Abbas threatened to call early elections to end the political stalemate.

The fighting gave way to relief and celebration Feb. 8, when the two sides agreed on the terms of a unity government that gives Hamas nine cabinet seats, Fatah six and some smaller parties four. Haniyeh's cabinet, sworn in last March, included only Hamas members and supporters.

Hamas will keep the post of prime minister but give up several important ministries.

Talks in recent days focused on who would fill those posts, including the top job at the Interior Ministry, which effectively controls some of the most powerful Palestinian security services. Under the agreement, Hamas will nominate an independent candidate, although party officials have resisted the stipulation that Abbas must first approve their choice.

In addition, Hamas and Fatah must agree on an independent candidate to be foreign minister. The consensus choice appears to be Ziad Abu Amr, a longtime mediator between the parties who won his parliamentary seat as an independent with Hamas's backing. Abbas also reportedly wants Mohammed Dahlan, a senior Fatah official who has enormous influence within the security services, to be deputy prime minister. Dahlan is loathed by Hamas for the violent crackdown he led against the group in Gaza during the 1990s.

"These questions will be resolved in the course of putting the government together," said Saeb Erekat, a Fatah lawmaker and the chief Palestinian negotiator with Israel. "Internally speaking, we're moving in the right direction. But will this program solve our problems with the international community? That's the key question."

Haniyeh has five weeks to assemble the cabinet, which under the terms of the accord will "respect" agreements with Israel signed by the Fatah-dominated Palestine Liberation Organization.

But Hamas officials have made clear that the new government will not recognize Israel's right to exist, a condition international donors have set for the resumption of aid.

The United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations -- known as the Quartet -- had previously demanded that Hamas recognize Israel, renounce violence and abide by previous agreements in return for aid.

Neither Israel nor the Quartet has taken a formal position on the next government's platform, which will be a major point of discussion during meetings this weekend among visiting Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Abbas.

Palestinian Deal Complicates Work Toward Peace, Rice Says (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday that her efforts to broker an Israeli-Palestinian peace have been complicated by an agreement by feuding Palestinian factions to form a joint government.

Rice said the Bush administration had not rejected the Cabinet being formed by the secular Fatah and militant Hamas movements. But she said there is no sign the new government would recognize Israel — as demanded by the administration and the Israeli government.

Rice leaves Friday for the Middle East. She is to meet Monday in Jerusalem with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

Agreement to form the government was reached Feb. 8 in Saudi Arabia. Hamas did not renounce violence or affirm Israel's right to exist. Those are conditions for U.S. recognition and aid.

The Bush administration has sought to bolster Fatah and its leader, Abbas, by holding talks to begin to sketch the contours of a Palestinian state. Rice said she was going ahead with the meeting with Abbas and Olmert.

"In the Middle East, if you wait for perfect circumstances, you would never take the airplane," she said.

Abbas, Rice said, has a record of opposing violence and recognizing Israel. "It would be a very big mistake not to continue to deal with him," she said.

Robert Satloff, director of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said the prospect of a Fatah-Hamas government made chances for a peace agreement unlikely. Abbas "has chosen internal unity over the potential for diplomatic progress," Satloff said.

Weak leadership on both the Palestinian and Israeli sides, along with the growing influence of Iran and Syria, also undermine chances for success, said Aaron Miller, a Middle East adviser to six former secretaries of State.

"You can't build the house if the foundation is not put together in a sound way," he said.

Rice Wary Of Mideast Peace Trip (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday that the "uncertainty" of the new Palestinian government will complicate her peace mission in the Middle East next week and that Washington will not support the future Cabinet unless it recognizes Israel.

Miss Rice made her comments hours after Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas formally asked Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of the Hamas militant group to form the next government after last week's agreement between Hamas and Mr. Abbas' Fatah faction in Saudi Arabia.

"It's more complicated with the horizon of a government we don't yet know what its character will be, but in the Middle East, if you wait for the perfect circumstances, I think you'll probably never take an airplane," Miss Rice, who leaves for the region today, told a small group of newspaper reporters.

"The efforts to try and get the Palestinians to live at peace, to stop fighting ... is something that we understand and will support," she said. "Whether or not we can then support the government that came out of that, I think we've been very clear: The Quartet principles will have to be respected."

Those principles of the international mediators -- the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations -- are renouncing violence and accepting the Palestinians' previous international agreements, as well as recognizing Israel.

Miss Rice said that when she meets with Mr. Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Monday, they will "begin a conversation" about "moving forward" toward a Palestinian state.

She will meet with them separately over the weekend and also will hold talks with King Abdullah II of Jordan and other Arab leaders in Amman, Jordan.

On her return, the secretary will stop in Berlin for a Quartet meeting on Wednesday.

Mr. Abbas also urged Hamas yesterday to accept the Quartet's conditions so the West can lift a ban on financial assistance for the Palestinians.

That ban contributed to the inability of Hamas' first government, which emerged from last year's elections, to provide some basic services to the Palestinian people and even pay the salaries of some civil servants.

The United States and Europe have said Hamas, which they have designated as a terrorist organization, has to make a choice between terrorism and being a political party that fulfills its election promises.

Aides to Mr. Abbas were quoted by wire reports as saying C. David Welch, assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, warned Mr. Abbas during a telephone conversation yesterday that Washington would not deal with members of the new government -- even those from Fatah -- unless it meets the Quartet conditions.

The aides also said that Jacob Walles, the U.S. consul-general in Jerusalem, delivered the same message to Mr. Abbas in person at a meeting in the West Bank town of Ramallah. The consulate confirmed the meeting took place but did not disclose its content.

Miss Rice declined to discuss private exchanges, though she said the administration's message is the same in public and in private.

She also said that the United States will continue to deal with Mr. Abbas because he has demonstrated that he respects the Quartet's principles.

The administration has pledged $86 million in aid for Mr. Abbas' security forces, but Rep. Nita M. Lowey, New York Democrat and chairwoman of the House Appropriations Committee, has blocked the funding.

"Early last week, I placed a hold on the $86 million," she said yesterday. "It is imperative that we have a fuller understanding of exactly what the funding is for and what the situation is on the ground."

Defense Chief Again Says U.S. Will Not Wage War With Iran (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

DOJ_NMG_0132919

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15 — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said Thursday that the United States had no intention of attacking Iran and that any American military efforts against it would be confined to Iraq to disrupt the smuggling of bomb-making materials over the border.

"For the umpteenth time, we are not looking for an excuse to go to war with Iran," he said at a Pentagon news conference. "We are not planning a war with Iran."

Even if the Bush administration were able to establish that Iran's top leaders knew and authorized the smuggling, Mr. Gates said, there would probably be no change in the Bush administration's strategy of limiting its military response to actions within Iraq.

Questions about the administration's intentions toward Iran have re-emerged in recent days after senior officials, beginning last weekend, laid out what they said was evidence that bomb-making materials from Iran were being supplied to Shiite militants in Iraq.

Mr. Gates and Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, repeated Thursday that weapons used against American troops were coming from Iran and that personnel from the Quds Force, a paramilitary arm of the country's Revolutionary Guards, were involved.

But both officials said, as President Bush did at a White House news conference on Wednesday, that they lacked evidence that Iran's top leaders were involved in the weapons smuggling.

"Whether or not more senior political leaders in Iran know, we don't know," Mr. Gates told reporters in the Pentagon. "Frankly, for me, either way it's a worry."

General Pace ignited some controversy earlier this week while visiting Indonesia, when he told reporters that American forces had confirmed that some bomb materials found inside Iraq were made in Iran, but "that does not translate that the Iranian government, per se, for sure, is directly involved in doing this."

Those remarks conflicted with comments by a senior Defense Department analyst who said, at a briefing in Baghdad over the weekend, that the effort was being directed "from the highest levels of the Iranian government."

Asked about the discrepancy, General Pace said Thursday that the analyst in Baghdad "didn't make a clear enough break between fact and assessment" when he said there was high-level Iranian involvement, "or those listening didn't hear the break between fact and assessment."

Mr. Gates said he was sensitive to the public skepticism about American intelligence claims as a result of faulty prewar intelligence about Iraq. He said he insisted that the statements about Iranian weapons smuggling "make it exactly clear what we know and what we don't know."

In an interview on Thursday, the speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, said the United States could not invade Iran without specific Congressional authority.

"The president has said that he supports a diplomatic solution of the situation in Iran," Ms. Pelosi said, speaking to six reporters in her office. "I would take him at his word. I do believe that Congress should assert itself, though, and make it very clear that there is no previous authority for any president to go into Iran."

Iran Provided Bombs, Pentagon Says (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

Senior defense and military leaders said yesterday that Iran's government is behind the providing of deadly bombs to Iraqi insurgents, although it is difficult to say whether senior Iranian leaders approved the shipments.

"We know that the Quds force is involved. We know the Quds force is a paramilitary arm of the [Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps (IRGC)], so we assume that the leadership of the IRGC knows about this," Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates told reporters.

"Whether or not more senior political leaders in Iran know about it, we don't know," he said. "And frankly, for me, either way it's a worry. Either they do know and have approved it, or they don't know and the IRGC may be acting on their own in Iraq."

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, qualified earlier comments that he doubted high-level Iranian government linkage to special armor-piercing bombs and rockets found in Iraq.

"What I tried to say when I said I didn't know about the Iranian government, I'm talking about the top two or three people in the government," Gen. Pace said, noting that "we do not have proof that the senior leadership in Iran is directing these activities in Iraq."

The level of Iranian government involvement is secondary to the danger the arms pose to U.S. and coalition forces, he said.

"We know that there are explosives and weapons being used inside of Iraq that were manufactured in Iran," Gen. Pace said.

Also, on two occasions during operations to attack networks supplying improvised bombs, "we had policed up Iranians," he said. "We know that those Iranians are Quds force members. Those are facts."

The comments came after a senior defense official in Baghdad said Sunday that the Iranian arms shipments -- including shaped charge explosives, shoulder-fired missiles and armor-piercing rockets -- had been directed by the highest levels of the Iranian government.

Mr. Gates also cautiously defended the tentative nuclear deal with North Korea, saying it is "a very important first step."

"The timelines are very tight ... we're talking months, not years for actions that have to be taken," he said. "I think that if the deal is structured in a way that we will be able to monitor compliance before the United States or the other countries have had to do very much, in terms of whether the North Koreans are complying with the agreement that they've signed."

Critics of the accord, including former U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton, have said the agreement makes too many concessions to North Korea.

Asked what steps were being taken to stop the flow of Iranian weapons, Mr. Gates said there is a major effort under way to disrupt the supply networks.

"The explosively formed projectiles are a real problem because they're so lethal," he said. "But the fact is that a bigger problem is the [improvised explosive device] problem in general, and those are coming from a lot of sources, including from inside Iraq."

The Iranian-supplied armor-piercing IED are a relatively small percentage of the homemade bombs, he said.

"So our focus is more broadly on disrupting these IED networks throughout Iraq," he said. "The Iranian responsibility for one set of them is a concern. We are taking action to try to deal with that, but it's part of a much larger problem."

On reports that Iraqi Shi'ite militia leader Muqtada al-Sadr has fled to Iran, Mr. Gates said there is no proof he is there but that as a result of current stepped-up operations in Baghdad "these guys will go to ground."

Gen. Pace was asked about the release of U.S. Central Command documents from the start of the Iraq war and said one assumption that turned out wrong was the collapse of the Iraqi army.

"One assumption was that the Iraqi army, once freed of Saddam's dictatorship, would become a force of good for the people and that it would be a standing army at the time of liberation," Gen. Pace said. "As you know, it disintegrated in the very early hours of the fight, and therefore there was no army of some 400,000 Iraqis who were able to then provide security for their country."

Pelosi: Bush Lacks Power To Invade Iran (AP)

By David Espo

AP, February 16, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Thursday that President Bush lacks the authority to invade Iran without specific approval from Congress, a fresh challenge to the commander in chief on the eve of a symbolic vote critical of his troop buildup in Iraq.

Pelosi, D-Calif., noted that Bush consistently said he supports a diplomatic resolution to differences with Iran "and I take him at his word."

At the same time, she said, "I do believe that Congress should assert itself, though, and make it very clear that there is no previous authority for the president, any president, to go into Iran."

DOJ_NMG_0132921

Pelosi spoke in an interview in the Capitol as lawmakers plowed through a third day of marathon debate in the House on a nonbinding measure opposing the administration's plan to increase troop strength in Iraq — and as Democrats readied a more provocative challenge to the president.

That included drafting legislation to require the Pentagon to meet certain standards for training and equipping the troops, as well fixing the time that military units must be given at home between deployments. "That stops the surge (in troops) for all intents and purposes, because .....they cannot sustain the deployment," said Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, who said he would attach the conditions to legislation providing nearly $100 billion for the military.

Republicans quickly fired back. Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the GOP leader, issued a statement saying the plan would "pull the rug out from under American troops in the combat zone by cutting off their reinforcements and forcing them to face the enemy without our full support."

Across the Capitol, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid unexpectedly announced plans to hold a test vote on Saturday on the same nonbinding measure critical of the troop increase that was making its way through the House.

Partisan bickering has prevented a Senate vote so far, with Republicans insisting on equal treatment for an alternative that rules out the "elimination or reduction of funds for troops in the field."

Pelosi and other Democrats have said approval on the nonbinding measure would mark the first step in an effort by the new Democratic-controlled Congress to force Bush to change course in a war that has killed more than 3,100 U.S. troops.

Bush administration officials and their allies are resigned to House passage of the resolution and have worked in recent days to hold down defections by GOP lawmakers.

But Bush, who has challenged lawmakers not to cut off funds for the troops, took a swipe at his critics during the day.

"This may become the first time in the history of the United States Congress that it has voted to send a new commander into battle and then voted to oppose his plan that is necessary to succeed in that battle," the president said.

The Senate unanimously confirmed Lt. Gen David Petraeus last week to take over as the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

Bush said at a news conference Wednesday there is no doubt the Iranian government is providing armor-piercing weapons to kill American troops in Iraq. But he backed away from claims the top echelon of Iran's government was responsible.

Administration critics have accused the president of looking for a pretense to attack the Islamic republic, which is also at loggerheads with the United Nations about what Tehran says is a nuclear program aimed at developing energy for peaceful purposes.

Defending U.S. intelligence that has pinpointed Iran as a hostile arms supplier in Iraq, Bush said, "Does this mean you're trying to have a pretext for war? No. It means I'm trying to protect our troops."

Bush has asked Congress to approve $100 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Congressional Democrats are hoping to insert provisions that would make it harder for the administration to follow through on its plan to deploy an additional 21,500 combat troops to Iraq.

Murtha, in a video aired on movecongress.org, a coalition of groups opposed to the war, said his proposals were designed with the safety and protection of the troops in mind.

The Pennsylvania Democrat also said the measure may be changed to prohibit any military action against Iran without specific congressional approval.

Asked about Murtha's remarks, Pelosi said, "I fully support that." She added that she would propose it as stand-alone legislation if it is not included in the bill that provides more money for the Iraq war.

Bush has said he intends to go ahead with the troop buildup regardless of nonbinding expressions of disapproval in Congress.

But, Pelosi said, "I don't think that the president can completely ignore it."

She spoke down the hall from the House chamber, where Republicans and Democrats alternated turns at the microphone in a debate on the war.

"The enemy wants our men and women in uniform to think their Congress doesn't care about them," said Rep. Sam Johnson, R-Texas, who was a prisoner of war during Vietnam. "We must learn from our mistakes. We cannot leave a job undone like we left in Korea, like we left in Vietnam, like we left in Somalia," Johnson said.

DOJ_NMG_0132922

Added Rep. Geoff Davis, R-Ky., a West Point graduate who was a flight commander with the Army's 82nd Airborne: "This nonbinding resolution serves no purpose other than pacifying the Democrats' political base and lowering morale in our military."

When his turn came to speak, Rep. Lloyd Doggett, D-Texas., said, "There is a better way of protecting our troops than sending more of them to be killed."

Rep. James Clyburn of South Carolina, a member of the Democratic leadership, said the victory to be won in Iraq "is not a military conquest."

"The victory we seek is earned through the restoration of America's role as peacemaker, not warmonger," he said.

Japan Freezes Assets Related To Iran (AFP)

AFP, February 16, 2007

The Japanese government has decided to freeze the assets of 10 groups and 12 individuals related to Iran's nuclear and missile programmes, under a UN sanction resolution approved in December.

"We must execute the measures with a determined will and resolve because (the Iranian nuclear problem) affects the nuclear non-proliferation regime and North Korea's nuclear problem," foreign minister Taro Aso told reporters after the cabinet approved the measures.

The cabinet of Prime Minister Shinzo Abe also decided to ban transfer of funds in connection with Iran's sensitive nuclear and ballistic missile programmes.

The measures will become effective Saturday.

Japan, despite being a close US ally, has maintained close trade ties with Iran. Asia's largest economy is almost entirely dependent on the Middle East for its oil, and imports about 15 percent of its total oil consumption from Iran.

Last year, the UN Security Council unanimously approved a resolution imposing sanctions that target Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programmes.

Aso called on Iran to stop its uranium enrichment activities and return to the negotiating table before and after the passage of the resolution.

Western countries backed the sanctions, fearing Iran could use uranium enrichment activities to develop nuclear weapons.

Iran, which says its programme is for peaceful purposes, vowed to expand its enrichment.

Iran's Smoking Guns (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

Following the weekend intelligence disclosures about Iranian-supplied weapons killing GIs in Iraq, we predicted Tuesday that "a large part of Washington will pretend the evidence doesn't exist, or suggest the intelligence isn't proven, or claim that it's all the Bush Administration's fault for 'bullying' Iran." Sure enough, President Bush faced a barrage of questions Wednesday wondering whether senior Iranian leaders were really aware of the weapons transfers, whether he was using "faulty intelligence," and whether the disclosures were part of a strategy designed to "provoke Iran."

So here is the state of our public discourse: American military officials present prima facie evidence of Iranian weapons implicated in killing 170 U.S. soldiers and wounding 600 more, and Washington's main concern is not for the GIs but in refighting the last intelligence war.

Well, here's an item that doesn't seem to have been manufactured by Dick Cheney. According to a report in Britain's Daily Telegraph, U.S. forces in Baghdad have recently discovered 100 high-powered sniper rifles made by Austrian gun-maker Steyr-Mannlicher. The .50-caliber Steyr can accurately fire an armor-piercing round at a range of 1,500 meters. The weapon is good against Humvees, helicopters and body armor.

In 2004, Iran purchased some 800 Steyrs, allegedly for use against drug traffickers. At the time, both U.S. and British officials urged the Austrian government to bar the $15 million sale, fearing the weapons would fall into enemy hands. Former Austrian Chancellor Wolfang Schüssel thought otherwise, and let the deal go forward. To better grease the skids, then-Steyr-Mannlicher CEO Wolfgang Fürlinger made the case that the weapons were basically harmless and that Tehran had signed "end-user certificates" guaranteeing they would not be re-sold, according to the German newsweekly Der Spiegel.

Today, the Austrian government pleads that the sale had been "checked very thoroughly," and that "what happened to the weapons . . . is the responsibility of the Iranians" -- which prompts the question of why the Austrians would have bothered with the end-user certificates. The Bush Administration took a less cavalier view and in 2005 banned Steyr-Mannlicher from bidding for U.S. government contracts.

It remains to be confirmed whether the serial numbers on the Steyrs found in Iraq match those from the 2004 sale -- if they do, it ought to prompt a top-to-bottom review of all Austrian military contracts. Meantime, is it too much to expect American journalists and Members of Congress to devote as much skepticism to Iran's motives and behavior as they do to Mr. Bush's?

Egypt Cracks Down On Muslim Brotherhood (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack And Noha El Hennawy

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

CAIRO — Egypt's regime is seizing upon a moment of regional chaos and U.S. inattention to crack down aggressively on the country's most popular opposition group and shore up its hold on power, analysts here say.

In a bald push against the Muslim Brotherhood, the secular government in recent weeks has arrested hundreds of activists, unveiled new restrictions on political Islam and published a stream of anti-Brotherhood propaganda in the state-run media. More than 80 members were jailed on Thursday alone, Brotherhood officials said.

"This is the most brutal campaign against the Brothers since [Egyptian President Hosni] Mubarak came to power," said Amr Shobaki, a political analyst and Muslim Brotherhood expert at the Al Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo.

With the U.S. distracted by the war in Iraq and increasingly nervous about the regional rise of political Islam, Mubarak's regime appears free to squeeze the Brotherhood, which has long been officially outlawed — though tolerated — as an Islamist opposition force.

About 300 Brotherhood members have been imprisoned of late, including at least 100 senior activists. Some of the prisoners' assets were frozen by order of the government. Meanwhile, Egyptian officials and their media mouthpieces have accused the group of creating armed militias and receiving aid from Iran.

"The banned Muslim Brotherhood group is dangerous to Egypt's security," Mubarak told an Egyptian newspaper in a recent interview. If the group gets more powerful, "investments will stop and unemployment will increase…. Egypt will be completely isolated from the rest of the world."

Brotherhood activists have seen a severe shrinking of leeway since 2005, when they stunned the country by capturing one-fifth of the parliamentary seats in national elections. Back then, U.S. officials said the invasion of Iraq would deliver democracy to the Arab world, and Egyptian officials portrayed the empowerment of Brotherhood members as a necessary step toward democratization.

"Democracy cannot progress in Egypt without deciding what to do with them," a ruling party official said at the time.

But voting has empowered Islamists across the board: Hamas in the Palestinian territories, Hezbollah in Lebanon, Iranian-backed Shiite parties in Iraq, in addition to the Muslim Brotherhood.

Egypt is a major recipient of U.S. aid and a partner in a chilly, often contentious peace with Israel. Mubarak's struggle to appease his allies, hold on to power and tamp down the popular Brotherhood has long been considered a litmus test of Islamist strength across the region.

Not its first battle

Formed in the 1920s to advocate Islam and oppose secular and Western influence, the Brotherhood has a history of battling Egypt's governments. With its vast network of social services, it is deeply popular among religious Egyptians who regard it as a non-corrupt answer to cronyism and decadence. Mubarak has controlled Egypt for a quarter of a century, permitting virtually no dissent. As the one movement he hasn't been able to squelch, the Brotherhood is his nemesis. At the same time, it allows Mubarak and his inner circle to justify their repressive style of rule by claiming that the only other option is an Islamist state administered by the Brotherhood.

The elections played neatly into that argument. Many analysts here believe the Bush administration began to back away nervously from its democracy push when it saw Islamists winning at the polls across the Middle East.

Egypt's hand also has been strengthened by the instability in Iraq and the Palestinian territories, conflicts that have forced the United States to call on powerful Sunni allies in Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Jordan for diplomatic and political backing.

Nabil Abdel Fattah, an analyst at the Al Ahram Center, said the war in Iraq "has given more weight to the Egyptian foreign policy, which will give the government leeway in dealing with the Muslim Brotherhood."

"The regional and international atmospheres have become convenient," Fattah said. "Attacks against the group will continue in order to send strong messages."

A criminal court acquitted several prominent Brotherhood detainees last month, but they were immediately returned to prison while their cases were sent to military court.

In the most startling and incendiary charge, the Egyptian government has begun to accuse the Brotherhood of forming and training underground militias. In news stories short on details, officials say they have seized documents proving that the Brotherhood has secret cells dedicated to provoking civil disobedience.

The accusations mark a serious departure from the status quo between the regime and the Brotherhood, considered the only opposition group with any serious street popularity.

The old understanding was simple: The Brotherhood was officially outlawed but treated with grudging tolerance. The group didn't try to overthrow the government, and in exchange, the regime looked the other way when the movement slipped its leaders into parliament by running them as "independents."

Trying new strategies

Lately, the mounting pressure seems to have pitched the group into crisis, forcing it to cast about for ways to cement its foothold in the government.

Brotherhood leaders have taken pains to tailor their words for an intellectual, even Westernized, audience. Their speeches are carefully moderate, scrupulously tolerant and reverent toward democracy.

Seeking to calm fears that it would morph into another Taliban if it gained power, the group has reached out to Egyptian Christians. Seeking to ease concern about women's rights, it fielded a female candidate in last year's elections. (She lost.) And in an improbable move, a Brotherhood leader recently told The Times that the Islamic head scarf was a choice for women, not an obligation.

But the group's quest for credibility has been badly undercut by a series of public relations disasters.

Brotherhood lawmakers raged in parliament after Culture Minister Farouk Hosni told a female reporter that the head scarf was a sign of "backwardness" and "regression." They demanded that Hosni be replaced by someone who "respects the constitution and the Islamic Sharia," and they called unanimously for a no-confidence vote. Veiled women marched in protest; clerics issued a storm of condemnations.

Though the uproar eventually died down, it left feminists and secular-leaning Egyptians more leery than ever about the Brotherhood. The hubbub also fed the perception that Brotherhood lawmakers have neglected the issues of poverty and housing in favor of showy campaigns to advertise their Islamist credentials.

Abdel Moneim Abul Fotouh, a Brotherhood leader, defended the group's record in parliament. Members have done their best to chip away at a repressive government, he said at his office near downtown Cairo.

"The problem is, we work under a despotic, corrupt regime that doesn't really care about the members of parliament, that only cares about the ruling elite," Fotouh said.

Student demonstration

But the woes in parliament were nothing compared with the scandal that erupted at Al Azhar University, the storied seat of Sunni Muslim learning.

In December, young men from the Brotherhood's student group dressed in black and staged a military-style parade, complete with martial arts demonstrations, to protest restrictions on student political activities at Al Azhar. The action shocked a nation where public demonstrations have been banned since President Anwar Sadat was shot dead by soldiers in a 1981 military procession, and it fueled fear that the Brotherhood might have secret militias.

"This militia show defied the state and contradicted all the peaceful ideas the Muslim Brotherhood talks about," Fattah said.

Brotherhood leader Fotouh dismissed the students' spectacle as a meaningless display and said the government had inflated the event's importance to harm the group's reputation.

"They were just amusing themselves by putting on this show," he said. "The regime brought the media to cover it to use against the Muslim Brotherhood."

Despite the tension, or perhaps in reaction to it, the Brotherhood has announced that members are drawing up a political platform for a party. Although the regime is unlikely to consider giving the group a license, the move is widely seen as an attempt to continue the Brotherhood's push into mainstream politics.

"What we're really afraid of is to have a popular explosion in Egypt due to corruption, unemployment and poverty," Fotouh said. "If we don't work on rescuing our nation, this can happen."

Russia Threatens To Quit Arms Treaty (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo, Neil Buckley, Daniel Dombey And Jan Cienski

Financial Times, February 16, 2007

Russia threatened on Thursday to pull out of a landmark nuclear arms control treaty unless the US backed away from plans to install its missile defence shield in Eastern Europe.

Yury Baluyevsky, the Russian army chief of staff, said Moscow might unilaterally withdraw from the 1987 Intermediate-range Nuclear Forces treaty, which forced the US and the Soviet Union to ban nuclear and conventional ground-launched ballistic and cruise missiles with ranges of 500 to 5,500km.

There was “convincing evidence” for leaving the agreement because “many countries are developing and perfecting medium-range rockets”, he said.

But the general also explicitly linked Russia’s stance to the US’s plans to extend its missile defence into central Europe.

The Pentagon is preparing to start negotiations with Poland and the Czech Republic about hosting missile interceptors and radars. Jaroslaw Kaczynski, Polish prime minister, on Thursday expressed conditional support for participating in the system.

A senior Pentagon official said the US would “resist” the Russian move, which he said would have serious implications for American allies in Europe.

The INF treaty includes the right for a party to withdraw with six months’ notice if “extraordinary events ... jeopardised its supreme interests”. The State Department said Russia had not formally notified the US of any move to abrogate the treaty.

Gen Baluyevsky’s comments came days after Vladimir Putin, Russian president, warned that US attempts to deploy part of its missile shield in Poland could spark a new arms race.

Mr Putin said the INF treaty was no longer in its interests because of proliferation of short and medium-range missiles. He rejected US assertions that the system was aimed at countries such as North Korea and Iran, not at Russia.

The US official said Russia had privately told the US it wanted medium-range missiles to counter Iranian threats while arguing publicly that the lack of Iranian missiles meant the US did not need a defence system.

Col-Gen Leonid Ivashov, a former senior Russian defence official, said Moscow had “every reason” to pull out of the treaty. He pointed to the US withdrawal in 2002 from the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile treaty.

Yuri Solomonov, director of the Moscow Institute of Thermal Technology, which manufactures missiles, told Itar-Tass news agency Russia was ready to resume production of medium-range ballistic missiles.

Nato officials said Russia intended to pressure Poland and the Czech Republic to reject US plans, but added that what Moscow really wanted was to be included in a European-wide anti-missile system.

“We are already talking to the Russians about co-operating on tactical missile defence for armies in the field,” said a senior Nato diplomat.

Russian Leader Expands Powers Of A Possible Successor (WP)

By Peter Finn

DOJ_NMG_0132926

MOSCOW, Feb. 15 -- President Vladimir Putin promoted Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov to the post of first deputy prime minister Thursday, an elevation that immediately intensified speculation that Putin might favor him as his successor.

"Ivanov has been coping and coping well with the day-to-day tasks of the Defense Ministry," Putin said at a televised government meeting where he announced the promotion as part of a government reshuffle. "Given the expansion of his powers, Ivanov will no longer be able to keep the post of defense minister."

Ivanov, 54, will now be charged with overseeing Russia's military-industrial complex as well as part of the civilian economy. He was recently put in charge of consolidating and revitalizing Russia's aviation industry.

"In terms of the succession, this is definitely another step for Ivanov," said Olga Kryshtanovskaya, director of the Moscow-based Center for the Study of Elites, in an interview. "He will become a less parochial and more universal figure for the public. And that is essential if he is to become president."

Ivanov bade farewell to senior Defense Ministry staff in a ceremony Thursday night. "I remember well how Vladimir Vladimirovich introduced me in this same hall six years ago," he said, using Putin's first two names. "A long time, but it now seems like one moment. I want to thank you all for backing me."

But for all the apparent nostalgia, the new brief allows Ivanov to shed a ministry fraught with political risk because of the Russian military's propensity to generate scandals, particularly the violent hazing of young recruits. The death of a young conscript last year and Ivanov's slowness in responding to it briefly galvanized public opinion against him.

Ivanov's new position puts him on the same level in government as Dmitri Medvedev, who is also a first deputy prime minister and chairman of the energy conglomerate Gazprom. The two men now appear to be in an open contest for Putin's nod -- the decisive factor in determining who will become president in elections in March 2008.

Putin said this month that he will make his choice known during the campaign early next year. Because of his huge popularity and standing with voters, his endorsement will certainly swing the job to his preferred candidate, according to numerous opinion polls and analysts here.

Russian officials, including Ivanov, have rejected claims that Putin will simply anoint a successor who will be rubber-stamped through a controlled election.

"We won't have any successors or crown princes," Ivanov said last week at an international security conference in Munich, where Putin launched a blistering attack on U.S. foreign policy. "Who will be the president of Russia is for the Russian people to decide in the March 2008 elections. In this respect Russia does not differ from any other democracy in the world."

Like Putin, Ivanov had a long career as a KGB official. In private meetings, he displays a low-key toughness that is similar to the president's. He speaks English fluently, having lived for several months with a family in London as a student. He also speaks Swedish and reportedly served in Sweden. But as with many aspects of his 20 years in foreign intelligence, it is unclear exactly where he served.

Both Ivanov and Medvedev have ties to the president that reach back to their mutual home town, St. Petersburg. Medvedev, a 41-year-old lawyer, worked with Putin in city hall in St. Petersburg in the early 1990s. There they formed a bond that led Putin to bring Medvedev into the presidential administration in Moscow.

Ivanov and Putin both served in the Leningrad Directorate of the KGB, although Putin and Ivanov have said they did not know each other very well at the time. Since Putin first moved to Moscow in 1996, initially to take an administrative position in the Kremlin, the two have become increasingly close. In August 1998, Ivanov became deputy director of the FSB, the internal security agency, which Putin headed at the time.

In November 1999, Ivanov moved to the Kremlin on the recommendation of Putin, then prime minister, to become secretary of the Security Council. And in 2001, Putin appointed him defense minister, the first non-military person to head the ministry.

After President Boris Yeltsin abruptly resigned and Putin became acting president, he was asked who on his team he trusted. "Trust? Sergei Ivanov," he replied, as related in the question-and-answer book "First Person: An Astonishingly Frank Self-Portrait by Russia's President," based on 24 hours of interviews with him by a panel of Russian journalists.

Ivanov is widely believed to be less ensnared than Medvedev in the opaque but fierce rivalries of different interest groups around Putin in the Kremlin and could emerge as an acceptable alternative for those against Medvedev's candidacy, according to some analysts.

Igor Sechin, another St. Petersburg native, who is a Kremlin official as well as chairman of Rosneft, a Gazprom rival, is reported to oppose Medvedev. Sechin is said to lead a Kremlin faction that represents the interests of security service members who would like to see Putin stay on for a third term. That is barred by the constitution and has been ruled out by the president.

"Putin's main aim is to keep stability, and if Medvedev becomes president there will be a fight," said Aleksey Mukhin, general director of the Center for Political Information, in an interview. "Sergei Ivanov, I believe, is stronger. He has very good relations with other groups, including Sechin. He can ensure stability."

As defense minister, Ivanov established a reputation as a hawk, albeit one still able to charm his Western interlocutors. He has opposed expansion of the NATO alliance, clashed with the pro-Western leadership in neighboring Georgia and opposed U.S. plans to build a missile defense system in Eastern Europe.

He was replaced as defense minister by Anatoly Serdyukov, the head of Russia's tax service.

Putin, Promoting An Ally, Fuels Speculation Over Successor (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 15 — President Vladimir V. Putin on Thursday added intrigue to the unsettled but widely debated question of who might succeed him as Russia's leader in 2008 when he promoted his minister of defense in an unexpected cabinet tinkering.

Sergei B. Ivanov, a former K.G.B. officer who became the first civilian to lead the country's military in 2001, will now serve as a first deputy prime minister, giving him expanded duties. He will have the same rank in government and title as another closely watched contender, Dmitri A. Medvedev.

The two men, who are friends and close aides from Mr. Putin's hometown, St. Petersburg, have emerged as the leading candidates to replace Mr. Putin when he completes a second and — by law — final term after presidential elections scheduled for March 2008.

The move, which went largely unexplained like most of Mr. Putin's actions, is certain to intensify speculation over which of the two might have the upper hand for Mr. Putin's endorsement. That would be a virtual guarantee of election, given his popularity and the centralized control of politics here.

Since Mr. Putin's last significant cabinet reshuffling in November 2005, Mr. Medvedev had nominally been Mr. Ivanov's superior in the government. Mr. Medvedev also serves as chairman of the Russian energy giant, Gazprom.

"I think it is the formulation of the two candidates for the presidency of the Russian Federation in 2008," said Sergei A. Markov, director of the Institute of Political Studies, who works closely with the Kremlin.

Mr. Putin also moved to settle a struggle for control of Chechnya, the southern republic where Russian forces have largely crushed a separatist movement in two wars since 1994. Appearing on television later Thursday night, Mr. Putin accepted the resignation of Chechnya's president, Alu D. Alkhanov, and appointed him a deputy justice minister.

With Mr. Alkhanov's departure, Ramzan Kadyrov, the republic's prime minister and a man whose fighters have been broadly accused of rampant human rights violations, becomes the acting president. Mr. Kadyrov and Mr. Alkhanov have quarreled openly in recent weeks, prompting so many rumors of intrigue and betrayals that Mr. Alkhanov had declared that he had no intention of leaving office.

Mr. Kadyrov is the son of Mr. Alkhanov's predecessor, Akhmad Kadyrov, who was assassinated by rebels in 2004. The younger Mr. Kadyrov turned 30 last year, reaching the minimum age for the republic's presidency, and was widely assumed to be waiting in the wings for the top post.

Tanya Lokshina, a prominent rights campaigner who travels to the region frequently, said Mr. Alkhanov's removal cemented Mr. Kadyrov's control over Chechnya's affairs, underscoring the Kremlin's disregard for complaints about Mr. Kadyrov's tactics. "There's not even a nominal president who was protesting what Kadyrov is doing," she said, calling him a feudal leader. "That's what Alkhanov was doing."

On the national level, Mr. Putin has not signaled that he has a preferred candidate to replace him, as Boris N. Yeltsin tipped Mr. Putin to be his successor shortly after appointing him prime minister in August 1999. Four months later, on New Year's Eve, Mr. Yeltsin resigned and made Mr. Putin acting president.

Mr. Putin announced the changes in televised meetings, the first with his ministers and later with leaders of the Ministry of Defense. Mr. Medvedev was absent from at least the televised portions of the meetings, and Mr. Putin did not mention him.

The president said he was expanding Mr. Ivanov's duties to include "a part of the civil sector of the economy," as well as the military industries that have undergone a significant consolidation under Mr. Putin. "I hope that what positive has been done in the military-industrial complex will extend to the civil sector, as well," he said.

Mr. Medvedev, 41, has overseen economic and social issues, a portfolio he will now have to share with Mr. Ivanov.

"Ivanov is an equal of Putin," said Olga V. Kryshtanovskaya, a sociologist who studies Russia's leaders, calling him "successor No. 1." "He is no less clever. Ivanov should show himself as a strong figure, capable of making firm decisions. But of course, he could not just work on defense. He had to operate wider. This is the next step."

Mr. Markov, by contrast, said the undeclared race remained wide open, though he said the move could help Mr. Ivanov by distancing him from the military, which, despite an aggressive effort to rearm and rebuild, remains scarred by accusations of corruption and a brutal system of hazing young draftees.

Mr. Ivanov, 54, faced unusual public criticism last year after a particularly egregious hazing episode that left a private maimed. The appointment, Mr. Markov said, "liberated him from the not quite convenient theme of the Russian military."

Mr. Ivanov's replacement as defense minister is Anatoly E. Serdyukov, a former army officer and furniture manufacturer who has served as a tax inspector since Mr. Putin became president in 2000. Since July 2004, he has served as the head of the Federal Tax Service, an agency that has streamlined itself significantly but that remains a feared bureaucracy, one that critics say has been used selectively to punish opponents.

At a news conference this month, Mr. Putin faced repeated questions about his successor, but refused to answer them directly.

"Everyone who should be is already working in his proper place," he said, apparently not hinting at the shuffle announced Thursday. "And what we should do is not to make a fuss about future elections but, as I have said, provide the citizens with an opportunity to make a free and democratic choice."

Putin's Succession Gets Murkier (WSJ)

By Guy Chazan And Gregory L. White

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

MOSCOW -- President Vladimir Putin's promotion of a hawkish ally has rejiggered the power balance among his likely successors, sharpening the competition faced by the more pro-Western candidate who had been considered the front-runner in next year's presidential contest.

Mr. Putin yesterday elevated Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov to the same rank as Dmitry Medvedev, the pro-Western first deputy prime minister.

"The succession is clearly not yet a done deal," said Alexei Makarkin, an analyst with the Center for Political Technologies. "It suggests that the president has not yet made up his mind."

With the latest reshuffle, Mr. Putin is effectively keeping Russia's political elite guessing about who will be his favored candidate in the March 2008 election, analysts said. That helps him to avoid being seen as a lame duck for the remainder of his presidency, and to retain his ability to shape events.

Mr. Putin has repeatedly said it is up to the Russian people to decide who will be Russia's next leader, and he said early this month that he wouldn't endorse any candidate until after parliamentary elections in December. But with his approval rating still topping 70% and Kremlin control of the media and politics tight, it is widely assumed that voters will elect anyone who has his personal stamp of approval.

Although both Mr. Ivanov and Mr. Medvedev enjoy lavish coverage on state television and have seen their ratings rise in polls, neither will admit publicly to harboring presidential ambitions.

DOJ_NMG_0132929

Separately, Mr. Putin abruptly dismissed the president of the war-torn Russian region of Chechnya, naming as acting president Ramzan Kadyrov, the Chechen prime minister widely alleged by human-rights groups to be responsible for abductions and detentions of civilians and suspected separatist rebels.

While promoting Mr. Ivanov, Mr. Putin also appointed two trusted allies from St. Petersburg to top posts in his cabinet -- a further move to ensure his influence on Russia's political system outlasts his term in office.

He picked Anatoly Serdyukov, head of the federal tax service and a former businessman with no military experience outside his Soviet-era compulsory service, to succeed Mr. Ivanov as defense minister. Meanwhile, Sergei Naryshkin, who used to work with Mr. Putin in the St. Petersburg mayor's office and is currently the government chief of staff, was named deputy prime minister in charge of trade with Russia's ex-Soviet neighbors. Both men are seen as politically unambitious technocrats who are intensely loyal to Mr Putin.

Addressing the cabinet, Mr. Putin praised Mr. Ivanov's performance as defense minister, crediting him with record Russian arms exports last year, and said he will be charged with expanding growth from the military sector to the civilian economy.

Mr. Ivanov's promotion removes him from a job that at times exposed him to vehement public criticism. A former foreign-intelligence officer in the KGB like Mr. Putin, Mr. Ivanov headed the defense ministry at a time of unprecedented public anger over army hazing. In one notorious incident last year, a soldier had to have his legs and genitals amputated after an officer ordered him to crouch for several hours.

"This promotion takes Ivanov out of the line of fire, especially on hazing," said Dmitry Badovsky, head of Moscow University's Social Systems Institute. "He will still be able to coordinate military policy, but he won't be so closely associated with all that negative imagery."

The reshuffle came at a time when Mr. Medvedev, who is responsible for a series of high-profile welfare projects, was being viewed as the front-runner in the presidential race, and was beginning to openly formalize his role as chosen successor. That climaxed last month with his widely publicized address at the World Economic Forum in Davos.

Instead of pushing Mr. Medvedev to the fore, Mr. Putin now seems to be putting in place a complex system of checks and balances to even out the influence of power centers. That allows him to emerge as the chief arbiter of rival interests in Russia's murky system of power, a role he is expected to hang on to once he has left the presidency.

"Putin is determined not to allow the perception in the elite that it's all over," said Christopher Granville, managing editor of Trusted Sources, a London-based research boutique covering emerging markets. "There will now be a balance to keep [Medvedev and Ivanov] competing until the election campaign formally begins next year."

Putin Removes Chechen President, Appoints Ally (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 15 -- President Vladimir Putin dismissed the president of Chechnya on Thursday, clearing a path to the southern republic's highest office for Ramzan Kadyrov, the controversial prime minister of Chechnya who has been accused of major human rights abuses in his drive to pacify the war-torn region.

Putin appointed Kadyrov as acting president in advance of elections, in which analysts expect the young Kremlin ally to face only token and timid opposition. No election date has been set, and Russian officials insisted there would be more than one candidate.

Alu Alkhanov, who had been president since May 2004, was appointed deputy justice minister of Russia. Alkhanov became president when Kadyrov's father, a former separatist who switched his loyalties to the Kremlin, was assassinated with a bomb in the Chechen capital, Grozny. Alkhanov's departure had been rumored for weeks, and he was reportedly under pressure from Kadyrov to step aside.

The younger Kadyrov was not eligible to become president until he turned 30, which he did in October. As deputy prime minister and later prime minister, ostensibly under Alkhanov, Kadyrov was regarded as the real power in Chechnya.

A brash, ginger-haired man, Kadyrov commands a large paramilitary group, composed mostly of former rebels, that has essentially displaced Russian federal troops and special police units as the principal force in Chechnya.

Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, who was assassinated last year, wrote in 2005 that "the Kremlin decided to replace one type of civil war (federal troops versus a broad strata of Chechen society) with another type (Chechens fighting Chechens for power in Chechnya and federal funding from Moscow)."

Kadyrov's black-clad troops have been accused by human rights groups and some of his Chechen critics of torture, abductions and disappearances.

"He acts like a medieval tyrant," Movladi Baisarov, a former Chechen special forces officer who broke with Kadyrov, said in a newspaper interview last year. "I know of many people executed on his express orders, and I know exactly where they are buried. If someone tells the truth about what is going on, it's like signing his own death warrant."

A month later, on Nov. 18, Baisarov was shot dead on Moscow's busy Leninsky Prospekt while apparently resisting arrest. Some witnesses said he was shot repeatedly by specially dispatched Chechen police as he lay on the ground and Moscow police officers stood by.

Kadyrov has repeatedly denied having any connection to killings or other human rights violations.

In the past 12 years, rebels and Russian forces have fought two brutal wars in Chechnya. Kadyrov's defenders, including the Kremlin, credit him with routing the separatist movement and reducing violence in Chechnya, although armed clashes continue. Yet there has not been a major terrorist attack in Russia since the seizure of a school in the southern town of Beslan in September 2004, and a number of Chechen rebel leaders have been killed in special operations by Russian forces.

The Kremlin has pursued a policy of substituting Chechens for Russians in the republic, handing over power to local officials as a constitution was written and a parliament elected. The elevation of Kadyrov, who was awarded a Hero of Russia medal by Putin in 2004, would mark the culmination of that process.

Some analysts in Moscow, however, contend that Kadyrov has assumed so much power that he could easily slip out of the Kremlin's control, if he has not already, and spark more conflict. Kadyrov's image is almost ubiquitous in the province, leading to charges that he is building a cult of personality.

Despite Russia's constitutional secularism, Kadyrov has been burnishing his Islamic credentials in Chechnya, which is predominantly Muslim. He has advocated the introduction of some aspects of sharia, or Islamic law, including polygamy and bans on alcohol and gambling.

Sergei Markedonov, an expert on the Caucasus region at the Institute for Political and Military Analysis in Moscow, calls Kadyrov a "system separatist" who is undermining Russian authority while pledging formal loyalty to the Kremlin.

Putin And Progress (WSJ)

By Padma Desai

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

Whatever the West's grave misgivings about Vladimir Putin, they are not widely shared by the Russian people, who consistently give their president 70% approval ratings in opinion polls. Even former Presidents Gorbachev and Yeltsin, much admired in the U.S., have given a nod of approval to Mr. Putin's "strategic" direction, even though they express reservations about his moves to consolidate federal authority.

Nonetheless, there are two pertinent issues to face. First, would any Russian president succeeding Mr. Putin act differently in foreign policy? Second, is Russia regressing irretrievably into authoritarianism, or is she likely to embrace Western democratic norms despite the zigzags?

The Kremlin's pursuit of national interests in foreign policy, whether we like it or not, reflects a broad agreement among Russians. Indeed, on a whole range of issues ranging from NATO's eastward expansion to Mr. Putin's hardball tactics with the independent states in Russia's neighborhood, the majority of Russians support his decisions. Even Russia's leading reformers regard the neighborhood as Russia's area of interest.

Former Prime Minister Mikhail Kasyanov, who successfully carried out a series of reforms during his 2000-2004 tenure, insists that Russians "have special interests and responsibilities" in their immediate neighborhood. "We have a long history of shared problems and common tradition, although the former Soviet republics are now independent states," Mr. Kasyanov told me in a December 2004 interview.

Anatoly Chubais, the legendary privatizer of Russian industry, was even more explicit in his pronouncements, suggesting that Russia should become a "liberal empire." In an interview on Vremya TV, he added, "We must be frank and straightforward and assume this mission of leadership, not just as a slogan but as a Russian state policy. I believe this mission of leadership means that Russia is obliged to support in every way the expansion of its business outside Russia."

In short, unlike Europe and Japan, which share U.S. concerns despite occasional differences, Russia always will have geopolitical interests in its immediate neighborhood, extending its decision-making periphery as far as the Middle East and China. This does not imply that the West should uncritically accept specific decisions in pursuit of these interests, such as the expulsion of Georgians from Russia. But even if Russians were to subscribe to liberal Western values as President Bush desires, their future leaders still might choose to define their interests independently. Moscow would continue to engage the U.S. leadership in win-lose dialogues over Russia's determined foreign policy.

But never mind the likelihood that a liberal, democratic Russia might change its foreign-policy style: What are the prospects of such a Russia emerging in the first place? If it's correct to say that a prospering middle class -- dare one call it a bourgeoisie? -- inevitably leads to the rise of democracy, then Russia fits the bill admirably. The transformative changes in Russia, a remarkable development since Mr. Gorbachev's glasnost, are phenomenal. Russians are acquiring private housing, automobiles and fixed and mobile telephones at a dizzying speed. The overall poverty rate has declined from around 35% in the mid-1990s to about 10% today, and 70% of college-age youngsters receive a higher education.

There has been much angst over Russian muscle-flexing on the pricing and supply of oil and gas. However ham-handed, Moscow has simply used its bargaining power to extract better economic terms in situations of bilateral monopoly. Gazprom, the Russian gas supplier, has sought maximum possible terms from its European customers before they switch to alternative energy sources. At the same time, Ukraine and Belarus have bargained with Gazprom over transit charges because Russian gas must pass en route to Europe via pipelines located in their territories.

Russian industry and energy sectors will increasingly adopt market-economy rules and practices as they learn to interact and integrate with Western business. Recognizing this, German Chancellor Angela Merkel signed with Mr. Putin a 2006 agreement in which Wintershall, the energy unit of German chemical giant BASF, and Gazprom exchanged equivalent stakes in early 2006. More contracts are proliferating with French and Italian partners. Russia's giant power company is poised to raise $10 billion in the next two years and to invite Western companies to supply power generating units, technology and management know-how. Gazprom, according to some reports, is set to raise $75 billion in the next decade for financing a variety of projects. Will American businesses be sidelined from lucrative contracts and a liberalizing, market-oriented mission in a fast growing and diversifying Russian economy?

"There is a definite consensus among Russian society and the elite that Russia needs a market economy," Yegor Gaidar, Mr. Yeltsin's young reforming prime minister told me in October 2004. "By contrast, our struggle to form a robust, functioning democracy has not brought decisive results. . . . I do not think that the educated, urban populations in large countries such as Russia can put up with undemocratic regimes for long."

Russia's Course: Still Uncertain (WP)

By David Ignatius

MOSCOW -- Think of the new Russia as a highway: People used to drive on the left side of the road; now, officially, they are supposed to drive on the right, but the change has been uncomfortable (especially for the authorities). So the country straddles the middle -- which is understandable, but also dangerous.

That's a paradox of Vladimir Putin's Russia that I have encountered in nearly every conversation here this week. Russian officials insist they don't want to go back to communism, and why would they? Moscow glitters like a Christmas package, with more neon per square mile than any city I know. But behind Moscow's dazzling lights, the remnants of the old police state remain -- and many order-loving Russians seem glad of it.

The energy boom has helped Russians forget about the nagging problem of where they're heading politically. "There is a lack of clarity about our final destination," says one prominent Russian businessman. "Are we building China? The United States? Sweden? What is it? The situation now cannot continue. We are sitting between two chairs."

Russia is wary of full, American-style democracy, argues Konstantin Kosachyov, the chairman of the foreign affairs committee in the lower house of the Russian parliament. "To my mind, democracy is not a goal in itself, it is an instrument. It is the best instrument, but it should be used very cautiously. It's like the jackhammers that miners use. It increases productivity, but if you give this instrument to a child, it will destroy the child."

Kosachyov explains that Russians have bad memories of the wide-open democracy of the 1990s, and most Russians I spoke with confirmed that view. It was a crazy time, when people's savings were wiped out, gangsters battled in the streets, and the country was governed by what Russians saw as an alcoholic president and his thieving cronies. "Democracy came to us without us being ready to use it in a constructive way, and it destroyed us," says Kosachyov. "That's why Putin acts in a cautious way. He does not want to repeat the experience of the 1990s."

The Russian political puzzle now centers on the question of who will succeed Putin when his second term ends in 2008. The Russian president is very popular, and he would almost certainly be reelected if he ran for a third term, but he insists he will abide by the new constitution's two-term limit. So who is the crown prince? Moscow was buzzing this week about whether Putin favored First Deputy Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev or Deputy Prime Minister and Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov. Medvedev appeared to be the front-runner -- until Putin announced late Thursday that he was promoting Ivanov to equal status as first deputy prime minister, with new economic responsibilities.

The succession circus, in truth, reinforces the awkwardness of Russia's not-quite-democratic system. Analysts count the minutes allocated to Medvedev and Ivanov on state-controlled television. It's like Kremlin-watching in the old days, when observers tried to handicap power struggles by noting where officials stood on the podium during parades in Red Square. The reality is that power resides with Putin and his small inner circle of presidential assistants.

I had a chance to peek into Putin's inner circle this week when I met with his chief economic adviser, Igor Shuvalov. His office is a Soviet-era palace that once housed the head of the Communist Party, but Shuvalov is very much of the new era: He's just 40, speaks English fluently and is as sharply dressed as any London investment banker.

A key to Russia's future, argues Shuvalov, is Putin's decision to seek membership in the World Trade Organization. He says some Kremlin advisers opposed WTO accession, but Putin decided it was the best way to guarantee Russia's continued economic modernization. When I ask about corruption in the new Russia, Shuvalov doesn't deny the problem. "We need to be persistent and patient," he says. "If we are persistent, then slowly it will change."

High oil prices have encouraged a consumer boom, but they are a mixed blessing. The giant state-controlled gas and oil companies, Gazprom and Rosneft, overwhelm the rest of the economy and dominate Russian politics -- with several of Putin's closest advisers holding energy directorships. Energy politics and democratic politics don't mix easily.

"Don't give up on us. Treat us as a normal democratic country," says Mikhail Kasyanov, who was prime minister during Putin's first three years but is now a critic of the government. Certainly, Western pressure can help preserve democracy here. But in the end, it's the Russians who will have to decide which side of the road they're driving on.

The Putin Doctrine (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

Vladimir Putin -- Russia's president, although the more accurate title would be godfather -- made headlines last week with a speech in Munich that set a new standard in anti-Americanism. He not only charged the United States with the "hyper-use of force," "disdain for the basic principles of international law" and having "overstepped its national borders in . . . the economic, political, cultural and educational policies it imposes on other nations." He even blamed the spread of weapons of mass destruction, which the United States has been combating with few allies and against constant Russian resistance, on American "dominance" that "inevitably encourages" other countries to acquire them.

There is something amusing about criticism of the use of force by the man who turned Chechnya into a smoldering ruin; about the invocation of international law by the man who will not allow Scotland Yard to interrogate the polonium-soaked thugs it suspects of murdering Alexander Litvinenko, yet another Putin opponent who met an untimely and unprosecuted death; about the bullying of other countries decried by a man who cuts off energy supplies to Ukraine, Georgia and Belarus in brazen acts of political and economic extortion.

Less amusing is the greater meaning of Putin's Munich speech. It marks Russia's coming out. Flush with oil and gas revenue, the consolidation of dictatorial authority at home and the capitulation of both domestic and Western companies to his seizure of their assets, Putin issued his boldest declaration yet that post-Soviet Russia is preparing to reassert itself on the world stage.

Perhaps the most important line in his speech was the least noted because it seemed so innocuous. "I very often hear appeals by our partners, including our European partners, to the effect that Russia should play an increasingly active role in world affairs," he said. "It is hardly necessary to incite us to do so."

Soviet foreign minister Andrei Gromyko once boasted that no conflict anywhere on the globe could be settled without taking into account the attitude and interests of the Soviet Union. Gromyko's description of Soviet influence constitutes the best definition ever formulated of the term "superpower."

And we know how Putin, who has called the demise of the Soviet Union the greatest political catastrophe of the 20th century, yearns for those superpower days. At Munich, he could not even disguise his Cold War nostalgia, asserting that "global security" was ensured by the "strategic potential of two superpowers."

Putin's bitter complaint is that today there remains only one superpower, the behemoth that dominates a "unipolar world." He knows that Moscow lacks the economic, military and even demographic means to challenge America as it did in Soviet days. He speaks more modestly of coalitions of aggrieved have-not countries that Russia might lead in countering American power.

Hence his increasingly active foreign policy -- military partnerships with China, nuclear cooperation with Iran, weapon supplies to Syria and Venezuela, diplomatic support as well as arms for a genocidal Sudan, friendly outreach to other potential partners of an anti-hegemonic (read: anti-American) alliance.

Is this a return to the Cold War? It is true that the ex-KGB agent occasionally lets slip a classic Marxist anachronism such as "foreign capital" (referring to Western oil companies) or the otherwise weird adjective "vulgar" (describing the actions of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which infuriated Putin by insisting upon a clean election in Ukraine). He even intimated that he might undo one of the unequivocal achievements of the late Cold War era, the so-called "zero option" agreement of 1987, and restore a Soviet-style, medium-range ballistic missile force.

Nonetheless, Putin's aggressiveness does not signal a return to the Cold War. He is too clever to be burdened by the absurdity of socialist economics or Marxist politics. He is blissfully free of ideology, political philosophy and economic theory. There is no existential dispute with the United States.

He is a more modest man: a mere mafia don, seizing the economic resources and political power of a country for himself and his (mostly KGB) cronies. And promoting his vision of the Russian national interest -- assertive and expansionist -- by engaging in diplomacy that challenges the dominant power in order to boost his own.

He wants Gromyko's influence -- or at least some international acknowledgment that Moscow must be reckoned with -- without the ideological baggage. He does not want to bury us; he only wants to diminish us. It is 19th-century power politics at its most crude and elemental. Putin does not want us as an enemy. But at Munich he told the world that, vis-Ã-vis America, his Russia has gone from partner to adversary.

Will Russia Bet On Its People Or Its Oil Wells? (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

In a high-rise building with a view of Lenin's Tomb, the U.S. aerospace giant Boeing is designing key parts of its new 787 Dreamliner, using hundreds of Russian aerospace engineers. Yes, President Putin may be talking cold-war tough, but down the street from the Kremlin, America's crown jewel industrial company is using Russia's crown jewel brainpower to design its next crown jewel jetliner.

Boeing's Moscow Design Center, which employs 1,400 Russian engineers (earning less than their U.S. counterparts) on various projects, symbolizes Russia's unique potential: Russia is that rare country that not only has a treasure trove of natural resources — oil, gas and mines — but also has a treasure trove of human talent: engineers, mathematicians and other valuable minds.

Most nations with highly developed human talent — like Singapore or Taiwan — have few natural resources, and those that are rich in natural resources — Venezuela or Sudan — tend not to develop their people's talents. The exceptions, like Norway, which is rich in both human and natural resources, usually built their democratic institutions before they got rich on oil, so the money was well spent.

The meta-question with Russia today is this: Will it become more like Norway, a democracy enriched by oil, or more like Venezuela, a democracy subverted by oil? Is the Boeing center Russia's future or its exception?

You see signs of both trends. On the positive side, Russia has been smarter than most petro-states. It has set up a rainy day fund and tucked away $100 billion from its oil and gas windfall. Direct foreign investment in Russia hit $30 billion last year, according to The Economist, and not all of it goes to the oil and gas sector anymore.

And then there's Boeing. Its impressive Moscow center operates two shifts of engineers: 7 a.m. until 3 p.m., and 3 p.m. until 11 p.m. — which is shortly before the workday begins in the United States. A Russian Boeing engineer might be designing part of the 787's nose during his day, and then initials and stores his work in the computer. A U.S. Boeing engineer, working on an identical computer, then picks it up during her day and engineers it some more. With regular teleconferences, it's as if they are in one virtual 24-hour office.

"There is no paper at all," said Sergei Korolev, the deputy head of Boeing Moscow. "We do the presentations electronically and have online sessions with Wichita and Seattle, and everyone looks at the same part and talks about it. Our center is the reason people are not emigrating."

But Russia has a unique legacy in aerospace from Soviet days, so the educational centers and talent were in place for Boeing to tap. What Russia still glaringly lacks is an ecosystem of secure property rights, venture capitalists and homegrown innovators, and universities and business schools churning out idea-entrepreneurs. "Made in Russia" will never be a global brand as long as research spending by Russian companies remains among the lowest in the world.

The Moscow Times recently reported that only two Russian colleges — Moscow State and St. Petersburg State — are listed among the world's top 500 universities. When you walk down the streets in Bangalore, India's high-tech capital, it feels as if there's a computer school or English-language school on every street. You walk in Moscow, and it feels as if there is a new shoe store or beauty salon on every street.

A former top aide to President Putin remarked to me that Russia had a huge interest in building a postindustrial knowledge economy, not an energy-intensive industrial one, so it can export most of its oil and gas, not consume them at home. But that would take a big investment in education, which is not being done.

Noting that Russia today spends far less of its G.D.P. on higher education than Europe or America, Sergei Guriyev, rector of Russia's New Economic School, wrote in The Moscow Times, "Russians simply are not prepared to pay the taxes that would be necessary to finance science and education at Soviet-era levels, and no incentives have been created to attract more private funding."

So here's my prediction: You tell me the price of oil, and I'll tell you what kind of Russia you'll have. If the price stays at $60 a barrel, it's going to be more like Venezuela, because its leaders will have plenty of money to indulge their worst instincts, with too few checks and balances. If the price falls to $30, it will be more like Norway. If the price falls to $15 a barrel, it could become more like America — with just enough money to provide a social safety net for its older generation, but with too little money to avoid developing the leaders and institutions to nurture the brainpower of its younger generation.

Silence Of America (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0132935

FOR DECADES, the Voice of America and its sister broadcasting organizations offered a remarkably balanced alternative to state-controlled media all over the world, buoying dissident movements and undermining anti-American dictatorships for a relatively small investment. Soviet citizens even learned how to reconfigure their radios to break through the jamming signals their government used to interrupt VOA and British Broadcasting Corp. programming.

Now, with Russian President Vladimir Putin bullying his neighbors, manipulating the Russian media and throwing increasingly audacious anti-American tantrums, one would think U.S. policymakers would have the sense at least to maintain relatively modest VOA operations in and around the Russian Federation. Yet President Bush's recently released 2008 budget proposal does just the opposite, cutting VOA programming for a range of post-Soviet states to finance programming expansion in other areas of the world.

The White House's proposed reprioritization of VOA broadcasting moves money out of operations aimed at the large and largely Muslim country of Uzbekistan. Broadcasting into neighboring Kazakhstan is also being cut. The citizens of both countries live under illiberal regimes, and Uzbekistan's brutal dictatorship is of the sort that incubates religious fundamentalism and anti-Americanism. Voice of America's half-hour of radio and half-hour of television programming in Uzbek, says a VOA staff member, provide about the only direct contact Uzbeks have with the United States and the only unvarnished news in the region. Meanwhile, the highly controlled Russian media beam their often misleading programming in with ease.

Mr. Bush's budget also proposes reductions in Ukrainian-language VOA programming to serve a country struggling to Westernize in the shadow of Mr. Putin's increasingly lawless regime. Mr. Bush should be eager to encourage democratic forces in Ukraine, as well as in Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan, not further limit their sources of information about the United States. The price of such programs is so low that federal financial constraints are hardly an excuse to kill them; a relatively tiny increase in the VOA's budget would make a world of difference.

U.N. Chief Presses Sudan To Allow Team To Visit Darfur (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Feb. 15 — Secretary General Ban Ki-moon said Thursday that President Omar al-Bashir of Sudan had broken a personal pledge he made last month to give entry permits to a United Nations human rights team, and Mr. Ban urged the Sudanese leader to reconsider.

"This is the issue I discussed with President Bashir during my meeting with him in Addis Ababa, and he said he would issue visas to the fact-finding mission," Mr. Ban said. "He said he would have no problem."

"I am very much disappointed by the decision of the Sudanese government," he added. "If he believes that there is no problem, then he should be able to receive the human rights fact-finding mission."

Mr. Ban also said he had received no reply from Mr. Bashir to a Jan. 24 letter addressing Sudanese concerns over a combined African Union and United Nations force to curb attacks on villagers in the Darfur region of western Sudan.

Mr. Ban said the letter detailed how an advance force would be created, as well as its command structure and financing. "With an affirmative answer, we can pave the way immediately to the introduction of a hybrid A.U./U.N. mission," he said.

Under an agreement reached late last year with Sudan, a 20,000-member joint force was to be sent to Darfur to replace an undermanned and poorly equipped 7,000-member African Union contingent that has said it cannot control the rising violence.

Since that agreement, however, President Bashir has repeatedly defied the United Nations, saying he would not accept its peacekeepers and at one point threatening to send the Sudanese Army into combat against any who tried to enter the country. Because the resolution creating the force specifies that it must have the consent of the government before it can deploy in Sudan, United Nations officials have been pressing Mr. Bashir to drop his objections.

Mr. Ban said he was expecting to hear word shortly from Jan Eliasson, his special envoy for Darfur, and Salim A. Salim of the African Union, who are both currently in Sudan.

"This continuing deteriorating situation in Darfur is just unacceptable," Mr. Ban said.

The violence in Darfur has left more than 200,000 villagers dead and made 2.5 million people homeless since the government moved to fight rebels there in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0132936

In Washington, Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said the United States was putting pressure on United Nations members, and African countries in particular, to supply more troops to the mission but had met resistance.

"It is absolutely essential that member nations of the U.N. step up and make those troop contributions," he said.

Andrew S. Natsios, President Bush's envoy for Darfur, said Wednesday that pro-government Janjaweed militias blamed for most of the killing, raping and pillaging were planning new actions — a threat, he said, that could drive out aid workers and close camps, producing a "bloodbath."

Plan Prepared For Cuban Exodus (MH)

By Pablo Bachelet

The Miami Herald, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON - Concerned about a possible mass exodus of Cubans, the Department of Defense plans to spend $18 million to prepare part of the U.S. Navy base at Guantánamo Bay to shelter interdicted migrants, U.S. officials told The Miami Herald.

The new installation is needed because terrorism suspects occupy space on the base used in past emergencies to hold large numbers of migrants, Bush administration officials directly involved said. They note that the facilities are designed to house people from any Caribbean nation who attempt to enter illegally -- not just Cubans.

But they say privately that Fidel Castro's illness and temporary hand-over of power to his brother Raúl last summer injected a renewed sense of urgency into plans to handle a mass exodus. The administration quietly requested the funds about a month ago and Congress has approved it, The Miami Herald was told.

The officials, who were authorized to speak on the subject but requested anonymity because of the sensitive nature of Cuban issues, say there is no sign a Cuban migration crisis is brewing, but they acknowledge predicting one is difficult. The 1980 Mariel boatlift, which saw 125,000 Cubans arrive in Florida, began when a group of Cubans tried to storm the Peruvian embassy in Havana.

BIGGER PLAN

The $18 million initiative is part of a broader U.S. government effort to prepare for the death of Castro. The administration will not say how many migrants it believes might flee Cuba or even if any will do so, but one expert warned that up to 500,000 may try to leave the island after Castro's death.

Top Bush Cabinet officials have met at least twice since December to review Cuba contingency plans. On March 7 and 8, the Department of Homeland Security will lead an exercise in South Florida involving the Coast Guard and dozens of federal, state and local agencies, focused on stopping U.S. boaters from picking up rafters.

The U.S. Navy base, on the eastern tip of Cuba, apparently would be used as a shelter of last resort if the volume of Cubans interdicted at sea overwhelms the U.S. policy known as ``wet foot/dry foot."

Under that policy, Cubans who make it to U.S. territory are allowed to remain. Those intercepted at sea are interviewed aboard Coast Guard vessels and most are repatriated to Cuba. A few who have been found to credibly risk persecution if returned to Cuba have been taken to Guantánamo for more interviews while U.S. officials arrange for their resettlement in third nations.

U.S. officials refused to say whether the wet foot/dry foot policy will be changed in case of an exodus, since such an announcement might prompt many Cubans to leave.

For years, migrants captured during surges ended up in tent camps at Guantánamo on a bluff called Radio Range, on the larger Windward side of the base.

1994 MIGRATIONS

At the height of the last migration crisis in 1994, more than 32,000 Cubans and 21,000 Haitians overwhelmed the base in tent cities. Most of the Cubans were later sent to the United States. Most of the Haitians were sent home.

The Pentagon has since built its sprawling terrorism detention and interrogation center at the site of the old tent camps, limiting shelter space. The plan would put them on the smaller Leeward side, which has an airstrip but no docks for large ships.

"The capacity to process migrants at Guantánamo is an integral part of our overall plans to ensure that any attempted mass migration in the Caribbean is not successful," said one official, who also declined to be identified. The official said the new facility is ``part of prudent contingency planning."

"The U.S. has established avenues for safe, orderly, legal migration from the various countries in the Caribbean," the official added. ``Any effort to send people to the United States via unsafe and illegal means will not succeed."

The Pentagon already has solicited construction bids for the new facility. The $18 million would pay for things like land leveling, sewage and electrical infrastructure, bathrooms, dining facilities and administrative offices to process asylum applications. The installations will be initially designed to handle about 10,000 migrants, officials say, though more can be quickly accommodated if needed.

SCENARIOS

Andy Gomez, senior fellow at the University of Miami's Institute for Cuban and Cuban-American Studies, says focus groups and other interviews show many young Cubans are eager to leave.

"If the economic conditions do not get better, there is the strong possibility that as many as 500,000 Cubans will want to leave the island in all directions," he says. ``The other possibility will also be a large group of Cubans rushing the U.S. base in Guantánamo or foreign embassies in Havana."

Latin American countries may be reluctant to take in numerous migrants, he added.

Meanwhile, the Coast Guard is finalizing plans for an exercise next month that will involve scores of vessels.

Rear Adm. David Kunkel, head of the Coast Guard's South East District, is in charge of coordinating interdiction efforts among many agencies, including the U.S. Navy and Miami-Dade Police.

"We would be concerned with boaters leaving from South Florida marinas to potentially increase the problem," said Jim Watson, chief of staff of the South East District. He said "deterrent elements" would be tested.

Miami Republican Reps. Lincoln and Mario Diaz-Balart, who have been briefed on preparations, could not be reached for comment.

Indonesia's Avian Flu Holdout (NYT)

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

Indonesia sent a chill through the World Health Organization recently when it refused to supply any more samples of the avian flu virus that has killed scores of its people. The move, which seemed aimed at gaining access to vaccines at an affordable price, threatens the global effort to track the virus and develop vaccines. But Indonesia has raised a valid point that needs to be addressed: if a pandemic should strike, poor countries would be left without protection.

The W.H.O. relies on a global network of laboratories to provide virus samples so experts can determine which are most likely to spread. These strains are then used to develop the seed stocks that are given — at no cost — to manufacturers to use in making vaccines.

In a typical flu season, the key strains emerge from Asia, while the vaccines are sold primarily in the West. This has not caused a ruckus because most developing countries consider influenza one of their lesser health threats. But with rising fears of an avian flu pandemic, the dynamic has changed.

Indonesia decided to act after a foreign company announced work on a vaccine that would be based on its samples. Indonesia stopped cooperating with the W.H.O. and started negotiations to send future samples to another vaccine maker in return for technology that would allow Indonesia to make its own vaccine.

That may be good for Indonesia but could be harmful to global health — especially if other countries follow. Clearly Indonesia, which is in discussion with W.H.O. officials, needs to rejoin the global network. Unfortunately, the W.H.O. has no good answer to the inequities Indonesia has spotlighted.

If a pandemic struck, the current vaccine makers could produce only 500 million doses of vaccine per year if they ran 24 hours a day. That is far short of what would be needed to vaccinate all 6.7 billion people in the world. Thus there seems no doubt that in a crisis, the countries that are home to the vaccine makers would tend to their own citizens first — or those willing to pay the highest prices — leaving little or no vaccine for everyone else.

The W.H.O. needs to work much harder to encourage the transfer of vaccine production technology to countries, like Indonesia, that have the technical ability to use it. That will increase the supply of vaccine and presumably bring prices down. Even then, we fear, there still won't be enough.

Spain Bitterly Divided As Terror Trial Begins In '04 Train Bombings (WP)

By John Ward Anderson And Pamela Rolfe

MADRID, Feb. 15 -- Twenty-nine suspects went on trial Thursday for the March 11, 2004, bombings of four commuter trains in Madrid, but Spain's political parties and news media have turned the investigation of the attack into a partisan battle, fraying the country's traditional solidarity against terrorism and leaving Spaniards bitterly divided over who launched the attack and why.

The strongest evidence collected by investigators suggests that the bombings -- which killed 191 people and injured 1,824 in the worst terrorist attack ever carried out in continental Europe -- were the work of Islamic radicals inspired by al-Qaeda, principally in retaliation for the stationing of Spanish troops in Iraq.

But leaders of the conservative Popular Party continue to assert that the Basque separatist movement known as ETA had a central role in the bombings. Some independent terrorism experts accuse the Popular Party -- in power at the time of the attack and voted out of office in national elections three days later -- of spinning conspiracy theories to escape blame for the bombings and redeem itself with the public.

"The main success of the bombing was to introduce a deeply rooted division in the country, socially and politically, which is amazing in a country that had a history of being united against terror before March 11," said Fernando Reinares, an international terrorism expert at Madrid's Elcano Royal Institute. "After March 11, Spain started a blame game that is unending."

Some of the confusion over who committed the attack, and why, should be resolved during the trial, which began Thursday in a special high-security courthouse outside Madrid. The proceedings are expected to last until July, with more than 600 witnesses scheduled to take the stand. A verdict could come in October.

Reinares said he fears that the trial, rather than leading to national healing and catharsis, will deepen political rifts and further fray the long-standing Spanish consensus on fighting terrorism, forged during the nearly four-decade battle against ETA.

"We feel used" by political parties and the news media, said David Abad Quijada, an activist with an organization that helps victims of the bombings and their families, and whose 31-year-old sister was killed in the attack. The bombing investigation and trial have become "totally political," he said, adding, "It's been a disaster."

"I want a trial that does not take into account political or personal interests," he said. "I do not want it to be an example of a trial turned into a circus."

The Madrid bombings, the deadliest terrorist strike since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in New York and Washington, underscored Europeans' own vulnerability to attacks by Islamic extremists and prompted a tightening of laws, border controls and security coordination across the European Union.

The bombings became politically charged almost immediately. On the day of the blasts, the government of Prime Minister JosÃ© MarÃ-a Aznar said ETA was the prime suspect and repeated that assertion even as evidence mounted that Islamic extremists had carried out the attack.

When Spaniards went to the polls three days later, political analysts say, they voted against the Popular Party government not so much for pursuing policies that might have led to the attack -- such as sending Spanish troops to support the U.S. invasion of Iraq -- as for seemingly trying to cover up the role of Islamic extremists. Aznar's successor, Prime Minister JosÃ© Luis RodrÃ-guez Zapatero of the Socialist Workers' Party, pulled Spanish troops out of Iraq soon after taking office, and today Popular Party leaders accuse the Socialists of ignoring key evidence pointing to ETA involvement.

The right-wing El Mundo newspaper, in particular, has conducted aggressive investigations fueling charges of coverups and evidence-tampering that the newspaper's editorial page said showed "intentional deceit" by government investigators. Surveys show that as many as a third of Spaniards believe ETA played a role in the bombings.

"We shouldn't rule them out," said Gustavo de Aristegui, the Popular Party's chief foreign policy spokesman in parliament, noting that some of the Spanish defendants who allegedly supplied explosives for the March 11 attacks had ties to ETA. But many of the attackers, he said, clearly were Islamic extremists trying to oust the Popular Party from power and wanted to send a signal to the rest of the world: "Submit or else."

Diego LÃ³pez Garrido, a Socialist party spokesman in Congress, said the Popular Party's insistence on an ETA connection was part of a "political line based on a theory that the bombing attack was meant to overthrow the former government, and so the Socialist government has a lack of legitimacy." Continuing to blame ETA was "a political strategy" not based on the facts, he said.

Some critics of the government have suggested that Zapatero's effort to negotiate a peace settlement with ETA was a political payoff. Those negotiations collapsed in December after a bomb, blamed on ETA, exploded at Madrid's airport, killing two people.

"There is no evidence pointing to ETA involvement in March 11 -- all we have is speculation and conspiracy theories," said Reinares, who used to advise Zapatero's Interior Ministry on counterterrorism. He said the March 11 investigation found that al-Qaeda leaders selected the targets and that "individuals connected to the al-Qaeda core" were involved in picking the date of the attack after a statement by Osama bin Laden was aired on al-Jazeera television in October 2003.

But much of the evidence is being ignored, Reinares said. At a time when Spain needs to revamp its security agencies and strengthen its policies for fighting al-Qaeda at home and abroad, he said, "the last thing we need is a lack of consensus on the matter."

A three-judge panel is hearing the case, based on a three-year investigation and a 1,471-page indictment issued by Judge Juan del Olmo last April. Twenty of the defendants are Arabs, mostly from Morocco, and nine are Spaniards, including one woman.

The seven main defendants are charged with murder and belonging to a terrorist group. They face hypothetical sentences of about 38,000 years if convicted, although under Spanish law the maximum prison term is 40 years. There is no death penalty in Spain.

Three are identified as organizers of the plot: Youssef Belhadj, 30, and Hassan el-Haski, 43, both of Morocco, and Rabei Osman Sayed Ahmed, 35, of Egypt. Three are accused of planting bombs: Jamal Zougam, 33, and Abdelmajid Bouchar, 24, both of Morocco, and Basel Ghalyoun, 26, of Syria. A Spaniard, JosÃ© Emilio SuÃ¡rez Trashorras, 30, is charged with supplying some of the explosives used in the attack, which he allegedly stole from a mine in northern Spain.

The remaining suspects face sentences of between four and 27 years on various charges, including collaborating with terrorists and trafficking in explosives. Seven other key suspects, who police believe were top operational and planning leaders, blew themselves up three weeks after the attack in an apartment outside Madrid when police tried to arrest them. Another suspect is believed to have died in a suicide attack in Iraq.

The only person to testify Thursday was the defendant Ahmed, also known as Mohamed the Egyptian, who was arrested in Milan three months after the Madrid bombings. Italian courts sentenced him last year to 10 years in prison for ties to terrorism. In secret police recordings in Italy, he reportedly told associates he was one of the planners of the Madrid attack.

On Thursday, after initially refusing to speak, Ahmed denied having "any ties with al-Qaeda or any other Islamic group."

"Obviously, I condemn these attacks emphatically and completely," he told the court. "Never, never have I had any relation whatsoever with these events in Madrid."

Was Jose Padilla Tortured By US Military? (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, February 16, 2007

MIAMI

When suspected Al Qaeda operative Jose Padilla was taken into military custody in 2002, his interrogators set out to crush any hope he might have that a neutral judge or a defense lawyer would come to his aid.

It is difficult to convince a US citizen that legal protections guaranteed in the Constitution no longer exist for him. But that was the mission of US military interrogators ordered to extract as much intelligence as possible from Mr. Padilla.

"Only after such time as Padilla has perceived that help is not on the way can the United States reasonably expect to obtain all possible intelligence information from Padilla," explained Vice Adm. Lowell Jacoby in an affidavit to an inquiring federal judge.

The statement was made seven months into what became 21 months of strict isolation in a military brig without access to a lawyer or any other human contact besides Padilla's jailers and interrogators.

Now, Padilla is facing an April trial in federal court here on charges that he became a willing Al Qaeda recruit in a violent global jihad. But his lawyers complain that Padilla's harsh treatment during nearly four years of military detention and interrogation has left him so psychologically damaged that he is unable to help wage his own defense.

US District Judge Marcia Cooke is being asked to decide whether Padilla is mentally competent to stand trial.

In a hearing before Judge Cooke Friday, federal prosecutors are expected to urge the judge to ignore everything that took place during Padilla's military detention. They say his harsh treatment is irrelevant to whether he is mentally competent to stand trial.

Padilla's lawyers disagree. They say their client was tortured by the military and they are asking the judge to order the government to fully account for its treatment of Padilla.

"Mr. Padilla is suffering from mental defects stemming from his incarceration in the naval brig," writes Anthony Natale, an assistant federal public defender, in a brief to the court. "The effects of that incarceration ... have left Mr. Padilla in such a psychologically frail posture that he cannot bear to revisit his past and, hence, cannot assist counsel in defending him against the government's allegations."

Mr. Natale adds, "It is the government that is squarely to blame for his current mental state and his concomitant inability to assist counsel."

Federal prosecutors deny that Padilla was subject to torture or any other mistreatment while in military custody, and they point to a recent report by a Bureau of Prisons psychiatrist that finds Padilla is competent to stand trial.

The key issue, according to the government, is Padilla's present mental functioning. Since he is mentally competent today, there is no need to investigate his past treatment by the military, prosecutors say.

The issue of the scope of the judge's inquiry into Padilla's mental condition is important because it could open the door to the first detailed examination of torture allegations made by an alleged enemy combatant.

Was he tortured? Was he subjected to stress positions and forced hypothermia? Was he administered mind-altering drugs?

Defense lawyers alleged each of these abuses and more in a motion pending before Cooke to dismiss the entire case against Padilla because the government engaged in outrageous conduct during his military detention.

"What you have here is a battle of conflicting theories about the entire case," says Stephen Vladeck, a professor at the University of Miami Law School.

Federal prosecutors are trying to restrict the scope of any competency hearing. The difficulty from the government's perspective, analysts say, is that even if Cooke eventually rules Padilla is competent to stand trial, there is no guarantee that she might not also dismiss the case because of facts uncovered during a wide-ranging inquiry into Padilla's earlier treatment by the military.

"There is every reason to believe that the defense will improperly seek to use a competency hearing as a vehicle to engage the court in detailed fact-finding about the alleged conditions of Padilla's detention," writes Assistant US Attorney John Shipley in a brief to Cooke. "There is no reason for the court to head down that path."

But the government itself headed down that path when its psychiatrist contacted individuals and reviewed reports dating to Padilla's military detention.

Padilla's lawyers want the same access in part so they can cross-examine the government's psychiatrist in a competency hearing set for next week.

Defense lawyers say the government's competency report suggests its psychiatrists were misled about the conditions of Padilla's confinement in the naval brig. And they want Cooke to find out what happened during a mysterious 72-hour gap in recordings of Padilla interrogations.

The lawyers say Padilla was subject to 24-hour video surveillance during his entire military detention – except for 72 hours of missing tape. "What could have been done to Mr. Padilla in those seventy-two, or so, hours that the government turned off the camera when for almost four years every one of Mr. Padilla's bowel movements were videotaped?" asks Natale in his brief.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

C.I.A. Veteran Races Time To Rescue Fledgling Agency (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15 — A born contrarian, Charles E. Allen has spent an intelligence career immersed in wars, alarms and debacles, often seeing the world differently from his colleagues.

A Washington legend who is variously viewed as brilliant or weird, a nuisance or a Cassandra, a courtly Southern gentleman or an irascible workaholic, Mr. Allen is again looking at things from another perspective.

Over the last 17 months, Mr. Allen, 71, has taken on his latest difficult assignment — a job that virtually no one else wanted, to rescue a fledging intelligence operation that gets little respect and assumes a role doubters say is not even necessary.

Instead of retiring after a half-century at the Central Intelligence Agency, where he helped assess threats overseas, Mr. Allen now leads the intelligence unit at the Department of Homeland Security, which is trying to predict where terrorists might strike inside the United States.

In his effort to build a credible operation, Mr. Allen has muscled his way into meetings of the nation's top spy agency chiefs, claimed ground that the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the C.I.A. had already carved up, defended his efforts before Congress and forced rivals to make room — sometimes literally — for his department.

"The dirty four-letter word in government is spelled 'turf,' " said Representative Jane Harman, a California Democrat and the new chairwoman of the House subcommittee that oversees Homeland Security intelligence operations. "Nobody wanted interference from this newbie agency."

Beyond the outside frictions, Mr. Allen has plenty of problems from within.

The Department of Homeland Security has thousands of Border Patrol guards, airport screeners and Coast Guard officers who might identify possible terrorist threats, but Mr. Allen has met resistance from some of their leaders, over whom he has little direct authority.

And though he is working 15-hour days and his weary face is criss-crossed with creases, he knows he is short on time to improve counterterrorism efforts at a department long ridiculed for its color-coded terror alerts and advice that Americans arm themselves with duct tape.

"This is an extraordinarily challenging task because of the depth, breadth and the difficult elements involved," Mr. Allen said in a recent interview. "I am impatient. We need to drive this a lot harder."

Mr. Allen has unusual bipartisan support in Congress, but even some lawmakers who admire him are frustrated at the pace of progress at Homeland Security.

"We have been in this business for four years now," said Representative Bennie Thompson, Democrat of Mississippi, the chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee. "We should be a lot farther down the road."

And as he begins to make progress — sifting through data collected on Americans and foreign visitors by Homeland Security or local and state authorities — his labor is causing unease among civil libertarians who consider it domestic spying.

"They call it a 'seamless national intelligence system' " said John Reinstein, legal director at the American Civil Liberities Union in Massachusetts. "I call it a reason to be very concerned."

Some of Mr. Allen's friends believe his task is almost hopeless. "What we're doing is essentially setting a great man up for failure," said John Gannon, a former C.I.A. deputy director of intelligence.

Mr. Allen is undeterred. He is again "breaking heads" and holding "Come to Jesus meetings" — his own description of his management style — and barking out demands to his staff.

"The country is at risk," he said. "It is a darker world."

The predawn telephone call is still seared into Mr. Allen's memory: it was Oct. 6,1973, at 3 a.m., and Golda Meir, the Israeli prime minister, had just told the White House that within hours her nation would be attacked by Syrian and Egyptian forces, which had been conducting drills along its borders.

The night before, Mr. Allen had approved the president's daily intelligence briefing, assuring President Richard M. Nixon that the military exercises were just a bluff.

"It takes the Israelis 48 hours to mobilize," he said, still wincing today over the consequences of his disastrously bad call. "There was nothing they could do."

From that day forward, Mr. Allen, who joined the C.I.A. immediately after graduating from the University of North Carolina, lived by new standards.

"Don't listen too much to what others are telling you," Mr. Allen said. "Constantly re-examine your assumptions."

Mr. Allen pushed himself and those around him to go deeper for information; Mr. Gannon calls him a "pile driver." Colleagues and bosses were often unwilling to accept his conclusions. But over the decades, Mr. Allen, whose C.I.A. posts included assistant director for collection and national intelligence officer for warning, compiled a remarkable record.

In the mid 1980s, he was the first to warn his C.I.A. superiors that a Marine officer named Oliver North appeared to be orchestrating a scheme in which profits from American weapons sales to Iran went to rebels fighting the government of Nicaragua.

In late July 1990, he warned that Iraq would invade Kuwait within days. Iraqi tanks rolled into Kuwait on Aug. 2.

After Al Qaeda's bombing of American embassies in East Africa, Mr. Allen pressed his superiors in 2000 and 2001 to send drones over Afghanistan to look for Osama bin Laden and his followers, a request that was delayed by disputes over financing. The 9/11 Commission, calling him the "indefatigable Charlie Allen," cited the missed opportunity.

And before the United States invaded Iraq in 2003, Mr. Allen led an effort to collect interviews of families of Iraqi scientists to ask about the country's secret weapons programs. The families said the programs had been halted, but Mr. Allen's bosses and the White House rejected that view.

Mr. Allen's critics label him a doomsayer, saying that his contrarian advice and strident warnings became so frequent that some at the C.I.A tuned him out.

But the critics are outnumbered by supporters of Mr. Allen. "Charlie is a national asset," said Paul Redmond, a former C.I.A. director of counterintelligence who briefly served as Homeland Security's intelligence chief. "He is not afraid to say, that's a bunch of nonsense."

When Homeland Security was created in 2003, its leaders could not even get the money or authorization for adequate office space.

From the start, the agency was pushed out of the leading role in assembling and tracking information on terror threats in the United States. With the blessing of the Bush administration, the C.I.A. and the F.B.I. in 2003 opened what is now known as the National Counterterrorism Center to do that job.

When Mr. Allen arrived at Homeland Security in 2005, he leaned on his intelligence contacts. Now his agency has a seat at the table when the six other leaders of the nation's top intelligence agencies meet with the director of national intelligence.

Mr. Allen recently checked out new office space at the National Counterterrorism Center in Northern Virginia, where his agency will soon take command of a new unit in charge of distributing information about terror threats to local and state officials, the private sector and other federal agencies.

He has also stepped up training for analysts at Homeland Security's six agencies with intelligence staffs, and begun recruiting at colleges.

He has installed analysts at a dozen so-called fusion centers set up by state and local police departments to coordinate reports of possible terror threats, and hopes to have his staff at all 35 centers nationwide by the end of next year. He has started units to look into homegrown terror threats and border security.

To avoid civil liberties complaints, the teams are trained, he said, to ensure they collect information on Americans only if there is "reasonable suspicion" they represent a threat.

Building this network has required diplomacy. While visiting state and city police officers and chatting with members of Congress, he tries to convince them that Homeland Security has something to add, and is not simply creating another layer of bureaucracy.

"There are plenty of lanes to work in," Mr. Allen frequently says. "And our lanes in the road I think are getting very well defined."

Some local officials cite improvements. First Sgt. Lee Miller of the Virginia State Police said that when incidents occurred that might have a potential terror connection, his staff got answers faster than before.

But widespread skepticism about Mr. Allen's operation remains.

Mr. Allen has had such a hard time recruiting a staff, nearly two-thirds of his analysts are contractors. Homeland Security's own agencies — particularly Customs and Border Protection, and Immigration and Customs Enforcement — still often fail to share potentially important tips with other federal players, a failure that Mr. Allen says earned him a rebuke from John D. Negroponte, then the director of national intelligence.

"It's your second year, Charlie," he recalled being told. "You better do a better job."

Some local agencies echo that concern.

"Information doesn't get to me because they don't believe I have a need to know," Acting Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier of Washington said during a Senate hearing last month.

Richard A. Falkenrath, deputy commissioner for counterterrorism at the New York City Police Department, said that his department had a more valuable partnership with the F.B.I., which can not only warn of terror threats, but can also investigate and help prosecute them. The F.B.I. has about 100 counter-terrorism offices around the country.

Given the enormousness of the work ahead, Mr. Allen said he realized he would not complete the job. But during a recent late-afternoon interview in which his eyes seemed frequently almost to close, he said: "Right now, I'll continue. There is much ahead."

New Threat: Agro-Terrorism (CBS)

CBS News, February 16, 2007

Some Experts Warn That America's Food Chain Could Be An Inviting Target

(CBS) Nearly 300 people were sick before the current salmonella outbreak could be tracked to a peanut butter processor in Georgia, CBS News correspondent Bob Orr reports. Two hundred others were ill and three people had died by the time scientists traced last fall's E. coli contamination to California spinach.

Both accidental outbreaks underscore a frightening reality: Once a poison or bio-agent infects America's food chain, it's hard to detect — and even harder to stop making the U.S. food supply an inviting target for terrorists.

"This is the new fight, the battleground since 9/11," says John Perren, who runs the FBI office handing weapons of mass destruction.

Perren says so-called "agro-terrorism" is a real threat from "farm to fork."

"The food chain, the agriculture system, is very large. Therefore we have vulnerabilities. We consider that a soft target," Perren says.

While terrorists have not made a move against U.S. agriculture, bio-weapons researcher Jerry Jaxx says it would be easy to taint the food supply or damage America's $2 trillion farm economy.

"Certainly, these are risks that are very, very real," says Jaxx.

The most worrisome agro-weapon is "foot and mouth," a highly contagious disease that doesn't hurt people — but ravages livestock.

It was wiped out in the U.S. 80 years ago, but it remains a threat in much of the world. In 2001, 4 million infected animals in the United Kingdom had to be slaughtered and burned.

Food experts warn a single outbreak of foot and mouth disease in the U.S., whether triggered by an accident or a terrorist, could cause much greater damage. Millions of cattle would have to be destroyed, and economic losses could run into the tens of billions of dollars.

The foot and mouth virus could be easily carried to the United States from an infected area by a tourist or a terrorist. Experts say reporting on this vulnerability — and other food-related risks — does not help terror groups. They already have the information.

Scientists are fighting back. CBS News got an exclusive look at a first-of-its- kind, yet-to-be-opened Agriculture Biosecurity Center at Kansas State University. Investigators there will work to identify emerging bio-threats, handling some of the most lethal pathogens, from E. coli to anthrax to foot and mouth.

"If we were to have some sort of an outbreak, we have a place to really deal with the science involved in trying to figure out how best to respond," Jaxx says.

The research will improve defenses against both deliberate and accidental contamination. Biologist Doug Powell says consumers should not overly worry about food-related threats.

"Agro-terrorism is always there. It's like food-borne illness in a way, in that you don't really know where it's going to come from next, so your best prevention is constant vigilance," Powell says.

An awareness that America's food supply, while the safest in the world, will never be completely free from risk.

FEDERAL DIARY: Effort To Give TSA Screeners Union Rights Advances (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, February 16, 2007

It was a good day for unions.

A Senate committee yesterday approved a measure that would give collective-bargaining rights to about 43,000 airport screeners at the Transportation Security Administration. The committee's action followed House approval of similar legislation last month.

If the Senate goes along with the committee's decision, the issue of union rights for TSA screeners is likely to provoke a rare clash with the White House over federal workplace rules. After the House vote, the Bush administration vowed to oppose the legislation.

The American Federation of Government Employees, which has pushed hard to bring TSA screeners into the union fold, praised the committee's decision and predicted the measure would improve working conditions for screeners.

"It is good news," said John Gage, the union president. AFGE plans to bring about 800 members to Washington near the end of this month to lobby Congress on behalf of the screeners, he said. "We have some work to do with the Republican side of the aisle, and I think we will be successful."

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, proposed the union-rights amendment to the Senate bill that would implement unfinished recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission. He prevailed on a party-line vote of 9 to 8.

As part of the response to the 2001 terrorist attacks, Congress created the TSA to take charge of passenger and baggage screening at the nation's airports. It also provided the head of the TSA with leeway to set personnel rules and ban unions.

The TSA later merged into the Department of Homeland Security, where unions filed suit to stop proposed curbs to bargaining rights.

But Lieberman said "personnel management has been troubled at TSA" and concluded that "it is time to give TSA screeners parity with other security officers within TSA and DHS in terms of their employment rights and protections."

Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), a committee member, spoke against Lieberman's amendment. He said there have not been sufficient hearings on unionization of TSA workers, that the 9/11 Commission Report did not recommend it, and that allowing unions at the TSA would strip the agency of its ability to quickly deploy employees to respond to terrorist threats.

But AFGE had lobbied senators before the vote, contending that current law permits agencies to take whatever personnel actions they deem necessary to respond to emergencies. The union stressed that other law enforcement bureaus in Homeland Security, such as Border Patrol and Customs and Border Protection, permit their employees to be represented by unions.

"Denying these people rights that everyone else has in Homeland Security is not based on any rational reason," said Gage, who brought a TSA screener from New Haven, Conn., this week to meet with Lieberman and explain why screeners should be able to join unions.

TSA officials said steps have been taken to ensure that security screeners can share their views with agency management. An employee advisory council brings in screeners from around the country to offer advice on compensation and other issues, and the TSA is rolling out a model workplace program to airports to teach employees and managers how to collaborate and resolve workplace issues, the officials said.

"This is our way to get our employees heard and let them have a voice and a seat at the table," said Gale Rossides, an associate administrator at the TSA.

The agency recently completed its first year under a pay-for-performance system that was designed with feedback from more than 4,000 employees, "telling us what was important," Rossides said.

Turnover at the TSA is declining and compares favorably with the transportation and utilities industries, Rossides said. In fiscal 2006, the TSA's attrition rate was 16.5 percent, while turnover was 19.6 percent in transportation-utilities sector, she said.

"We are continuing to focus to drive that number down," Rossides added.Talk Shows

Steven L. Katz, a former Senate committee counsel and a former federal agency executive, will be the guest on "FedTalk" at 11 a.m. today on federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

9/11 Bill Boosts TSA Union Rights (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

The Senate version of legislation implementing the remaining recommendations of the September 11 commission, like its House counterpart passed earlier this year, has a provision expanding union rights for airport security screeners.

The bill, which was marked up and reported out yesterday by the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, also mandates a pilot project that would allow new secure driver's licenses to be used instead of passports at the Canadian border. However, it does not contain some of the more radical cargo and port security measures in the House version.

Language added to the bill in an amendment proposed by committee Chairman Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent, repeals a footnote in the 2001 law setting up the Transportation Security Administration. The footnote gave the agency's director wide discretion to decide issues of union and other labor rights for the thousands of passenger and baggage screeners it employs.

The amendment passed on a party-line vote, and the entire bill -- the Improving America's Security Act -- was approved by the committee unanimously.

Charity Wilson, a congressional lobbyist for the American Federation of Government Employees, said the labor rights language, if passed into law, would ensure that TSA screeners had the same collective bargaining, union rights and whistleblower protections as other civil servants.

The TSA "will no longer be able to pick and choose which labor laws apply to its workers," said Miss Wilson, and the screeners would be entitled to unionize like other federal employees.

She added it was "no coincidence" that TSA screeners, effectively denied union representation for more than five years, have one of the highest rates of complaints about workplace discrimination of any federal workers, an attrition rate more than 10 times that of the U.S. government as a whole and one of the highest injury rates of any job classification tracked by the federal Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

An amendment proposed by Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota Republican, mandates that the Department of Homeland Security set up a pilot program with at least one state under which machine-readable, tamper-proof driver's licenses could be used at the Canadian border instead of a U.S. passport or special passport card when more secure documents become required at all U.S. borders under the Western Hemisphere Travel Initiative.

That initiative, mandated by Congress in 2004, requires the government to move toward requiring passports or other secure documents establishing identity and citizenship from Americans re-entering the country. Language in last year's homeland security appropriations law postponed the introduction of the initiative until 2009 and required officials to pass a series of benchmarks and certifications before it could be implemented. Mr. Coleman's amendment adds to the list of things officials are required to have completed before they can implement the initiative.

Coleman spokesman LeRoy Coleman said the senator thinks that new security improvements in driver's licenses "present an opportunity to explore their possible use to meet the requirements of [the initiative]."

Freedom From Fear (NYT)

By Guy Nordenson

New York Times, February 16, 2007

THERE is still time to take the fear out of the Freedom Tower. Despite reports that Gov. Eliot Spitzer has now decided to back the project, the fact is that with a little time it is still possible to rethink the tower and make it both secure and welcoming without setting back the overall ground zero construction schedule.

The current design, which was unveiled in 2006, was created under pressure from former Gov. George Pataki, who tied his presidential ambitions to its swift completion. In this plan, the architects and engineers, for several reasons, took a very conservative approach. The result, a 20-story fortified wall around the base of a 1,776-foot tower, hardly evokes freedom — rather, it embodies fear and anxiety.

I write from experience. Some four years ago I began working with David Childs, the principal architect, on the first version of the Freedom Tower. This was a 2,000-foot-tall structure of torquing glass and steel; the bottom half contained the office building while the top half was a broadcast tower composed of an open framework of cables and trusses. (Also in 2002 The New York Times Magazine published a proposal of mine for a 2,000-foot-tall broadcast tower on the site that we have been working on intermittently ever since.)The structure would have given the tower the widest TV broadcast capacity possible, at the maximum height allowed by the Federal Aviation Administration. The office floors ended at about 70 stories, matching the tallest downtown office building, with as much overall floor area as the current design and with every floor having direct access to the ground level by elevator. The open, cable-stayed upper 1,000 feet of the structure would have had wind turbines that would have met more than 20 percent of the building's energy needs, a fitting symbol for a city whose seal includes a windmill.

While the basic design won over almost everyone involved with the project, including many of the governor's advisers, Mr. Pataki asked the architect to amend it in late 2003. Specifically, he wanted Mr. Childs to reduce the upper structure from 2,000 to 1,500 feet, and to add a slender 276-foot antenna to make it a symbolic 1,776 feet tall. The alterations, unfortunately, made the design impossible to build, and eventually the entire concept was abandoned.

So Mr. Childs presented the revised Freedom Tower, which meets Mr. Pataki's interests but bears no resemblance to his initial design. It is in every way inferior, and those flaws — in terms of aesthetics, economics, security and ethics — are all rooted in the way in which it was conceived.

First, the aesthetics. The critics have not been kind to the Freedom Tower. The solid geometry is self-centered — this newspaper's critic wrote that it "evokes a gigantic glass paperweight with a toothpick stuck on top" — without any sense of orientation or any recognition of its place in the skyline. This is a shame, especially considering what the same architects showed they were capable of next door, in the elegant new 7 World Trade Center building.

But it is understandable: not only were the architects rushed by Mr. Pataki, but after the ordeal of the first design's development and rejection, it seems natural that Mr. Childs would reach for a simple geometry the second time around. The result, unfortunately, would be second rate in Chicago, Dubai or Shanghai, and should not be the symbol of New York City, let alone freedom.

Second, the finances of the new building are a disaster. The Freedom Tower will most likely cost around $3 billion to build, for 2.6 million square feet of office space. The cost of $1,150 a square foot is nearly twice what it cost to build the new Museum of Modern Art, for which I was also the engineer. Of the cost, about $1 billion will be paid with insurance money collected by the ground zero leaseholder, Larry Silverstein.

Assuming that the owners of the Freedom Tower, the Port Authority, are able to sign government or other tenants on at market rate rents of $50 to $60 per square foot, the income on the entire property, after expenses and taxes and including the rent on the TV antennas, will be at most $100 million dollars a year, which is less than 4 percent return on the investment. The Port Authority would do better buying back its bonds, which now offer a return of greater than 5 percent. What is more, the property is probably uninsurable, so the Port Authority will be spending billions for a below-market return and a substantial risk.

Third, the security concerns that have blocked so many facets of the plan remain unresolved. Last January, I sat in a meeting in the New York City police commissioner's conference room and listened to a debate on various security plans and blast-resistant designs for the different projects at ground zero. In the end, James Kallstrom, Governor Pataki's senior counterterrorism adviser and the security coordinator for ground zero, closed the discussion by saying, "Structural engineers will have to certify that the design meets the threat basis."

I understood this to mean that as long as the engineers signed off on the design, everything would be considered fine. This is worrisome, especially given that that the computer software that is being used to simulate the blast effects is proprietary and classified by the federal government, and that the structural engineers being asked to certify the building do not have clearance or direct access to the program, only the data given them by the software.

In contrast, the approach taken by most private building owners in the city — which generally includes physical tests, repeated independent computer simulations and help from the Defense Department's technical support working group — provides real assurances of security. The Freedom Tower deserves the same sound engineering approach as any commercial project.

The final problem with the tower is less obvious: the politically charged situation under which it was conceived has led to ethical problems in terms of tenancy. Mr. Silverstein never wanted to build the Freedom Tower, and few could blame him. The site is awkward, too far from public transportation and Wall Street, and the tower is too big for the downtown real estate market to absorb in time to realize a good profit. Last year, he exchanged this problem for the three towers he is now developing on the site, leaving the Port Authority saddled with the Freedom Tower.

The authority itself, however, will not occupy the Freedom Tower but will rent space from Mr. Silverstein in Tower Four, at the opposite corner of the site. So far, state agencies, under pressure from Mr. Pataki, have signed on for about 400,000 square feet (roughly one-sixth of the tower's floor space) Federal agencies including the Customs Service and the Secret Service will most likely sign on for 600,000 square feet.

In other words, government employees are being conscripted to occupy a tower that no private company or authority — including the building's owner — will take. At a time when there is considerable anguish over the 20,000 additional troops that President Bush wants to send to Baghdad, it seems that the ethics of forcing thousands of state and federal employees to work in fear in the Freedom Tower is fundamentally flawed.

The good news is that it is not too late to change things. The current construction of the foundation and subterranean levels does not lock us into a final design above ground. The work should continue up to the ground level and stop (this should take about a year) so that the architects and engineers are given another chance to design a Freedom Tower that, like other buildings rising downtown, is financially viable and a secure and welcoming work environment worthy of its place in the skyline.

Couple Drops Suit Against Allstate Over Katrina Damage (LAW/AP)

By Michael Kunzelman, The Associated Press

AP, February 16, 2007

The first federal trial in New Orleans in the wave of insurance litigation spawned by Hurricane Katrina ended abruptly Thursday when a couple suing Allstate Indemnity Co. dropped their lawsuit amid allegations they misrepresented their claims.

Lawrence and Elizabeth Tomlinson, who claimed Allstate underpaid them and acted in bad faith in handling their claims, agreed to drop the suit before jurors could hear closing arguments in the case.

The Tomlinsons' attorney, Christy Howley, would not specify why they didn't let a jury decide the case, but Allstate, in court papers, had accused the couple of misrepresenting their claim.

The Northbrook, Ill.-based insurer said it paid the Tomlinsons more than $30,000 for living expenses after they moved into office property that they already owned. Lawrence Tomlinson testified that Allstate knew of their living arrangement when they made the payment.

Allstate paid the Tomlinsons a total of more than $150,000 for damage to their home and its contents, plus living expenses. The couple claimed the company underpaid them after Katrina's winds tore holes in their roof and let rain pour into their home in the New Orleans suburb of Marrero.

The insurer disputed the extent of the damage and suggested that the couple overbilled them for certain renovations to the home. Allstate attorney Judy Barrasso declined to say whether the company has considered taking further legal action against the couple.

"At the conclusion of the evidence, the plaintiffs decided voluntarily to withdraw their claims and relinquish any right to refile them," Barrasso said. "The plaintiffs have not received any compensation of any kind from Allstate for withdrawing their claim."

Lawrence Tomlinson declined to discuss his reason for not pursuing the case, saying only that the trial "has been a long trip." Elizabeth Tomlinson, an attorney who is due to give birth in about two weeks, left the courtroom in tears.

Howley said her clients were ready to "go back to their lives and rebuild with the moneys they had already been paid" after more than a year out of their home and a long legal challenge.

"A jury verdict, until the jury returns with it, is always an unknown and due to some of the evidence and testimony, Mr. and Mrs. Tomlinson decided they would rather end the litigation than pursue their claims," Howley said.

She declined to say what evidence and testimony led the couple to that conclusion.

The case was the first federal lawsuit tried against an insurance company by a Louisiana homeowner since Hurricane Katrina. About 1,000 other lawsuits are pending against Allstate alone in federal court in New Orleans.

Tulane Law School professor Ed Sherman said the Tomlinsons' case is "very individualized" and isn't likely to have any legal bearing on similar lawsuits. "That's why I don't think this (case) sets any precedent," he added.

Alan Kanner, a lawyer who represents other policyholders with lawsuits against insurers after Katrina, said he isn't aware of other cases where insurers have accused plaintiffs of misrepresenting Katrina claims. But he isn't surprised that Allstate would employ that defense.

"It's a common defense tactic to blame the victims, whether it's in an insurance case or any other kind of case," he said. "They do it in lots of different ways."

U.S. District Judge Martin dismissed the seven-member jury, which had been selected Monday, and apologized to them for making them wait several hours Thursday morning. "The good news is that claims and defenses have been mutually withdrawn," Feldman told the jury. "This litigation no longer exists."

Steal Magnolia (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

State Farm, the nation's largest home insurer, announced this week that it would no longer be writing new homeowner or commercial policies in Mississippi. Magnolia Staters wondering whom to thank for their rising insurance bills, assuming they can get insurance at all, should direct their catcalls at Attorney General Jim Hood.

Mr. Hood should have seen this coming back in September of 2005, when he launched his populist campaign against insurers. In the wake of Hurricane Katrina, private insurers began invoking their entirely legal "flood exclusions" and refusing to pay for any damage that wasn't caused by wind. These exclusions had been clearly written into contracts, yet Mr. Hood declared them "unconscionable" and sued the industry.

He claimed victory several weeks ago when he bludgeoned State Farm into a settlement, although everyone can now see his triumph comes at a price. State Farm will now be paying at least tens of millions of dollars in claims that it never factored into its risk premiums, and it has reasonably chosen not to make itself vulnerable again to Mr. Hood's extortion.

"It is no longer prudent for us to take on additional risk in a legal and business environment that is becoming more unpredictable," said State Farm Senior Vice President Bob Trippel, which is a polite way of saying "we'd be nuts to keep doing business in a state that can't spell c-o-n-t-r-a-c-t."

State Farm joins Allstate, which last year also stopped writing policies along Mississippi's coast. Together, the two insurers make up 40.5% of the Mississippi market. Homeowners looking for coverage will now have fewer companies to choose from, with higher premiums the likely result. If the rest of the industry follows suit and also exits Mississippi, consumers could have no choice at all.

Surrounding states such as Florida, which have begun to follow Mr. Hood down the insurance-bashing path, might want to reverse course before their own consumers end up staring down the next hurricane with no coverage. As for Mr. Hood, he and his buddies in the tort bar have provided an exquisite illustration of how political and legal predation against business ends up harming the little guy.

In Setback For New Orleans, Fed-Up Residents Give Up (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

DOJ_NMG_0132952

NEW ORLEANS, Feb. 15 — After nearly a decade in the city of their dreams, Kasandra Larsen and her fiancé, Dylan Langlois, climbed into a rented moving truck on Marais Street last Sunday, pointed it toward New Hampshire, and said goodbye.

Not because of some great betrayal — they had, after all, come back after losing everything in Hurricane Katrina — but a series of escalating indignities: the attempted carjacking of a pregnant friend; the announced move to Nashville by Ms. Larsen's employer; the human feces deposited on their roof by, they suspect, the contractors next door; the two burglaries in the space of a week; and, not least, the overnight wait for the police to respond.

A year ago, Ms. Larsen, 36, and Mr. Langlois, 37, were hopeful New Orleanians eager to rebuild and improve the city they adored. But now they have joined hundreds of the city's best and brightest who, as if finally acknowledging a lover's destructive impulses, have made the wrenching decision to leave at a time when the population is supposed to be rebounding.

Their reasons include high crime, high rents, soaring insurance premiums and what many call a lack of leadership, competence, money and progress. In other words: yes, it is still bad down here. But more damning is what many of them describe as a dissipating sense of possibility, a dwindling chance at redemption for a great city that, even before the storm, cried out for great improvement.

"The window of opportunity is closing," Ms. Larsen said, "before more people like us give up and say it's too little, too late."

Mr. Langlois, who has repeatedly called the health and sanitation departments, the police and City Hall, said he despaired of receiving any response. In November, the couple bought their first house, and in December, they bought their first handgun.

"My friends here are just the greatest, hard-working, tax-paying people," Mr. Langlois said, "and I think a lot of us are feeling under siege."

The couple are unlikely to make any money on the sale of their house.

For every household that, like this one, has given up, there is another on the verge. Tyrone Wilson, a successful real estate agent and consultant, said he and his wife, Trina, a lawyer, had given post-storm life a fair chance. But, Mr. Wilson said, at the end of the school year they are likely to take their three children back to Dallas, where they took refuge after the storm.

"We came back, we tried," he said. "It's really draining, and at a certain point you sit down and you say, 'We don't have to go through this.' "

As a city in flux, New Orleans remains statistically murky, but demographers generally agree that the population replenishment after the storm, as measured by things like the amount of mail sent and employment in main economic sectors, has leveled off. While many poorer residents have moved back to the city, the "brain drain" of professionals that the city was experiencing before the storm appears to have accelerated.

Some say the overall effect is negligible. Greg Rigamer, a demographer who has done work for the city, said that the lack of housing had constrained the recovery, but that many residents remained fully committed to the city.

"The pattern in is certainly stronger than the pattern out," Mr. Rigamer said.

But in December, the number of houses on the market peaked at a high not seen since the late 1980s, while the number of sales has trended downward since last June, according to data tracked by the Brookings Institution in Washington. Statistics kept by commercial moving companies show a net loss to New Orleans. Employers say they have raised salaries for skilled workers.

One oft-cited survey by the University of New Orleans found that a third of residents, especially those with graduate degrees, were thinking of leaving within two years.

Susan E. Howell, who conducted the survey, cautioned that the sample was small and that the poor were underrepresented. There are indications that low-income New Orleanians — those who will need the most help from a cash-strapped city —are making their way back, despite a lack of affordable housing, piling into relatives' homes and trailers.

U-Haul, the rental company that is more affordable than commercial movers, has had more inbound trucks than outbound, according to the company's records, and the number of public school children and new applications for food stamps in Orleans Parish are rising. In Houston, a task force that helps Hurricane Katrina residents resettle has paid more than $1 million in moving expenses for 350 families returning to New Orleans.

"This is a serious problem for the city, because one of the things we had pre-Katrina was the lack of an educated population," Dr. Howell said. "We had too many people at the low end and not enough at the high end, and Katrina sort of fast-forwarded that trend."

Because many poorer people have taken longer to return, they have not dealt with as many months of frustration as families with higher income and more mobility, so their staying power has yet to be determined.

Reganer Stewart, 30, a hotel maid, said she had been living with her cousin and her cousin's mother and four children since November. In January, Ms. Stewart's 12-year-old daughter, Brandi, joined them, but was put on a waiting list for school and could not enroll until earlier this month.

Houston, which Ms. Stewart had not liked when she evacuated there, was growing more attractive as her search for an apartment here grew longer. "Most likely, we going to leave," she said.

In battered but proud New Orleans, abandonment is a highly emotional subject, in part because many have made sacrifices to stay and rebuild. To some, leaving now is tantamount to treason. When a report appeared a year ago that Emeril Lagasse, the famed chef, had said the city would "never come back," reservations at his restaurants were canceled and strangers berated him. He insisted he had been misquoted.

And in response to an article in The Times-Picayune of New Orleans about a woman who had decided to move on, Poppy Z. Brite, a New Orleans novelist, wrote: "This isn't an easy place to be right now, and the decision to stay or go is deeply personal. But why must some people use the media to take a parting shot at the city?"

On another occasion, Ms. Brite said, "If a place takes you in and you take it into yourself, you don't desert it just because it can kill you. There are some things more valuable than life."

Such fierce sentiments help explain why a dozen people who were planning to move or had already done so declined to speak on the record for this article or allow their name to be used. One man, a chef, said he wanted to remain anonymous because he was likely to return someday. A university professor said she did not want to compromise her employer's ability to recruit.

"If I was going to be really politically savvy," she said, "I would say that I was going to do a job search about this time anyway."

The decision to leave is especially difficult for natives, said Elliott Stonecipher, a demographic analyst in Shreveport, La., even if they are going no farther than the north shore of Lake Pontchartrain.

"They just won't talk about it; they do not want to talk about it," Mr. Stonecipher said, adding that the reluctance shows just how unusual the city is. "It's remarkable that they just don't want anybody to know that they gave in."

Others have unimpeachable reasons: Paul Gailiunas, a doctor whose wife, Helen Hill, was murdered in their home last month, left immediately for South Carolina.

As for Ms. Larsen and Mr. Langlois, they have taken in all the fury at those who are leaving, in newspapers, neighborhood forums on the Internet and even in the bars and cafes of their neighborhood, the Ninth Ward. But while many of their own friends had expressed disappointment, none had blamed them.

"Not only do they understand why we're leaving," Ms. Larsen said, "but they say, 'You know what, I'm thinking about getting out of here, too.' It's like they're waiting for that one more bad thing to happen."

President George W. Bush is sending an additional 3,200 troops to Afghanistan to bolster US and Nato forces ahead of an expected tough spring offensive by the resurgent Taliban.

Borrowing the rhetoric of US and Nato commanders, who are preparing to step up their campaign against the Taliban, Mr Bush said: "This spring there's going to be a new offensive in Afghanistan. It's going to be a Nato offensive, and that's part of our strategy."

The Pentagon will send the 173rd Airborne brigade, which was originally scheduled for deployment to Iraq, to Afghanistan to replace another brigade whose tour was recently extended by several months.

In a speech to the American Enterprise Institute, Mr Bush sought to set out a strategy for political and military success, saying troop increases would be sustained. The move comes as Congress debates his strategy to send additional troops to Iraq to pacify Baghdad. Lawmakers are less resistant to sending more troops to Afghanistan, where Democrats and Republicans agree that the US and Nato need to strengthen their efforts to deal with the Taliban.

Robert Gates, the new US defence secretary, and John McCain, Arizona senator and likely candidate for the Republican presidential nomination, in Munich last weekend strongly urged European countries to increase their military and financial participation in the Afghanistan campaign. Mr Gates said it was important to remember that Nato was a "military alliance" and not a "social club". The US wants some European members, including Germany and Spain, to eliminate some of the restrictions on their troops in the Nato force.

Mr Bush on Thursday said he had asked Congress for $11.8bn (€9bn, £6bn) over the next two years "to help this young democracy survive and have extended the stay of 3,000 troops . . . The forces and funds will help Hamid Karzai [the Afghan president] defeat our common enemies".

The decision to send additional troops followed a comprehensive review of administration strategy but also comes amid mounting criticism from Democrats such as John Kerry who see the Iraq war as a dangerous diversion from tackling the Taliban threat.

Mr Bush said there had been progress in the past five years in Afghanistan, such as expanding education and doubling the size of the economy, but he acknowledged the deterioration in conditions, with roadside bombs doubling last year and suicide bombs increasing fivefold.

Bush Extends Stay Of Troops In Afghanistan (USAT)

WASHINGTON — President Bush urged NATO allies Thursday to boost their efforts in Afghanistan and said he is extending the stay of 3,200 U.S. troops there to help beat back a resurgent Taliban and al-Qaeda.

Bush highlighted the role of NATO and its member nations in Afghanistan, the first theater in the global war on terrorism. Bush spoke to the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think tank.

AUDIO: Bush urges NATO allies to offer additional aid

"For NATO to succeed, member nations must provide commanders on the ground with the troops and the equipment they need to do their jobs," Bush said.

A U.S.-dominated coalition deposed the Taliban shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon. The Taliban had given sanctuary to al-Qaeda, which carried out the attacks.

Bush noted that 2006 was the most violent year in Afghanistan since the 2001 liberation, with the Taliban and al-Qaeda launching strikes against Afghan President Hamid Karzai's new government in Kabul. Last year, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group led by former secretary of State James Baker and former congressman Lee Hamilton said "the huge focus of U.S. political, military and economic support on Iraq has necessarily diverted attention from Afghanistan."

Warning that the Taliban and al-Qaeda are planning new attacks as the winter snow melts, Bush outlined a multipoint plan that includes boosting Afghanistan's military and police forces, creating jobs for Afghans to build roads and other infrastructure, steps to curb government corruption and a crackdown on poppy cultivation to stem the production and sale of illegal drugs.

Bush also said he asked Congress for $11.8 billion in aid to Afghanistan for the next two years.

Nations that have sent the most troops to Afghanistan — including Great Britain, the Netherlands and Canada — have joined the United States in lobbying other NATO members. There are about 35,000 NATO troops.

Bush also called on member nations to lift restrictions on the troops they sent to Afghanistan. NATO forces, he said, "must have the flexibility and rules of engagement to do their job." Some nations, whose identities are unknown, forbid troops from fighting in certain parts of the country, or at night.

Bush also praised NATO nations for increased contributions, such as new aircraft from Italy and special operations forces coming from Norway, Lithuania and the Czech Republic.

The president's strategy also includes helping Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf prevent attacks on Afghanistan that are launched from his country. Karzai has questioned Musharraf's commitment to finding terrorists, but Bush said he is confident the Pakistani leader wants to root out Taliban and al-Qaeda bases on his nation's border with Afghanistan.

"This is wild country," Bush said. "This is wilder than the Wild West."

The president briefly mentioned the ongoing debate in the House of Representatives on a resolution opposing his plan to increase U.S. troop levels in Iraq. The Democratic-led House is expected to approve the resolution today.

While the House resolution is non-binding, Bush said members soon will be voting on an emergency spending bill to provide funding for troops. He said the troops "are counting on their elected leaders to provide them with the support they need."

The American Enterprise Institute was once home to several members of the Bush administration, such as Vice President Cheney, and has long supported Bush's foreign policy initiatives.

Bush Pushes NATO To Foil Taliban Offensive (WT)

By Stephen Dinan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

President Bush yesterday said NATO will begin a new military campaign to defeat the Taliban in Afghanistan, announced U.S. troop levels in that country will remain at their all-time high of 27,000 "for the foreseeable future," and said NATO allies must respond with more troops of their own.

"This spring there is going to be a new offensive in Afghanistan, and it's going to be a NATO offensive," the president said in a speech to the American Enterprise Institute, laying out a path forward in Afghanistan. "That's part of our strategy -- relentless in our pressure. We will not give in to murderers and extremists."

He promised a five-part plan designed to put Afghan President Hamid Karzai's government on more solid footing, including training 26,000 more national police and 48,000 more troops for the military; strengthening NATO's commitment; improving provincial government; reversing last year's growth in heroin-producing poppy, which finances the Taliban; and helping Mr. Karzai fight corruption in the judicial system.

Mr. Bush also repeated his challenge to NATO member nations that when NATO commanders say they need reinforcements, "our NATO countries must provide it."

The speech comes as a growing number of Democrats and Republicans say the administration has failed to complete the mission in Afghanistan in part because Mr. Bush has been too preoccupied in Iraq.

Last month, when the president announced his plan to send reinforcements to Iraq, top Democrats accused him of fulfilling that pledge by shifting troops from Afghanistan.

Yesterday Democrats said Mr. Bush is responsible for the new nation's failures.

"The Bush administration took its eye off the ball in Afghanistan, leaving a deteriorating situation to worsen and Osama bin Laden on the loose more than five years after 9/11," said Democratic National Committee Press Secretary Stacie Paxton.

The new strategy drew a mixed review from Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, the top Republican on the House Foreign Affairs Committee. She said the steps to secure the Afghan-Pakistan border and create economic opportunities are solid, but that Mr. Bush should do more against drug trafficking.

"Until the Afghan judicial system has been rid of the corrupting influence of drugs, we should implement an approach that has been used successfully in the fight against drugs in Colombia, namely extradition of the major kingpins to the U.S.," she said.

Just as 2006 saw increased violence and insurgent successes in Iraq, it was also a year in which Taliban and al Qaeda fighters stepped up their battle to win control of more of Afghanistan.

Mr. Bush ticked off the indicators: Roadside bombs nearly doubled, engagements between insurgents and troops tripled, and suicide bombings grew five-fold.

He also said opium poppy cultivation, which had fallen in 2005, saw "a marked increase" last year.

The president challenged Afghanistan's government to tackle that problem, saying, "I have made my concerns to President Karzai pretty clear -- not pretty clear, very clear."

Bush Tells NATO To Reinforce Afghanistan (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, February 16, 2007

President Bush said Thursday that NATO allies need to supply more soldiers to Afghanistan and be willing to send them into the most violent battles with Taliban fighters, who are gearing up for a new spring offensive.

"When our commanders on the ground say to our respective countries we need additional help, our NATO countries must provide it," Bush said.

Flush with money from heroin-producing poppy crops, Taliban fighters have proven much tougher than NATO expected when it deployed its first contingent of peacekeepers there in 2003.

"I've ordered an increase in U.S. forces in Afghanistan," Bush said in a speech that comes five years after U.S.-led forces toppled Afghanistan's repressive Taliban regime. "We've extended the stay of 3,200 troops now in the country, for four months, and we'll deploy a replacement force that will sustain this increase for the foreseeable future."

The Pentagon announced on Wednesday that 3,200 soldiers scheduled to go to Iraq would be sent to Afghanistan instead, replacing the troops extended for four months. Deployment of the 173rd Airborne Brigade, based in Vicenza, Italy, would keep the force at the current strength of 27,000 — the highest of the war.

About 15,000 of the American troops in Afghanistan are serving in the NATO-led force, which now totals about 36,000. The other 12,000 are special operations forces or are training Afghan troops.

Calling poppy cultivation a threat to a fragile democracy, Bush implored President Hamid Karzai to address the marked increase in harvests last year, after a decline in 2005.

"I have made my concerns to President Karzai pretty clear — not pretty clear, very clear — and that in order for him to gain the confidence of his people, and the confidence of the world, he's got to do something about it, with our help," Bush said in an hour-long speech sponsored by the American Enterprise Institute.

Meanwhile, Defense Secretary Robert Gates, just back from a trip that included a stop in Pakistan, said the planned offensive in Afghanistan was an attempt to react ahead of an expected seasonal Taliban offensive.

"What we want to do this spring is have this spring offensive be our offensive and, and have the initiative in our hands rather than reacting to them," he said.

Asked whether he had talked with Pakistan President Gen. Pervez Musharraf about the hunt for al-Qaida fugitive Osama bin Laden, Gates said he would not "get into specifics" about their talks.

But, said Gates, "If I were Osama bin Laden, I'd keep looking over my shoulder."

The call for NATO nations to supply more soldiers and equipment to fight the Taliban was a nudge to Germany and other NATO nations that have kept their troops out of the most violent parts of Afghanistan.

Politicians in Canada, Britain, the United States and other nations with troops in southern Afghanistan have been irked by the reluctance of some European allies to commit extra troops to the 35,500-strong NATO force, and in particular to allow their troops to be deployed to the Taliban's heartland in the south and east.

"Allies must lift restrictions on the forces they do provide so NATO commanders have the flexibility they need to defeat the enemy wherever the enemy may make a stand," Bush said.

On Capitol Hill, House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos, D-Calif., said NATO commanders should not have to beg for troops from countries like Germany, France, Italy and Spain.

Bush called 2006 the most violent year in Afghanistan since the invasion.

"Across Afghanistan last year, the number of roadside bomb attacks doubled, direct fire attacks on international forces almost tripled and suicide bombings grew nearly fivefold," Bush said.

This week, NATO's top commander renewed an appeal for allies to fill gaps in the international military force in Afghanistan, warning that failure to send reinforcements was weakening the mission and jeopardizing the lives of soldiers fighting the Taliban. In Canada, a Senate committee said Tuesday that the government should a consider withdrawing its 2,500 troops unless NATO allies deliver additional troops.

Critics say the Bush administration has let conditions in Afghanistan worsen while escalating the war in Iraq.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., said he hoped the steps Bush announced for Afghanistan were the first, not last, in a recommitment to Afghanistan. Speaking at the Brookings Institution, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee said he was pleased Bush had recognized that "unless we surge troops, hardware, money and high-level attention into Afghanistan it will fall back into the hands of the Taliban, terrorists and drug traffickers."

Bush has asked Congress for $10.6 billion during the next two years for Afghanistan — $8.6 billion for training and equipping Afghan police and security forces and $2 billion for reconstruction.

Bush said another threat to democracy is the terrorist traffic along the border between Afghanistan and Pakistan, a lawless area the president described as "wilder than the Wild West." The border regions long have been suspected to be the hiding places for al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden.

Bush Pushes NATO For More Troops In Afghanistan (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush warned Thursday that fighting in Afghanistan was likely to flare this spring, and he called for a renewed commitment from NATO allies for additional troop commitments to battle Taliban insurgents.

In a speech delivered to an audience heavy with ambassadors and diplomats, Bush acknowledged that attacks and bombings increased sharply in the last year, making 2006 "the most violent year in Afghanistan since the liberation of the country" in 2001.

But he insisted that even as the United States is increasing its troop presence in Iraq, it also is able to increase its commitment in Afghanistan. Bush said he expected North Atlantic Treaty Organization members to do the same.

"The snow is going to melt in the Hindu Kush mountains. And when it does, we can expect fierce fighting to continue. Taliban and Al Qaeda are preparing to launch new attacks," he said.

The U.S. and NATO forces are prepared, Bush said.

"Our strategy is not to be on the defense but to go on the offense," he said. "This spring, there's going to be a new offensive in Afghanistan, and it's going to be a NATO offensive."

American officials have expressed frustration in recent weeks with some NATO allies, saying they have failed to live up to their commitments in Afghanistan. They have bristled at the restrictions some NATO countries have placed on how and where their troops and equipment can be used.

"When our commanders on the ground say to our respective countries, 'We need additional help,' our NATO countries must provide it in order to be successful in this mission," Bush said. "As well, allies must lift restrictions on the forces they do provide, so NATO commanders have the flexibility they need to defeat the enemy wherever the enemy may make a stand."

In January, the Pentagon increased the number of U.S. troops in Afghanistan by 3,200 by extending the deployment of a brigade of the Army's 10th Mountain Division. Bush mentioned the troop increase as well as the administration's request for congressional approval of an additional $11.8 billion in aid over two years to shore up the government of President Hamid Karzai. Bush outlined plans to improve Afghan police and army units, eradicate illegal opium crops and build new roads.

Frederick D. Barton, who studies postwar reconstruction at the nonpartisan Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the president's speech appeared aimed at preparing the public for a bloody spring in Afghanistan.

"For us, 2007 is the fulcrum year," Barton said. "If we don't turn it around, we are looking at a slow deterioration through inertia."

Thomas Donnelly, a national security analyst at the American Enterprise Institute, the conservative think tank that sponsored Bush's speech, said the address marked the end of a period of neglect for Afghanistan, a conflict that enjoys more support in Congress and abroad than does the war in Iraq.

"That's the most crucial message of all, to convince friend and foe alike that we are in it for the long haul," Donnelly said.

Bush's call for NATO countries to step up their contributions is the latest in a series of efforts to revive the allied effort.

But other than the United States and Britain, which has pledged an additional 800 troops, no other NATO country has agreed to a substantial increase in its Afghan deployment.

With the new forces, the U.S. has about 25,000 troops in Afghanistan, its highest level ever, and Britain will have about 6,000.

Bush Promises Strong Effort To Counter Resurgent Taliban (WP)

By Peter Baker And Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

President Bush vowed yesterday to make a sustained new military and political effort to beat back resurgent Taliban forces as he turned his attention back to Afghanistan and a conflict that has been overshadowed for the past couple of years by the larger war in Iraq.

Bush announced that he will extend a temporary increase of 3,200 U.S. troops in Afghanistan "for the foreseeable future" and urged Congress to give him $11.8 billion more to accelerate training, reconstruction and counter-narcotics programs. He also insisted that NATO allies should drop restrictions on their forces in Afghanistan and join the fight against Islamic extremists.

"America and our allies are going to stand with these folks," the president said in an address to the American Enterprise Institute. "That's the message I want to deliver to the Afghanistan people today. Free debates are important. But our commitment is strong. We will train you, we will help you, and we will stand with you as you defend your new democracy."

The speech was the first Bush has devoted to Afghanistan during his second term, reflecting the shifting priorities in Washington as the Iraq war has turned increasingly violent and consumed more of the president's attention. But though Iraq dominated the debate, remnants of the ousted Taliban government have regrouped and launched a potent new challenge. Attacks on U.S., Afghan and other coalition forces nearly tripled last year, and the Taliban by some estimates controls four times as much territory as in 2005.

"The focus on Iraq has definitely diminished not just the amount of resources that can be applied . . . but it's also a question of the time and attention that top policymakers can spend on the problem," said James Dobbins, a former special envoy to Afghanistan who now works as a national security analyst at the Rand Corp. "Iraq has tended to suck the air out of the system for the last couple of years."

White House aides said Bush has devoted a lot of time to Afghanistan but has come to understand that more needs to be done. The administration started a review of Afghanistan policy last summer and concluded in December that more troops, money and diplomacy were necessary. Elements of the plan have been reported, but yesterday was the first time Bush laid them all out.

A 3,200-member brigade from the Army's 10th Mountain Division that was scheduled to come home in February will instead stay for another four months. And the Pentagon said this week that the 173rd Airborne Brigade, originally slated to head to Iraq, will then replace it, increasing U.S. troops in Afghanistan to 27,000. In his speech, Bush expressed a commitment to make that increase indefinite.

As part of the emergency war spending package he sent to Congress this month, the president asked for $8.6 billion for training Afghan security forces, $1.4 billion for reconstruction and $1.8 billion for drug-fighting and other activities. Bush said yesterday that those funds would help increase the size of the Afghan national police from 61,000 to 82,000 officers and the army from 32,000 to 70,000 troops by the end of 2008. He also promised to rebuild an additional 1,000 miles of roads this year.

The goal, he said, will be to take the fight to the Taliban rather than wait for its expected spring offensive. "The snow is going to melt in the Hindu Kush mountains, and when it does, we can expect fierce fighting to continue," Bush said. "The Taliban and al-Qaeda are preparing to launch new attacks. Our strategy is not to be on the defense but to go on the offense. This spring, there is going to be a new offensive in Afghanistan and it's going to be a NATO offensive."

But major NATO allies have so far resisted the sort of robust engagement that Bush wants. With the exception of some French special forces that are leaving Afghanistan, troops from France, Germany, Italy, Spain and Turkey are not in the fight because of political limits on where and how they may operate. "Allies must lift restrictions on the forces they do provide so NATO commanders have the flexibility they need to defeat the enemy where the enemy may make a stand," Bush said.

The president acknowledged the escalating violence in Afghanistan, but critics said that he underestimated the depth of the problem. "We're talking about much more serious problems than the president discussed today," said Anthony H. Cordesman, an analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. In testimony to the House Foreign Relations Committee earlier in the day, Cordesman said any victory in Afghanistan will take five to 10 more years.

Although Bush vowed to do more to curb poppy production in Afghanistan and help Pakistan disrupt Taliban havens, some critics said those are not enough. "If we are to succeed in Afghanistan, we must create effective deterrence on the narcotics threat, where none now exists, in order to deny our enemies the profits from this deadly trade," said Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (Fla.), the ranking Republican on the House Foreign Relations Committee.

In December, the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy said that opium production in Afghanistan reached a record high in 2006, 26 percent more than in 2005. The United Nations and the World Bank reported in November that the Afghan police whom Bush wants to expand are deeply involved in the drug trade.

William B. Wood, Bush's nominee to be ambassador to Afghanistan, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that police training is "not easy" but would be "one of my highest priorities."

Wood acknowledged that plans for a meeting of Afghan and Pakistani tribal and political leaders have yet to go anywhere. The relationship between the two nations is "complicated," he said. "Each is helping the other. Each often wonders if the other could be doing more."

Bush Presses NATO Allies To Play Bigger Role In Afghanistan (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush prodded NATO allies Thursday for more help in Afghanistan, where U.S. commanders are bracing for a spring offensive by the Taliban.

At least three dozen countries have contributed troops to the 36,000-member NATO force, but some operate under restrictions that effectively prevent combat. The United States has about 27,000 troops in Afghanistan, including 15,000 under NATO command.

Administration officials and outside experts have become increasingly concerned about the Taliban's resurgence and the fragility of the U.S.-backed Afghan government. Five years after American troops ousted the extremist Taliban regime and its al-Qaida allies after the 9-11 terrorist attacks, Afghanistan is struggling against Islamic extremists, corruption, poverty, regional warlords and a burgeoning opium trade.

The rebuilding effort has become a crucial test for NATO, a Cold War alliance that's trying to prove its relevance against new threats.

"For NATO to succeed, allies must be sure that we fill the security gaps," Bush said Thursday in a speech to the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative research center. "Allies must lift restrictions on the forces they do provide."

Analysts say that British, Danish and Canadian troops are sharing the burden with American soldiers in Afghanistan. Estonia, Poland and Romania also have helped. Most of the criticism is directed at France, Germany, Italy, Spain and Turkey.

"The countries come in. They carve out their zones. They focus on those zones. If they don't have combat, that's good. But other people are having combat," Gen. James Jones, the former supreme allied commander in Europe, complained at a NATO gathering in December.

At a congressional hearing Thursday, Anthony Cordesman, a national security specialist at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a center-right research center, said success in Afghanistan required more troops, more money and more patience.

"No one can return from visiting the front in Afghanistan without realizing there is a very real risk that the U.S. and NATO could lose their war with al-Qaida, the Taliban and the other Islamist movements fighting the Afghan government," he told the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

Bush's call for more help from NATO was one of a series of steps intended to shore up the Afghan government before it loses all credibility. The president said that the United States would provide $11.6 billion in economic aid over the next two years and 3,200 more troops for the battle zone.

Administration critics contend that the situation in Afghanistan is far worse than it should be because the Iraq war diverted attention and resources. Bush sought to deflect that criticism even as he acknowledged the challenges in Afghanistan.

"A lot of attention here in the United States is on Iraq," he told his Washington audience. "I want to make sure people's attention is also on Afghanistan."

Pentagon Red Tape Keeps Medical Records From Doctors Of The Wounded (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Department of Veterans Affairs doctors are furious over a recent decision by the Pentagon to block their access to medical information needed to treat severely injured troops arriving at VA hospitals from Iraq and Afghanistan.

The VA physicians handle troops with serious brain injuries and other major health problems. They, rely on digital medical records that track the care given wounded troops from the moment of their arrival at a field hospital through their evacuation to the United States.

About 30 VA doctors in four trauma centers around the country have treated about 200 severely wounded soldiers and Marines. The docs had been receiving the complete digital records from the Pentagon until the end of January, using the Pentagon's Joint Patient Tracking Application.

But on Jan. 25, when Shane McNamee, a physician in the Richmond VA Medical Center, tried to get the full records, he couldn't. He sent an urgent e-mail to VA chief liaison officer Edward Huycke.

"My JPTA account has been disabled within last few days," McNamee wrote. "I called the hotline and was told that all VA accounts have been locked. Could not get a good answer why. Anyhow -- I have 4 [Iraq/Afghanistan] service members to arrive within the next 2 days. This information is terribly important," the doctor wrote.

Thirty-four minutes later Huycke e-mailed back: "Ok, Shane. Will get on it. Not sure what's up."

An hour or so later, a senior VA official forwarded McNamee's e-mail to Lt. Col. David Parramore at the Pentagon, saying that McNamee "needs his access back to JPTA to provide the best possible treatment for soldiers injured in [Iraq/Afghanistan] arriving there in a few days. Can you help?"

Tommy Morris, director of Deployment Health Systems, responded the next morning to Parramore's inquiry, after contacting Ellen Embry, deputy assistant secretary of defense for force health protection. "I spoke with Embry and no agreements, no data sharing via access to JPTA."

The access cutoff came after Morris, in a Jan. 23 e-mail, instructed a colleague: "If the VA currently has access I need a list of persons and I need their accounts shut off ASAP. It is illegal for them to have access without data use agreements and access controls in place by federal regulations and public law."

There have been meetings between VA and Pentagon officials. The Pentagon declined to comment yesterday. VA officials apparently thought it might have been resolved Monday. But an e-mail Monday from Morris to a co-worker said: "The leadership has not authorized the VA accounts to be turned back on, in case someone approaches you about this."

Last week, Sens. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii) and Larry E. Craig (Idaho) -- the chairman and ranking Republican on the Veterans' Affairs Committee -- wrote David S.C. Chu, undersecretary of defense for personnel, of their "deep concern" about VA trauma center doctors not having access to complete records.

"For those servicemembers suffering from a traumatic brain injury," they wrote, "VA's access to in-theater imaging is an important and valuable tool for tracking their patient's progress since being wounded or injured." They suggested the VA doctor be given temporary access to JPTA while the data-sharing questions are worked out.

They're still awaiting an appropriate response. McNamee is still waiting for the records.Rebuilding Afghanistan? 'Neat.'

Bush-bashers often accuse him of not being aware that his riffs on Iraq and Afghanistan can be a bit stale sometimes. On the contrary, President Bush is acutely aware of the problem. He demonstrated that in a speech yesterday before the conservative American Enterprise Institute at the Mayflower Hotel.

Noting a number of administration officials attending, Bush said it was great to see them and that "I fully expect you to stay awake for the entire address." Apparently they did, but at least one member of the audience was spotted dozing peacefully in the back.

Bush even tried to wander off-message a little, to folksify his chat. He hailed prosecutors, judges, police and defense lawyers for going over to Afghanistan to mentor their counterparts. "And I appreciate our own citizens going over there. It is, must be neat, really -- I guess 'neat' isn't a sophisticated word, but it must be heartening to be somebody who's helping this young democracy develop a judicial system that is worthy."

Or maybe gratifying?'Obama bin Laden': Free for All

The U.S. Patent and Trademark Office has rejected a Miami Beach man's application to trademark the name "Obama bin Laden" because the name "may falsely suggest a connection with the individuals Osama bin Laden and Barack Obama," USPTO lawyer Karen Bush said in a Feb. 6 rejection letter, the Miami Herald reported yesterday.

You can't get a trademark for "immoral or scandalous matter," Bush said, adding that the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, "have caused the name Bin Laden itself to be synonymous with the acts themselves. As such, the name Bin Laden is scandalous and is not registerable." His many relatives and the companies they own may want to take note.

The applicant, Alexandre Batlle of http://www.obamabinladen.net, sells coffee mugs, T-shirts, hats and such. One has a cartoon of presidential candidates Obama -- in a white robe and turban and holding a machine gun -- and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), in an abaya.

Batlle might appeal -- after all, he paid $325 to file the application -- and who knows, he might prevail on those counts. But another reason Bush cited might a bit tougher.

"In the present case, the names Obama and Osama clearly refer" to the Democratic senator from Illinois and the terrorist, she said. Since they are both alive -- how does she know about Osama? -- "the applicant must therefore submit written consent from the two individuals authorizing the applicant to register their names."

No problem on Obama, but Waziristan is awfully cold this time of year. Dangerous, too.

Pressing Allies, President Warns Of Afghan Battle (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15 — President Bush warned on Thursday that he expected “fierce fighting” to flare in Afghanistan this spring, and he pressed NATO allies to provide a bigger and more aggressive force to guard against a resurgence by the Taliban and Al Qaeda that could threaten the fragile Afghan state.

With American and NATO commanders pressing for more troops and experts predicting that further gains by the Taliban could put the Afghan government of President Hamid Karzai in danger, Mr. Bush used his presidential platform to lay out what he said was substantial progress in Afghanistan since 2001, but also a continuing threat.

The remarks, to the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative research organization here, amounted to an unusually high-profile acknowledgment from Mr. Bush of the precarious state of the effort to stabilize Afghanistan, a country the administration long held up as a foreign policy success story.

The speech renewed criticism from Democrats that had the United States not been tied down in Iraq, the situation in Afghanistan would not have turned dire. At the same time, some Republican lawmakers said Mr. Bush’s new strategy would not do enough to tamp down the Afghan drug trade. Outside experts criticized the president for painting too rosy a picture.

The speech was also a striking effort by the White House to focus attention back on Afghanistan at a time when Congress is debating resolutions criticizing Mr. Bush’s strategy in Iraq and the administration is making a case that Iranian forces are supplying Shiite militants in Iraq with roadside bombs.

“Across Afghanistan last year, the number of roadside bomb attacks almost doubled, direct fire attacks on international forces almost tripled, and suicide bombings grew nearly fivefold,” Mr. Bush said. “These escalating attacks were part of a Taliban offensive that made 2006 the most violent year in Afghanistan since the liberation of the country.”

Mr. Bush said the question now was whether to “just kind of let this young democracy wither and fade away” or to step up the fight.

“The snow is going to melt in the Hindu Kush mountains, and when it does we can expect fierce fighting to continue,” Mr. Bush said. “The Taliban and Al Qaeda are preparing to launch new attacks. Our strategy is not to be on the defense, but to go on the offense.”

Mr. Bush noted that he has already extended the tour of a 3,200-soldier American brigade and called on Congress to provide $11.8 billion more to pay for operations in Afghanistan over the next two years.

The president said his administration had completed a review of its Afghan strategy, and would work to increase the size of the Afghan army from 32,000 troops to 70,000 by the end of next year, and to bring in additional allied troops to support the fledgling army.

“When there is a need, when the commanders on the ground say to our respective countries, ‘We need additional help,’ our NATO countries must provide it in order to be successful in the mission,” Mr. Bush said.

He promised to build new roads that would help spur economic development, to battle an increase in the opium trade and to try to forge better ties between Afghanistan and its neighbor, Pakistan.

At the same time, Mr. Bush pledged to work with President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan to root out Taliban and Qaeda fighters who hide in that country’s remote mountainous regions — a situation he described as “wilder than the Wild West.” And, echoing his lament that 2006 was a difficult and disappointing year for Iraq, the president said the same had been true in Afghanistan.

Some critics of the administration's handling of Afghanistan said Mr. Bush was still understating the difficulties there.

"We underfinanced, undermanned and under-resourced the war in Afghanistan for the last four years, and now we face a serious threat that the Taliban will succeed in destabilizing the country enough in 2007 to make the Karzai government collapse at some point," said Bruce Riedel, a scholar at the Saban Center for Middle East Studies at the Brookings Institution, a liberal-leaning research organization in Washington. He called the speech "a long overdue recognition that we need to do a lot more."

Both Mr. Riedel and Rick Barton, an expert in Afghanistan reconstruction at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, said Mr. Bush's new strategy did not do enough to promote security and economic development. Mr. Barton, who published a report in 2005 measuring progress in Afghanistan in that year, is about to publish another, and said the situation has turned measurably worse since his first study.

"We've gotten into a situation where things have really turned negative and the average Afghan has lost confidence in both the safety of his country and the ability of the leadership to turn things around," Mr. Barton said. He said the president "is definitely acknowledging that, but his reality therapy is not as thorough or as complete as I think it needs to be."

On Capitol Hill, the senior Republican on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Representative Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, released a statement criticizing the speech. Ms. Ros-Lehtinen and several other Republicans have been pressing the Bush administration to do more to crack down on Afghanistan's opium trade; she said the new strategy lacked "practical initiatives to target major drug kingpins and warlords whose trade in opium finances the Taliban's campaign."

As Iraq has dominated the American psyche, some lawmakers, most recently the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, have called Afghanistan "the forgotten war." The Democratic National Committee, responding to Mr. Bush's speech on Thursday, issued a statement saying, "The Bush administration took its eye off the ball in Afghanistan."

But Mr. Bush pointed to what he called "remarkable progress" since the American invasion in 2001: A democratically elected government with a parliament that includes 91 women; more than five million children in school as opposed to 900,000 under the Taliban; and the return of more than 4.6 million refugees.

The president's speech came after his new defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, attended his first conference of NATO defense ministers last week in Seville, Spain. At the meeting, Mr. Gates pressed his allied counterparts to fulfill their commitments of troops in time for a spring offensive against the Taliban.

Currently, NATO has about 35,000 troops in Afghanistan, about 13,000 of them American. The United States has 9,000 more troops in Afghanistan operating outside the NATO mission, handling tasks like specialized counterterrorism work and helping to train Afghan forces. Gen. David J. Richards of Britain, the outgoing NATO commander in Afghanistan, said last month that NATO was 4,000 to 5,000 troops short.

But NATO commanders have been constrained by so-called caveats — restrictions imposed by member nations on how their troops may be used and where they may be sent. The Bush administration has been pressing the allies to lift those restrictions, and the president renewed that call on Thursday, saying NATO commanders "must have the flexibility they need to defeat the enemy wherever the enemy may make a stand."

Last-Minute Extension In Afghanistan For Unit Whose Bags Were Packed (NYT)

By John Kifner

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

The 3,200 soldiers of the 10th Mountain Division whose one-year deployment in Afghanistan has been extended by four months were so close to the end of their tour that their uniforms, gear and equipment had been packed into shipping containers and an advance party had already reached Fort Drum, their home in upstate New York.

The extension, mentioned in President Bush's speech yesterday, was originally announced on Jan. 25.

About 50 soldiers from the advance party came home in late January, said Benjamin Abel, a Fort Drum spokesman. A group of about 150 were intercepted in Kuwait before they could reach the States, he added.

All have since been sent back to Afghanistan as part of a buildup in anticipation of a renewed Taliban offensive in the spring.

Holding the troops of the division's Third Brigade in place for 120 days is another indication of the strains the drawn-out wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have put on the Army. Ideally, military planners say, they would like a unit's one-year combat deployment to be followed by two years to rest, re-equip and train, but this has proven difficult.

The troops are eventually to be relieved by the 173rd Airborne Brigade, based in Vicenza, Italy. But that unit had been scheduled to go to Iraq, meaning another brigade must be found to go there.

The 10th Mountain troops will be joined by a brigade from the 82nd Airborne Division, which was already on schedule to go to Afghanistan, raising the American contribution to the NATO-led security force by approximately 3,500 soldiers.

The announcement that the Third Brigade's much-anticipated return would be put off until late spring set off a flurry of activity at Fort Drum, including a half-dozen briefings at which officers tried to reassure families.

The Pentagon sent eight officers, called a "Tiger Team," to the remote post in Watertown, which has been isolated in recent days by huge drifts of lake-effect snow.

The post newspaper, The Blizzard, reported that only 3 of the 500 packed shipping containers had actually left Afghanistan and that the soldiers' belongings and gear would be returned to them.

The original announcement came shortly after the new secretary of defense, Robert M. Gates, and the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Peter Pace, visited Afghanistan in mid-January. During that trip American commanders and intelligence officers told them of stepped-up attacks by the Taliban and other militants along the eastern border from remote tribal areas in Pakistan where government forces have little control. They were also told of an urgent need for more combat troops.

Cross-border attacks have tripled since September despite the onset of the harsh Afghan winter, a senior American intelligence officer told Mr. Gates during the visit.

That surge, commanders said, coincided with an agreement Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, reached with tribal elders in the North Waziristan region that he would pull back government soldiers in return for a pledge not to shelter militants or allow them to engage in illegal behavior.

A senior intelligence official said during Mr. Gates visit that in the two months before the agreement there were 40 cross-border attacks in Khost and Paktika Provinces, but that in the two months after the agreement there were 140 attacks.

The intelligence official disclosed a sharp increase in insurgent attacks over the past year. There were 139 suicide attacks in 2006, up from 27 in 2005. Suicide attacks had been unheard of in Afghanistan, suggesting that militant tactics were migrating from Iraq via the Internet and other means.

In addition, the use of roadside bombs more than doubled, to 1,677, last year from 783 in 2005. The number of what the military calls direct attacks, meaning assaults by militants with small arms, grenades and other weapons, increased by almost twofold 4,542 last year, from 1,558 in 2005.

Embassy Row (WT)

Libyan visitor

Libya hopes to remove the last irritants blocking normalization of relations with the United States "very, very soon," according to the North African country's top foreign ministry official for North America.

Ahmed Said Fituri, secretary for American affairs, is the highest-ranking Libyan official to visit Washington since the surprise announcement by longtime Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi in late 2003 that he was giving up his nuclear weapons programs and seeking better ties with the West. Mr. Fituri gave an off-the-record talk at the Nixon Center think tank Tuesday, but spoke to our correspondent David R. Sands after the session.

The Bush administration restored formal diplomatic ties with Tripoli in May, ending Libya's designation as a state sponsor of terrorism. U.S. energy giants have begun winning exploration contracts in Libya for the first time in decades.

But full normalization -- including the naming of a U.S. ambassador to Tripoli and a possible visit by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to the Libyan capital -- has been held up over U.S. concerns about Libya's human rights record.

A number of regime critics have been jailed, and the United States and the European Union have criticized the Gadhafi government's handling of the prosecution of a group of Bulgarian nurses convicted of infecting Libyan children with AIDS.

Mr. Fituri said Libya also wants some irritants removed from the bilateral relations, including the end of all sanctions and difficulties in obtaining visas to travel to the United States.

Mr. Fituri said he planned to spend much of his visit meeting members of Congress.

"I certainly want to listen to their concerns and discuss how we can close the gap. It is our hope and expectation that we can answer their questions and resolve all outstanding issues very, very soon," he said. "There are some small things [that] should not be hindering our larger relationship."

In addition to stronger economic and political ties, Mr. Fituri said he was particularly eager to boost bilateral cultural and educational programs as well. A graduate of the University of Michigan, he planned a trip to Michigan after his Washington visit.

"We would very much like to have more Libyan students studying at American universities and more American scholars coming to Tripoli," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0132963

The Libyan minister was making his first trip to the United States in more than two decades, but said he found much that was familiar.

"America is America," he said. "You have your tastes, your energy, your immense culture. Such things do not change."

More troops

The U.S. ambassador to Afghanistan sounded the call in Kabul for more NATO troops, as President Bush in Washington warned of the dangers of a spring offensive by Taliban forces trying to regain control in the Central Asian nation.

"I would like to see NATO countries collectively put in place the forces that NATO and its military committee have said are necessary," Ambassador Ronald Neumann told Agence France-Presse in an interview published yesterday.

Mr. Neumann noted that some NATO "partners do a great deal," citing the troops deployments from Britain, Canada, Denmark, the Netherlands and Romania. He did not criticize the other members of the 37-nation alliance, but some nations such as Germany restrict their troops from engaging in key areas in the south and east where Taliban fighters are concentrated.

The ambassador said that the 35,500 troops in Afghanistan are preparing for some "very hard fighting this year" from Taliban forces overthrown in 2001 by a U.S.-led coalition.

"I hope our allies will do what they need to, but we are not going to lose it for lack of their action," Mr. Neumann said.

In Washington, Mr. Bush told the American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research that NATO "must provide" more troops and "lift restrictions" on those whose deployment is limited within the country.

US Ambassador To Afghanistan Optimistic Despite NATO Failings (AFP)

By Bronwen Roberts

AFP, February 16, 2007

The failure of NATO allies to meet a shortfall in troops needed to end the Taliban insurgency will not sink the effort, which should "do better this year," the US ambassador here told AFP this week.

The reluctance of some of the 37 nations in the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) was "influenced by a lot of, frankly, misperceptions and ignorance," ambassador Ronald Neumann said.

"Some NATO partners do a great deal -- the British, the Canadians, the Dutch, the Danes, the Romanians," he said.

But he added: "I would like to see NATO countries collectively put in place the forces that NATO and its military committee has said are necessary.

"But can we maintain it if they don't? Yes.... I hope our allies will do what they need to. But we are not going to lose it for lack of their action," he said.

"How that reverberates longer term in NATO is probably a seminar topic rather than an interview," he quipped.

NATO military commander US General Bantz Craddock said in Belgium this week that the military needs are "probably filled to 93 or 94 percent."

Neumann, perhaps the most influential diplomat in Kabul, said he had seen at a meeting in Berlin last month of Afghanistan's donors that there was poor understanding among many nations of the situation in the central Asian nation.

"Quite apart from differences of opinion, I just found the factual information poor. There are lot of people who genuinely believe that we are only interested in the military side and we are not focused enough on building," he said.

The United States led the invasion that toppled the Taliban in late 2001 and today has about 23,000 troops here working on rounding up Islamist militants and helping reconstruction.

The insurgency reached its bloodiest level last year. The death toll passed 4,000, with most of the dead being rebel fighters. There was a barrage of suicide bombings, and insurgents launched sophisticated attacks on military bases.

Neumann, whose term in Afghanistan ends in the coming months, said he expected "very hard fighting this year."

The ambassador rejected outright any notion of negotiating with the Taliban, which was excluded from talks in 2001 in Bonn, Germany, that put Afghanistan on the path to democracy.

"Negotiation implies changing the political structure, changing the process agreed to in Bonn. No way in hell. That would be a fundamentally disastrous course of action," Neumann said.

He was equally critical of "rumours and talks" that provinces where the Taliban are most entrenched should be given up to the movement, describing this as a "thoroughly bad idea" that "scares the hell out of people."

The ambassador, who took up his post in mid-2005, said he was leaving "genuinely more optimistic... than I have been at any time since I have been here."

The boosting of the security forces with an increase in US troops and the recruitment of the first members of a planned 11,200-strong auxiliary police force meant there would be the strength to deal with the insurgency "very aggressively."

Extra emphasis on building the Afghan security forces should begin to show results in 2008 and there had been improvements in government appointments, with several governors and police chiefs removed.

But Neumann said one of his biggest concerns for the future of the young nation was its booming trade in illegal opium, of which Afghanistan is the world's top supplier.

"The money of narcotics can rot the infrastructure of the state faster than we can build it," he said. The United States is one of the main backers of Afghanistan's counternarcotics efforts.

But he expressed confidence in President Hamid Karzai, who has come under growing criticism as the insurgency has deepened.

"He doesn't control all his own funds and he doesn't control all his own forces and I don't know many Western political leaders that are bold and daring when they are so dependent on others. I see steady growth," the ambassador said.

Neumann said the international effort in Afghanistan was a long-term one in which the military forces needed to provide the "shield" of security to allow for development.

For example, "It is very important we have better governance but it is really hard to get if they are killing civil servants."

He added: "I think we are going to do that better this year than last year."

Al-Qaida Releases Video Of Afghan Attack (AP)

AP, February 16, 2007

Al-Qaida posted a video on the Internet Friday showing what they claimed to be an insurgent attack on a military position of U.S. and Afghan forces in southern Afghanistan.

The video appears to be an attempt by the terrorist network to disparage U.S. claims that it is winning the war against the Taliban and allied militia in Afghanistan.

It begins with the deputy leader of al-Qaida, Ayman al-Zawahri, ridiculing President Bush and saying that his claim to have deprived al-Qaida of a safe haven in Afghanistan is a "bare-faced lie," according to a transcript provided by IntelCenter, a U.S. group that tracks extremist messages.

With a narrator speaking in American-accented English, the tape then shows video film of what it claims is an attack on a military position in Arghandab, a district 100 miles northeast of the southern Afghan city of Kandahar.

The authenticity of the scenes shown could not be immediately verified. The video carried the logo of the al-Qaida media production company, as-Sahab, and it was posted on an Islamic Web site known for hosting extremist material.

Al-Qaida appeared to have issued the tape on Thursday with the title "Holocaust of the Americans in the land of Khorasan, the Islamic emirate: Capture of an American post, Arghandab." The name Khorasan refers to Afghanistan.

The video shows the insurgents firing at the alleged post, but their weapons cannot be seen because it is night. Tracer bullets cross the sky and there are explosions caused by what are said to be rocket-propelled grenades.

"After a fierce battle, the mujahideen (holy warriors) begin their retreat from the zone of operations," the narrator says in English. The tape quotes a fighter as saying: "We retreated after about 45 minutes of fighting."

It is not clear if the fighters overran the military position. Such an attack on a position held by U.S. and Afghan forces in Arghandab could not be immediately confirmed.

However, the video shows film shot in daylight of a single story compound of mud-plastered walls, where the Americans appear to have had a presence. "CPT ASHWOKTH UTAH. NG ETT," is scrawled on a wall, but there is little to suggest that foreign forces occupied the primitively-built building for long.

The English-speaking narrator says the camera is going around "the liberated area to bring us pictures from inside the cleansed military bases."

The video shows a battle-wrecked Nissan pickup truck, which people start stoning. There are no insignia on the white truck.

An unidentified elderly Afghan, with a white beard and black turban, tells the camera what the foreigners were like: "The people suffered a lot because of these devils. No one could leave his house, not even for absolutions and prayers. We couldn't even light a lamp at night. Thanks to Allah, the infidels have left.

"The people are very happy about the coming of the Taliban," he says.

Pentagon Seeks $100M To Speed Equipment And Arms To Troops (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — Fierce fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan has forced the Pentagon to speed new weapons and equipment to troops at faster rates than ever, according to military records and officials.

DOJ_NMG_0132965

The Pentagon budget proposed by President Bush adds even more money for what military leaders call "urgent need" requests. For the first time, the budget includes $100 million for a Pentagon "rapid acquisition fund" aimed at getting vital supplies to troops in the field more quickly.

Although the rapid-acquisition fund will be controlled by the Defense secretary, each branch of the military has its own pools of money to fill urgent needs. The Marine Corps, which faces some of the heaviest fighting in Iraq in Anbar province, has made 75% more urgent-need requests per month in the past six months than it did in the first 3½ years of the war.

"There is a sense of urgency here," says Len Blaisol, director of the Marine Air-Ground Task Force Integration Division in Quantico, Va. "Over time, the enemy has adapted to our successful operations."

The urgent-need requests aren't necessarily for new technology. Most of the weapons or equipment already exist but weren't bought or deployed to troops in the field. When combat commanders notice a problem in the field, such as the increased use of homemade bombs, they send the urgent requests through their chain of command or to a special Pentagon office, which then decides whether to buy the material or not.

Many of the requests reflect the increased intensity of the Iraq insurgency. Others stem from threats that were not anticipated before the March 2003 invasion of Iraq, such as homemade bombs called improvised explosive devices (IEDs). They include:

·New vehicles to withstand IEDs and insurgent ambushes. The Marines have awarded contracts for prototypes of "Mine Resistant Ambush Protected Vehicles" that feature V-shaped hulls to disperse the force of blasts from under the vehicles. The Marines are leading tests for the vehicles, which could be used by all services. After choosing the model it wants, the Pentagon hopes to have 4,100 in combat by year's end.

·Advances in first aid. IED attacks have prompted urgent-need requests that have resulted in improved bandages, artificial blood-clotting agents and a new blanket to keep injured troops from going into shock, Blaisol says.

·Improved rifle scopes. New scopes allow Marines to kill enemies from farther away and in lower light than before, says Scott Allen, a Marine Corps acquisition official in Quantico. "Insurgents think we've got a whole lot of snipers out there," Allen said. "Marines can see much better, hit them from a greater distance."

In recent weeks, the Navy has also made urgent orders for more radios, the Army for flame-resistant uniforms and the Air Force for more global positioning systems for its aircraft, Pentagon purchasing records show.

Although Congress first gave the Pentagon rapid-acquisition authority in 2004, the Pentagon didn't use it enough, according to a May 2005 House Armed Services Committee report. That report also said former Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld "failed to provide sufficient resources and authority" to the Pentagon's rapid-acquisition programs.

Now, however, the Pentagon is acting more quickly, said Loren Thompson, a defense analyst at the Lexington Institute in Arlington, Va.

"People think that industry has moved too slowly," Thompson says. "This shows that may not necessarily be the case."

Pelosi Backs War Funds Only With Conditions (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) yesterday linked her support for President Bush's war-funding request to strict standards of resting, training and equipping combat forces, a move that could curtail troop deployments and alter the course of U.S. involvement in Iraq.

The pledge came as Congress appears ready to assert its authority in matters of war and diplomacy, down to decisions that the White House believes to be the domain solely of the president as commander in chief: the deployment and training of military forces.

The House is to vote today on a nonbinding resolution disapproving of Bush's decision to deploy more than 21,000 additional troops to Iraq. Also, Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) announced a rare Saturday vote to begin debate on the House resolution.

Congressional Democrats signaled a willingness to directly challenge and curtail Bush's warmaking powers, a move that will almost certainly spark a legal or constitutional confrontation. Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a Pelosi ally, is rewriting the president's spending request to limit Bush's options in prosecuting the war, and Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, said he will seek to repeal the 2002 congressional authorization for Bush to wage war in Iraq and substitute legislation that would narrow the mission of troops there and begin to bring some home.

"If we are going to support our troops, we should respect what is considered reasonable for them: their training, their equipment and their time at home," Pelosi said in an interview with a small group of reporters. "What we're trying to say to the president is, you can't send people in who are not trained for urban warfare . . . who are not prepared to contend with an insurgency."

The Democrats' move is likely to test the party's unity in the coming weeks, as anxious moderates clash with liberals pushing for an even more dramatic confrontation.

Pelosi was careful to say no final decisions have been made on binding legislation. But she backed key provisions already floated by Murtha, including requirements that troops be given at least a year's rest between combat deployments, special training in urban warfare and counterinsurgency, and safety equipment that the military has struggled to provide.

The speaker backed Murtha's plan to eliminate funding for the Abu Ghraib prison near Baghdad, where a prisoner-abuse scandal badly tarnished the U.S. image in the region and the world. She also strongly endorsed binding legislation requiring Bush to seek congressional authorization before any military strike on Iran.

"Congress should assert itself . . . and make it very clear that there is no previous authority for the president, any president, any president to go into Iran," she said.

Biden, a declared candidate for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, said his legislative proposal would authorize the limited use of force in Iraq only as part of a withdrawal plan.

"Congress should make clear what the mission of our troops is: to responsibly draw down, while continuing to combat terrorists, train Iraqis and respond to emergencies," he said. "We should make equally clear what their mission is not: to stay in Iraq indefinitely and get mired in a savage civil war."

Calling Bush's proposed troop increase "a tragic mistake," Biden said: "Opposing the surge is only the first step. We need a radical change in course in Iraq. If the president won't act, Congress will have to attempt to do so. But Congress must act responsibly. We must resist the temptation to push for changes that sound good but may very well produce bad results."

The issue of Iraq roiled both sides of the Capitol yesterday. The House concluded three days of debate and prepared to vote this afternoon on a nonbinding resolution opposing the deployment of additional troops to Iraq, while affirming Congress's support for "the members of the United States Armed Forces who are serving or who have served bravely and honorably in Iraq."

Senate Republican leaders said they would urge their members to oppose the Saturday vote, to protest Reid's refusal to allow a vote on a pro-administration resolution asserting that war funding would continue. Democratic leaders want to call the bluff of a group of Republican senators who oppose the deployment of additional troops but who voted with their party to block the earlier Democratic-led resolution from coming to the floor.

Both leaderships have refused to budge, not wanting to relent on what they agree is likely to become the year's running narrative. "I don't want this vote to occur. I think the timing is wrong, I think the process is wrong, and I think the substance is wrong," said Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.).

When the House floated its text, Senate Democratic leaders quickly latched on to it, believing Republicans would find it harder to block because of its relatively brief, straightforward language and strong support of U.S. troops.

"On the one hand they have their president, and on the other hand they have their constituencies," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.). "They're diametrically opposed to one another. And now they can't duck it anymore."

But as those debates continued, senior Democrats were clearly looking to their next step in confronting Bush on the Iraq war.

Murtha, the powerful chairman of the House Appropriations defense subcommittee, outlined his plan for restricting the administration's use of war funds in an Internet interview released yesterday. Under that legislation, troops would be required to have one year's rest between deployments, combat tours could no longer be extended, and the Pentagon would have to halt its "stop-loss" program, which prohibits some officers from leaving the military when their tour of duty is complete.

The idea is to neutralize political charges that the Democrats plan to starve the war of funding. The party would still slow the war effort by other means, Murtha said in an interview aired on the new Web site MoveCongress.org.

"What we are saying will be very hard to find fault with," he said. "We're supporting the troops. We're protecting the troops. On the other hand, we're going to stop this surge."

Democrats were taking their case to the left flank of their party, imploring antiwar activists to allow them to slowly shift war policy through troop training requirements rather than by suddenly withholding war funds, as many activists have demanded.

In a video delivered to 1,200 "movie parties" that the liberal group MoveOn.org held last night, Murtha promised: "This country needs a dramatic change of course in Iraq, and it is the responsibility of this Congress to consummate that change."

Republicans are relishing the battle. House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) labeled the emerging Democratic proposal "a plan to cut off funding for troops in harm's way by making sure the reinforcements they need to complete their mission in Iraq never arrive."

House Democrats Aim To Limit Troops (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0132967

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

House Democratic leaders yesterday revealed their plan to restrict President Bush's use of war funding, though some Democrats said the proposal, released on the eve of a symbolic vote against the war in Iraq, does not do enough to stop the war.

"This legislation will force the administration to consider alternatives rather than escalating," said Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, describing limitations he intends to place on an appropriations bill next month.

Mr. Murtha's bill would bar the U.S. military from extending combat assignments beyond one year or giving troops a combat assignment less than a year since the last one. It also would end the military's "stop-loss" program that involuntarily extends troops' enlistment periods, would close permanent U.S. military bases in Iraq, and would require that the Pentagon certify that troops being sent to Iraq are "fully combat ready" with training and equipment.

"They won't be able to continue. They won't be able to do the deployment. They won't have the equipment, they don't have the training, and they won't be able to do the work. There's no question in my mind," Mr. Murtha said.

Meanwhile, the House concluded its third day of debate over a nonbinding resolution that would oppose the president's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq. A vote is expected today.

At the other end of the Capitol, the Senate will work into the weekend tomorrow, after Majority Leader Harry Reid scheduled a vote to begin debate on a resolution identical to the House measure. Republicans oppose Mr. Reid's attempt because the Nevada Democrat refuses to allow them any amendments to the resolution.

Mr. Murtha, chairman of the House Appropriations defense subcommittee, plans to attach his plan to hamstring the U.S. military to the president's defense-spending request when it comes before his panel next month. Mr. Murtha's plan is supported by House Democratic leaders, and is the less politically risky alternative to cutting off war funds altogether.

But some Democrats are not satisfied with this approach. Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich, Ohio Democrat, said his party's leadership is supporting a "continuation" of the war in Iraq.

"The American people want us to get out of Iraq," Mr. Kucinich said. "They expect Democrats to move quickly to end our involvement in Iraq. If Congress approves the supplemental appropriation, President Bush will have the money he needs to keep the war going through the end of his term."

Mr. Kucinich is part of the Out of Iraq Caucus, founded by Rep. Maxine Waters, California Democrat. There are more than 70 members of Congress in this caucus. About 20 anti-war activists from Maryland yesterday "occupied" the office of Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski, Maryland Democrat, for nearly two hours because she has voted to fund the war, even though she voted against authorizing the war in 2002.

But Mr. Bush warned against Mr. Murtha's plan, saying Congress needs to approve both "resources" and "flexibility" for the U.S. military "to do their job."

"Our men and women in uniform are counting on their elected leaders to provide them with the support they need to accomplish their mission," Mr. Bush said.

House Minority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, labeled Mr. Murtha's plan "a plan to cut off funding for troops in harm's way" and "unthinkable."

Mr. Boehner's staff sent out an e-mail saying the Murtha plan would "pull the rug out" from U.S. troops by "cutting off their reinforcements and forcing them to face the enemy without our full support."

Mr. Murtha repeatedly emphasized yesterday that his strategy "supports the troops" by requiring adequate training and equipment and protecting them from exhaustion.

"What we're saying, it would be very hard to find fault with. The troops have to be equipped, they have to be trained, they can't be sent back without a year at home," Mr. Murtha said. "People have to understand we're supporting the troops, we're protecting the troops, but on the other hand, we're going to stop this surge."

He also is considering language that would require the president to seek congressional approval before the U.S. could invade Iran. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, yesterday also said the president does not have authority to invade Iran without explicit congressional approval.

In the Senate, Republicans protested Mr. Reid's attempt to deny their amendments to the nonbinding resolution, one of which would vow not to cut off funding for the military. In a similar situation earlier this month, Senate Republicans blocked a vote on any resolution.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, said Democrats were going to "block a vote in the Senate to fund our troops in Iraq."

But Democrats said Republicans were trying to avoid a simple vote on approving the president's plan.

"They just want to avoid a vote, up or down, on the surge. ... But we're voting on it first, and we're voting on it clean," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat.

Iraq Debate Shows Separate Problems For GOP, Democrats (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — This week's showdown votes in Congress over Iraq may dramatize the breadth of discontent with the White House war strategy, but they also demonstrate the limits of how far Democrats are willing to go to change it.

The House of Representatives today is likely to easily approve a non-binding resolution opposing President Bush's plan to commit 21,500 additional troops to Iraq. The Senate will hold a rare Saturday session for a procedural vote that could begin the debate on the House's Iraq resolution.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., described the House vote as "a huge statement."

She acknowledged that it's unlikely to stop the movement of troops, and neither Pelosi nor Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., were willing Thursday to endorse measures that would make it harder for the president to send more troops to Iraq.

Both were cool to Rep. John Murtha's proposal to require soldiers to receive more time at home between deployments and more training before being shipped out. The Marine combat veteran's plan — outlined in a Thursday fundraising webcast for the liberal group MoveOn.org — would choke off the president's supply of soldiers.

"The answer is no," Reid said when asked whether there are any legally binding measures he's prepared to support.

Pelosi was non-committal. "What he's doing is putting out ideas," she said of Murtha. "Until you see his proposals in writing nobody can tell what the level of support is."

Iraq presents Republicans and Democrats with different political problems. For Republicans, the question is how far to go in backing a policy that is losing public support. The prospect of a Friday House vote on the president's policy set off another round of skirmishing in the Senate, which delayed its week-long President's Day recess after some Republicans pressed for an end to the procedural logjam that has prevented an Iraq debate there.

"The Senate is in real danger of becoming irrelevant," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa.

Reid scheduled an unusual Saturday vote on whether to open the Iraq debate after a similar measure failed last week. Sen. John Warner, R-Va., who sided with his party's leadership in blocking the debate last week, has signaled he may vote with Democrats this time, but Reid needs at least nine others to cross party lines just to debate a non-binding resolution.

If Saturday's vote poses a test for Republicans with misgivings about Bush's Iraq policy — particularly those who will face the voters next year — Democrats face at least as daunting a political gut check in the longer term.

This week's House debate revealed both the Republican political strategy on Iraq and the Democrats' sensitivity to it. Twice in one day, an angry House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer came to the floor to rebut GOP charges that Democrats plan to cut off funding for troops in the field. "We will not abandon them," he said.

In speeches on the House floor and in a memo circulated by the Senate Republican Conference, GOP lawmakers accused the Democrats of a "slow-bleed" strategy that would cut off funding for the war. Pelosi argued that some of the measures Democrats have been discussing would protect the troops, not deprive them.

The Democrats' uncertainty about whether this argument will win public support was evident, however, in their tentativeness about embracing the plan. Senate Armed Services Committee Carl Levin, D-Mich., said he's not ready to support tying the president's hands. "I have at least a little hope we can turn the president in a different direction," he said.

Many Democrats say political pressure will have more effect than legislation in changing the policy in Iraq. "We are going to keep at this," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. "We are going to keep ratcheting up the pressure so that public opinion and congressional opinion is so strong that the president will have no choice but to change strategy."

Congress's Next Iraq Moves Could Open Party Rifts (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON

The House debate on a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq opened rifts in Republican ranks, as lawmakers were forced to take a tough vote on the war.

But the next move – to curb war funding – could do the same for Democrats, if not handled with a high level of political skill.

Such a rift is what Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania hopes to avoid, as he announced Thursday details of a strategy to use his Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense to oppose a troop buildup in Iraq, without cutting funds to troops in harm's way.

"What we're saying will be very hard to find fault with," said Mr. Murtha in a webcast on the antiwar site MoveCongress.org. "We're supporting the troops. We're protecting the troops. But on the other hand, we're going to stop this escalation, because this escalation is not going to work."

The interview confirmed a line of action that Murtha and House Democrats have signaled for weeks. Instead of cutting off the funds, Murtha is proposing conditions on the use of funds that would limit the president's military options.

In mid-March, the House Appropriations Committee plans to take up Mr. Bush's $99.6 billion supplemental war request for this fiscal year. Murtha's panel plans to complete its hearings and report to the full committee by March 14, he says. The bill would be on the floor a few days later, he adds.

Any vote that appears to undermine US forces in the field is potentially toxic for members on either side of the aisle. That's why Republicans tried – and failed – to force a recorded vote on war funding in the House this week.

On the Senate side, GOP leaders had calculated that Democrats would cave if forced to vote on war funding – a vote that would have diminished the impact of a resolution opposing the "surge." The impasse derailed a vote on either measure in the Senate.

"That's the bind the House and Senate find themselves in," says Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University in New Brunswick, N.J.

"[Lawmakers] can easily support resolutions critical of the troop surge, but when they take the next step, which is to do something about the funding of the war, they venture into political quicksand, unless what they are doing is phrased in such political delicacy that it can't be interpreted as a vote against the troops," he adds.

Antiwar activists have held back as the House moved toward a nonbinding vote this week. But they are watching closely how forcefully Democrats who now control Congress follow up a resolution victory in the House.

"To debate for a week and end up with a nonbinding vote on just the escalation has people nervous," says Tom Andrews, national director of Win Without War and a former Democratic representative from Maine. People are anxious to see that this leads to real action, as soon as possible, he says.

Murtha, for one, is proposing several conditions on the use of war funding. These include requiring the military to certify that troops are "fully combat ready," with the training and equipment that they need. He is also proposing an end to the "stop loss" program, which has forced soldiers to extend their enlistment period, and to ensure that a serviceman or servicewoman can't be sent back into battle until he or she has had a year at home.

These are "technical things," Murtha says, but they are "very harmful to the people who are serving." If Congress insists on enforcing these conditions, it means that the "the surge can't be sustained," he adds. In the longer term, it will force the president to deploy troops outside Iraq, he says.

Murtha Vows To Block Bush Surge Plan (POL)

By John Bresnahan

The Politico, February 16, 2007

Rep. Jack Murtha, one of the most vocal congressional opponents of the war in Iraq, is vowing to block President Bush's plan to send another 21,500 U.S. combat troops to Iraq by restricting the administration's military options in a new wartime spending bill.

"We're gonna stop this surge," the Pennsylvania Democrat declared in an interview posted on the Website MoveCongress.org.

Stepping up his campaign against the White House, Murtha, chairman of the House defense appropriations subcommittee, told Tom Andrews, a former congressman-turned-activist, in the online interview that he would attach so many conditions to an upcoming spending bill for Iraq that the Pentagon would not be able to find enough troops to carry out the president's "surge" plan.

The Andrews group, the Win Without War Coalition, is part of a larger federation of anti-war groups sponsoring the site.

Murtha will oversee the $93 billion supplemental spending bill for Iraq and Afghanistan that the House will consider in mid-March. And he wants to impose new restrictions on how the president can deploy combat forces from the United States to Iraq, allow combat veterans to have at least one year stateside before returning to the frontlines and prevent the Pentagon from keeping soldiers and Marines already in Iraq in uniform after their enlistments expire.

"This vote will limit the options of the president and should stop the surge," Murtha predicted of next month's floor fight over the wartime supplemental appropriation. "We're trying to force redeployment [of troops outside Iraq], not by taking money away but by redirecting it."

Murtha is not pushing a total cutoff of funds for the war in Iraq. But he is considering measure to limit the military actions Bush can take against Iran, although the congressman was more cautious than his statements about Iraq.

“We are looking at the possibility of putting language in the bill that says you can’t go into Iran unless you have authorization [from Congress],” Murtha said.

Murtha also intends to push a provision to bar the creation of permanent U.S. military bases in Iraq and to raze the notorious Abu Ghraib prison.

The strategy being employed by Murtha and other House Democratic leaders would force Bush and Republican congressional leaders to accept the new troop restrictions, or face the possibility the supplemental spending bill would falter, thus cutting off all funding for the war.

Democrats are betting that Bush and the Republicans won’t take that risk and will go along with the Democratic proposals. And Republican leaders are not taking Murtha’s threats lightly.

The Republican National Committee has e-mailed supporters, urging them to contact newspapers and other media outlets to object to the congressman’s proposals.

The RNC was reacting to a story in The Politico on Wednesday that spelled out the Democratic strategy of cutting off the supply of troops available for the war, while retaining funding for forces already deployed in Iraq.

Without the troops to execute the surge, the Pentagon would find it increasingly difficult to keep U.S. forces in Iraq.

Republicans have repeatedly charged that Democrats want to “cut off funding for the troops,” and the Democratic strategy seeks to deflect those charges.

The Democratic plan was characterized in The Politico as the “slow-bleed strategy,” which was not a term used by any Democrats or the anti-war groups supporting their efforts.

The RNC, however, attributed the phrase to Democrats, and it was used in their e-mail alert.

“‘Slow bleed' is exactly the right name for this incredibly irresponsible and dangerous strategy,” RNC Chairman Mike Duncan wrote in his e-mail, which included a Web link to donate to the GOP.

“Cutting and running is bad enough,’’ he said. “But the Murtha-Pelosi 'slow-bleed' plan is far worse. It is a cynical and dangerous erosion of our ability to fight the terrorists while we still have men and women on the ground in Iraq.”

The National Republican Congressional Committee and Senate Republicans are also preparing to use the “slow-bleed” line in their own news releases, slamming Murtha and the Democrats.

The IRAQI'S weren't even involved with the 9/11 attacks, and you are making sound like they would DO IT AGAIN!! Heck, they can't even do anything but blow up each other. Whenever we leave Iraq, and we will someday, the same thing is going to happen.....full blown chaos and an even bigger civil war. Will outside terrorists like the Saudis, Jordanians, Egyptians, Syrians and Iranians get involved??? OF COURSE THEY WILL!! THAT IS THE PRICE OF INVADING A SOVERIEGN COUNTRY AND BREAKING IT!! So the question is.....how many more American kids have to die before we get out and let the inevitable problems guaranteed by the irresponsible actions of George W. Bush and Dick Cheney? And why in the heck would we want to put MORE of our kids in there, KNOWING that they are just going to become casualty statistics?

The only person who would know that is Bush, and he isn't even telling himself!! The hard drinking is finally catching up to him!!

by smarterthanthou on 02.15.2007 at 11:54 PM

And another thing, your bar analogy is not accurate because that is a one-on-one situation. It doesn't take 1000 iraqis to fight 1000 americans. It just takes one iraqi to cause many many deaths, because iraq's security is worthless compared to America's (if you believe america isn't safe then you need to go live in a bombshelter forever). So while that ONE iraqi is planting a bomb, the other 999 could still be planning to attack america (but they're not). The iraq war is Osama's dream come true because Osama can devise some elaborate plot on american soil, while pitiful iraqis kill americans in iraq. If we were not in iraq, NO AMERICANS WOULD BE DYING. WE ARE SAFE IN AMERICA. NO IRAQ WAR= NO AMERICANS DYING. IRAQ WAR= Americans dying WHILE Osama works on attacking america. Everyone who supports the iraq war is PARANOID. 3000 americans died out of over 300 million. That is ONE OUT OF EVERY 100,000. That is no reason to get all paranoid and scream about how the world is going to end. BUSH's response to 9/11 did more damage than 9/11 itself. that is the beauty of terrorism. All they have to do is kill 3000 americans and WE will do the rest. We are destroying ourselves (reckless economic policy, reckless foreign policy). If you can't see that our response to 9/11 was worse than 9/11 itself then you need to go study terrorism and WHY it is effective. Terrorism experts ALL KNOW that the goal of terrorism is to get America to act AGAINST our own self-interests.

Gene, again, you make no sense. For a redneck you might seem smart, but compared to a normal american you are an idiot. It doesn't matter if we are over in iraq. If they want to attack AMERICA then they will do it. Being in iraq won't stop them. Besides, the people in iraq DID NOT HATE AMERICA until we invaded. We are not fighting the same people who were responsible for 9/11. We are fighting normal iraqis who see even less of a future now than when saddam was in power (both shiite and sunni). Invading iraq turned regualr iraqis into jihadists. If we did not invade iraq, they would be going to work, going to school and making sure they don't offend Saddam. One of the big reasons why they are willing to fight is because Bush found a way to make life even worse WITHOUT saddam than it was WITH saddam. They have less electricity, less jobs, their gas prices have more than quadrupled, and they have less security. When saddam was in power, all they had to do was not offend saddam. Many iraqis got used to that. They didn't like it, but atleast there were RULES for how to stay safe. Now there are no rules. There is no way to guarantee safety.

Troops this, troops that. You guys can bicker troopisms all day long and still miss the underlying facts. Bush, to this day, has no regard for our troops, unless they are used to accomplish HIS goals, not the majority of Americans. He could care less who dies or who lives or if they have benefits when they get home. The whole mess revolves around the need to get his buddies hands on the Iraqi Oil infastruture, anything else is a side-line, a distraction, a bunch of situations that he never understood or cares to remedy. Their is no way to steal the oil from under their feet and yet he will go to unlimited ends despite the recommendations of his generals or any other group that has a say in the matter to meet the Greed ideology of the Oil industry. Eighteen Saudi's with box cutter's culminating into this quagmire--ridiculous. It's all about the OIL and the way it's dispered--there or by foreign interests--either way, our troops have nothing to do with the underlying issue. American Prowess will always exist, Imperialism will always exist in the mind of a dictator, don't confuse the two.

by piwacket on 02.15.2007 at 11:22 PM

If the Dems want to get out of Iraq all they need to do is vote to cut off the spending. The problem with this is their votes will be recorded and when Iraq falls before the 08 elections everyone will know exactly who to blame and the voters will be smart enough to remember who these people are.

In earlier dialogue someone asked "How would 1000 terrorists get into the US to blow ups buildings and citizens"? The answer is simple: they would come in the same way 12 to 20 million Mexican illegals have come in. Actually sir, it only took a handful to bring down the WTC and Pentagon not 1000.

Finally, if Jack Murtha had pulled any of his past tricks on FDR while he was fighting WWII, he would have been arrested and put in prison for aiding the enemy. Check WWII history. FDR and Harry Truman were REAL Americans first and Democrats 2nd.

Smarterthanthou I meant when were over there they don't have much time to think about what they can do to us over here.

A simple analogy. When I'm kicking a guys ass in a bar fight, he doesn't have much time to think about taking my girl away from me by Carlyle on 02.15.2007 at 11:11 PM

Everyone should remain calm. The "dribble" that Bush has started in Iraq is step one In the Karl Rove exit plan. First we get Malaki commited to action he cannot do. We then have a scapegoat for failure. We really tried but the Iraqis could not do their share.We can now "cut and run" With only the Iraqis, the media and the Dems to blame. At the not unreasonable cost of a few hundred GI deaths and a few thousand wounded we are out of there. As you know, we do not count Iraqi deaths, there are too many of them anyway.

by gene on 02.15.2007 at 11:09 PM

Smarterthanthou Another thing. You mention it would take a 1000 jihadists to do my scenario. If I understand it correctly there are approximately 11,000,000 illegal aliens in the USA now. You suppose there could be a few jihadists among them.

by gene on 02.15.2007 at 11:03 PM

Smarterthanthou. Another scenerio. Let's get about 19 guys into the USA commander some aircraft and fly them into the World Trade Center, Pentagon, White House and murder about 3000 innocent Americans. Nothing is simple you stupid * but given time and money which the terroists seem to have plenty of they could quite possibly do it. Get your head out of your ass and at least try thinking out of the box for a change.

GENE, you make it sound so simple. You say that if we pull out then the iraqis will blow up hundreds of buildings in America and it will ruin us. HOW WILL THEY DO THAT? If the iraqis could just blow up american buildings, THEY WOULD BE DOING IT ALREADY. Your argument makes NO SENSE. the iraqis cannot blow up our buildings, so they won't. That is pretty simple to understand. They are in iraq. Not in america. and you must understand that in order to blow up hundreds of american buildings, they would need atleast 1000 jihadists IN america who would act simultaneously. Not even Osama could plan something that complex. Your argument is baseless because it is IMPOSSIBLE. You need to wake up from whatever craziness you have fallen victim to. You are a paranoid delusional wackjob.

FINALLY... Murtha has figured out how to stop this psycho call President from throwing our men and women into war recklessly. Bush is one out of step, out of sync, Cheney lover. I don't know HOW Bush can look himself in the mirror in the morning. His hands are full of blood, and he is not satisfied yet. He wants more. HAIL MURTHA.... you got my vote!

Send that * Bush into war... is the Commander in Chief supposed to LEAD his troops into battle. Panzie ass, can just sit in the Oval Office, and talking *... and we the people let him get away with it.

I am glad someone in government has the balls to STOP this psycho. Someone needs to start up Impeachment proceedings. Bush is missing in Action in my book. Someone has to get him out of there before he starts pushing buttons. Oh Gawd..... here we go!

by gene on 02.15.2007 at 10:06 PM

A scenario to think about. We pull out of Iraq and let them work it out themselves. After they do they then have time to give more thought to the USA. Since they are not bothered with us over there. We know we can't beat the USA militerily then let's do this. 1. Blow up 500 groceries stores all over the country, then watch how the government provides security and how eager the infadels like to go get their groceries. 2. Blow up 300 to 400 food courts in the largest malls in the country. 3. Start blowing up Wal Mart, Kmart, Sears,Target and other large discounter stores. Any of you guys with all the answers tell me what effect this will have on the economy and the minds of Americans. That's why we need to win this thing over there by cliff.crain on 02.15.2007 at 09:23 PM

This announcement should come as no surprise to anyone. Despite their campaign promises to the contrary, John Murtha and the Democratic Party do not support the brave fighting men of the US military. They are using our troops lives to play politics and fulfill their prophecy that the Iraq War is unwinnable. Iraq is far from lost and the troop surge that the President has called for is exactly the type of strategy needed to win the war.

by Hofer on 02.15.2007 at 09:20 PM

It would seem that the Democrats want it both ways. They want to say they support our troops, but they have accepted defeat in Iraq. Isnt this a paradox or something. If you have accepted defeat in Iraq, you are telling our troops that they failed. Way to support our troops!!

Murtha, IF you say you support our troops in Iraq, would you give them the tools they need so they would have an chance at victory? If they needed more humvees, would you give them the humvees? If they needed more vests, bullets, guns, grenades, missiles, tanks, etc. would you give them that? If you answered no to any of the above then you are lying and you do not support our troops one bit. If you answered yes, then why are you blocking another crutial tool our troops need right now, more man power?

At 6:23PM In the first post on this story, I asked a couple simple questions, and apparently no one had the brass ones to even attempt to answer them. So here they are again.

Is not wanting to send reinforcements just another way that Democrats suppport the troops in Iraq?

Democrats, why don't you want the United States to win the war in Iraq? And if by chance you do want the United States to win , why are you against sending more troops?

"eman," it's not so much what I hear that you are in incapable of hearing, it's what I can see that you are blind to. After the "peace" movement succeeded in getting the United States out of Vietnam, the ensuing "peace" resulted in a holocuast that saw the Communists murder nearly 3 million people in Southeast Asia. Eman, are you truly blind to the impending nightmarish reality in Iraq if we vacate? And if the terrorists are allowed to chase our troops back to the United States, will they not then have a refuge in Iraq? And then eman, how long till they bring the war here again? Hopefully we can both agree we have to fight the terrorists. I would much rather fight them in Iraq then in New York and Washington, D.C.

Ardie to Hardie, stop begging the question assuming things not in fact. There are plenty of reinforcements to save some U.S. Army Rangers from a teenage Sunni Muslim with an AK-47 who can't shoot straight. What Rep. Murtha is trying to do is prevent your side from hastily 'surging' in warm untrained bodies in uniform without proper protection to die needlessly in Iraq.

Mr. Murtha, Amend the Constitution, and then you could have the power to stop the surge. The President is the Commander-in-Chief. Have you forgotten that?

Murtha Moves To Forefront Of Iraq Debate (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, February 16, 2007

Rep. John Murtha is quickly emerging as one of President Bush's most formidable foes in the Iraq war debate.

Many Democrats, including House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, match Murtha's fiery opposition to Bush's policies. But the Marine combat veteran's prowess on military matters, strong relationships with Republicans and — most important — control of the Pentagon's spending bills has put him at the forefront of the debate.

The Pennsylvania Democrat is leading the charge among members of his party to end the war by limiting funding. That fight, which will probably be waged next month, is expected to overshadow this week's battle over a nonbinding resolution opposing Bush's troop buildup.

Part kindly Irish Catholic grandfather and part political pit bull with two Purple Hearts in his pocket, Murtha seems the Democrats' best chance of using the budget to curtail the war without appearing to be leaving troops in the lurch.

"Many of the roads (in Congress) lead through Murtha," said Darrell West, a political science professor at Brown University. "So Bush has to deal with him."

Murtha retains clout among his Democratic colleagues, especially on defense issues, despite losing a postelection challenge to Rep. Steny Hoyer, D-Md., to become majority leader. Hoyer and Pelosi have tapped Murtha to address caucus meetings on the issue of the war and used him to assure the more liberal members of their base that Democrats will do everything they can to bring troops home.

So far, Democrats and Republicans alike are listening closely.

"Do most people have enormous respect for Mr. Murtha? Oh, yes," said Pelosi.

By mid-March, Murtha will offer legislation that he says would set such stringent rules on combat deployments that Bush would have no choice but to begin bringing troops home.

His legislation would dictate how long troops can stay, the equipment they use and whether any money could be spent to expand military operations into Iran. Murtha says few units could meet the high standards he envisions, meaning Bush's plan to keep some 160,000 troops in Iraq for months on end would be thwarted.

Under his plan, he says, Democrats would be helping and not hurting troops by making sure they have what they need before being thrown into combat.

"This vote will be the most important vote in changing the direction of the war," Murtha, D-Pa., told an anti-war group in an interview broadcast on the Internet Thursday.

"The president could veto it, but then he wouldn't have any money," he later said.

Murtha, 74, joined the Marine Corps during the Korean war and volunteered to return to active duty in Vietnam, where he earned his two Purple Hearts — awards given to troops wounded or killed in action.

On Capitol Hill for 33 years, the retired Marine colonel rarely seeks the limelight, often avoiding reporters and speaking on the House floor only to debate the annual defense spending bill.

In November 2005, he stunned his colleagues by turning against the war. Three years after voting in favor of the Iraq invasion, Murtha declared in a tearful speech: "It's time to bring them home."

But it is his reputation as a defense hawk that makes him such a threat to Bush. As a staunch supporter of military spending in the past, Murtha has earned a strong alliance of Republican friends, who say they are watching to see precisely what he proposes.

"I will say it's an interesting concept," said Sen. John Warner, a leading Republican defense figure who opposes sending more troops to Iraq.

"He is a fighter," Warner, R-Va., later added. "Be he right or wrong, he is a fighter and that says a lot."

DOJ_NMG_0132974

Rep. Wayne Gilchrest, one of about a dozen House Republicans who announced this week they oppose Bush's Iraq strategy, said he thinks Congress should seriously consider Murtha's ideas.

"To brush these (proposals) off the table is irresponsible," said Gilchrest, R-Md.

Murtha also has his opponents.

"While Rep. Murtha is unveiling his plan to choke off funding for American troops serving in harm's way, Republicans like Rep. Sam Johnson — a distinguished Vietnam War veteran — are on the House floor explaining the demoralizing impact that the majority's political maneuvers will have on our men and women in uniform," said House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

Bush this week seemed keenly aware of Murtha's political momentum. In recent days, the president shrugged off the significance of House vote expected Friday on a symbolic resolution stating opposition to his war plans. Instead, the president has focused his sights on the upcoming war supplemental.

Bush says he needs $93 billion more to continue paying for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan through Sept. 30; the military is expected to run out of money by May, making passage of the bill critical.

"We have a responsibility, Republicans and Democrats have a responsibility to give our troops the resources they need to do their job and the flexibility they need to prevail," Bush said in speech Thursday.

House Set To Vote Against Troop Increase (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON -- With the House poised to vote Friday against adding more U.S. troops in Iraq, Speaker Nancy Pelosi said the action represents a "huge statement" that President Bush can't "completely ignore" even if he is unwilling to change course militarily.

"I don't know if the president is moveable in terms of the course of action he wants to take militarily," Ms. Pelosi conceded, but she said she hopes "he would be open to a truly robust initiative" to find a diplomatic and political settlement to the fighting.

The California Democrat said the Republicans were using a "stale" argument in accusing the Democrats of not supporting the troops in the war. "I think the American people have spoken on that point…They know that they support the troops and they know they oppose the war."

"This is a huge statement that a majority of Congress in a bipartisan way disapproves of the president's increase of the troops…It's big. This is very big," she said. "There's no more blank check for George Bush," Ms. Pelosi argued, but as Congress reasserts itself on the issue of Iraq, both lawmakers and the White House had to recognize each others role.

"Can you stop it? It has already begun," she said of the proposed addition of combat brigades representing at least 21,000 more soldiers and Maries over the coming months. "The president is the commander in chief. Congress has a role in all of this, and I think you will now see a calibration of those two responsibilities. Neither one of us should abuse our power."

The speaker, who made her comments in an interview with reporters, also shed some light on what she sees as her party's domestic agenda for the next 100 days leading up to Memorial Day. She said she remains optimistic that a minimum wage increase can be worked out with the Senate, and despite White House objections, Democrats will press for adding an estimated $750 million to a wartime supplemental spending bill next month to meet a projected shortfall in funds for a joint state-federal child heath program.

"I think he wants the leanest of supplementals," Ms. Pelosi said, after speaking to Mr. Bush about the matter this week. "But we have some emergencies and as I said to him, these are governors, Democrats and Republicans, who have a shortfall, and something has to be done for these children."

Known as the State Children's Health Insurance Program or SCHIP, the program builds on the state-federal Medicaid program for the poor by trying to reach households above the poverty level. The Congressional Research Service has estimated that 14 states, including Illinois, Georgia, and New Jersey, are facing shortfalls totaling $746.5 million before the end of this fiscal year, Sept. 30.

The same spending bill includes $93.4 billion for the Defense Department to help fund military operations overseas in Iraq and Afghanistan. As such it is the chief focus of the next stage in the war debate, and the bill manager, Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.) has said he will recommend adding restrictions that would make it harder for the Pentagon to maintain the higher troop levels anticipated after the proposed surge this spring is completed.

For example, he wants service chiefs to certify that each new unit sent to Iraq has the training and equipment needed. Language could be added to prohibit some of the shortcuts commonly used to maintain troop strength and the integrity of units, given the shortage of personnel. He would restrict "stop-loss" procedures, which are used to keep soldiers such as young non-commissioned officers in a unit about to deploy even when their enlistments are running out. Extended tours in Iraq would be prohibited; soldiers would be guaranteed a year at home before going back.

If enacted, these requirements would have real impact on an Army already straining to complete the increased troop-level target by late May. The combination of allowing no extensions plus a full year of "dwell" time in the U.S. between tours could set a cap on U.S. strength below current levels, one Defense Department official estimated.

House Republican Leader John Boehner of Ohio said Democrats hoped to "choke off funding for American troops serving in harm's way," but Ms. Pelosi, a close ally of Mr. Murtha's, dismissed these arguments as political.

"What can I tell you about Republicans? They will say what they want to say," she said, defending Mr. Murtha's right to appear in a video interview with the liberal moveon.org. ""We have freedom of speech here…This is a democratic process."

"He is putting out ideas," she said of her friend. "Until you see his proposals in writing, nobody can tell you here what the level of support is. You have to see what it is, what its ramifications are."

"Do most people here have enormous respect for the judgment of Mr. Murtha. Oh yes. But he has to get this through his committee and he's `Mr. Consensus,' if nothing else. He always comes to the floor with a bill that has bipartisan support. And that has been something that has been his hall mark."

But on two related points, also expected to be part of the debate on the spending, bill she was clearly supportive.

She said razing Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison, which Mr. Murtha wants to shut down, would send a "great signal to the world." And Ms. Pelosi said she favored adding language that would make it clear that Congress hasn't authorized any military invasion of Iran.

She said in every meeting she has been present with Mr. Bush, the president has said "over and over again that he supports a diplomatic solution to the situation in Iran. I take him at his word."

"I do believe Congress should assert itself though and make it very clear that there is no previous authority for the president -- and president -- to go into Iran," she said. After years on the House Intelligence Committee, she declined any comment regarding special forces and covert operations. "What I'm talking about is invasion," she said.

Broad Swath Of GOP Defecting On Iraq Vote (WP)

By Paul Kane

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

From the moderate suburbs of Delaware to the rural, conservative valleys of eastern Tennessee, House Republican opponents of President Bush's latest Iraq war plan cut across the GOP's ideological and regional spectrum.

Numbering a dozen or more, these House Republicans have emerged as some of the most prominent opponents of the plan to increase troop presence in Iraq. They admit to being a ragtag band, with no scheduled meetings and little political cohesion.

"We aren't organized at all," said Rep. Jim Ramstad (R-Minn.), whose district includes suburbs of the Twin Cities. "It's about as diverse a group as is possible."

Borrowing time from House Democrats, these Republicans have gone to the floor to condemn the latest attempt at stabilizing Iraq, which they see as mired in civil war, and have vowed to support a Democratic-driven resolution condemning the buildup.

The conventional wisdom on Capitol Hill has been that those Republicans facing the most tenuous political hold on their seats would be in open revolt against Bush's unpopular decision to send more troops into Iraq. But the lion's share of GOP opponents of the Bush plan come from comfortable to very safe congressional districts.

Of the first 13 Republicans identified as supporters of the resolution, only three received less than 55 percent of the vote in winning reelection last year -- Reps. Ric Keller (Fla.), Phil English (Pa.) and James T. Walsh (N.Y.). A handful of other GOP supporters received 65 percent or more of the vote last November, placing them among the safest batch of incumbents in the House.

"This is a matter of conscience -- not just your conscience but the conscience of your district," said Rep. Walter B. Jones (N.C.), who has become an unofficial leader among the antiwar Republicans, along with the Eastern Shore's Rep. Wayne T. Gilchrest (Md.).

Jones won reelection last year with 69 percent of the vote in a district that gave just 32 percent of its vote to Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) in the 2004 presidential election. He and others predict that 30 to 50 Republicans will vote against the troop increase.

Republican leadership aides expect the bulk of those votes to come from incumbents sitting in marginal districts, or those from the moderate wing of the party.

But these same aides pointed Thursday to a number of Republicans who barely survived the 2006 Democratic wave but have opposed the resolution.

Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), who won by less than 7,000 votes, and Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.), who won by less than 2,000 votes, both announced Wednesday that they would oppose the Democratic resolution, condemning it as nothing more than "symbolic."

"The majority is clear on what it is against, but does not say what it is for, leaving us with what exists right now, the status quo," Shays said on the floor. "The resolution sends the wrong message to the president, to our troops and to our enemies. It will not get my vote."

The range of Republican opponents to the war can be seen in Reps. John J. "Jimmy" Duncan Jr. (R-Tenn.) and Michael N. Castle (R-Del.).

Duncan, from eastern Tennessee, is widely regarded as a solid conservative. Castle, from the Wilmington area, is one of only two publicly declared antiwar Republicans whose districts tilted toward Kerry in 2004. Both he and Duncan are safe politically: Duncan received 78 percent of the vote last year, and Castle, a former two-term governor, won with 57 percent.

Yet Duncan was among the six Republicans who originally opposed the war in 2002, while Castle gave it his full support. Today, they'll both be opposing the troop buildup.

"Conservatives have traditionally been the strongest opponents to interventionist foreign policies that create so much resentment for us around the world," Duncan said Wednesday.

"Notwithstanding the heroic efforts of our military personnel," Castle said, "the Iraqi government has been unable to overcome the constant instability and sectarian violence that has marked much of the last four years."

House Republicans Opposed To Surge May Pressure Senate (WSJ)

Democrats aim to jump-start Senate debate on Iraq with House GOP defections today.

Representatives Give Rationale (USAT)

By Eugene Kiely And Kathy Kiely

USA Today, February 16, 2007

House members debating the Iraq resolution raised the same issues to support their arguments but came to different conclusions. Here are some examples.

For the resolution

Rep. Lincoln Davis, D-Tenn.: Our actions this week do not dishearten the troops, nor reflect a lack of support. … Defense Secretary (Robert) Gates and Gen. (Peter) Pace both testified before the Senate Armed Services Committee that a resolution disagreeing with the president's proposal would not dishearten the troops. In my opinion, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff may have a little better idea of troop morale than members of Congress.

Against the resolution

Rep. Jack Kingston, R-Ga.: If the troops in Baghdad were watching what we were doing today, they would be outraged, but when you are in harm's way, you don't exactly sit around and watch C-SPAN and silly politicians with silly resolutions. Here is what the Democrats are up to: Dearest troops, we support you, but your mission is in the tank. We don't support your mission. Americans are dying, the situation is dire, but we are not going to send more reinforcements. You are on your own.

For the resolution

Rep. Mike McIntyre, D-N.C.: We cannot continue to increase troop levels in Iraq at the expense of allowing the Taliban to come back into power in Afghanistan. The global war on terrorism is exactly what the name says. It is a global war, not just an Iraqi war, and we cannot let our troop strength be so focused on what is becoming a civil war in Iraq that we lose focus on threats that face us elsewhere in the world. Previous surges have not solved the problems in Iraq. Let us not be fooled into thinking that this one will.

Against the resolution

Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, R-Fla.: Some of our colleagues on the other side of the aisle seek to focus on the abstract rather than on the reality. They believe that security will come from withdrawal and surrender. On the contrary, retreat guarantees that the Islamic militants will intensify their efforts against us. … They won't stop in Iraq, they won't stop in Afghanistan. They have made it abundantly clear that they will not stop until they dominate the world.

For the resolution

Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich.: Last Nov. 7, the American people sent a clear message to Congress and the president: We must end the war in Iraq. … No longer will Congress stand by while the president wages a war that defies logic, common sense and human decency. This week, we shall take a stand. This week, we tell this administration enough is enough; stop ignoring the American people; stop ignoring your generals.

Against the resolution

Rep. Jim Saxton, R-N.J.: The commander of the national VFW put out a press release, and I have the text of it here. "My generation," he said, "learned the hard way that when military decisions are second-guessed by opinion polls or overruled by politicians, it's the common soldier and their families who pay the price." … Mr. Speaker, I think the commander of the national VFW is absolutely right.

For the resolution

Rep. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick, D-Mich.: As noted genius Albert Einstein once said, "Insanity is doing the same over and over again and expecting different results." Over and over, Congress has spent over $503 billion in Iraq. Over and over, America's finest have died, with more than 3,000 women and men, in Iraq. Over and over, women and men are wounded or maimed, some for life, with more than 25,000 today. Today, we still cannot safely fly planes on a reliable basis in and out of Baghdad. This is progress?

Against the resolution

Rep. Dan Burton, R-Ind.: I am convinced after studying history and watching what happened in the past, that if we don't deal with this problem now, we will deal with it later, and the costs will be a heck of a lot more than it is today, and it may involve millions and millions of lives. Deal with them now, let them know we are going to stand firm, Iraq is going to be a democracy. We are not going to let Iran or any of the terrorists prevail, and we are going to stop a holocaust in the future.

Bush, Congress Could Face Confrontation On Issue Of War Powers (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

President Bush has not been shy about asserting robust powers for the presidency in waging war, but lately he has seemed to concede that Congress has a role to play as well. Lawmakers, he has indicated, are within their rights to try to cap total deployments or limit where troops can go in Iraq.

"They have the right to try to use the power of the purse to determine policy," the president told editors of the Wall Street Journal recently, in an interview that took some of his strongest conservative supporters by surprise.

For a president who has asserted broad executive authority to conduct aggressive interrogations of detainees and electronic surveillance of terrorism suspects without a court warrant, such comments may reflect as much pragmatism as any serious legal analysis. White House aides concede they are not interested in unduly antagonizing lawmakers at a time they need all the help they can get on Capitol Hill.

But as the debate in Congress shifts from nonbinding resolutions of disapproval for adding troops in Iraq to attaching conditions on funding for the war, a constitutional clash between the legislative and executive branches may be inevitable, say lawmakers and legal scholars with close ties to the administration.

After a vote today on a resolution condemning the new deployments to Iraq, House Democratic leaders will serve notice that they intend to attach conditions to the coming spending bill on the war that could arguably encroach on the president's constitutional powers as commander in chief to control tactics and operations.

These include riders that would prevent Bush from sending units to Iraq unless they are certified as combat-ready and that would require Army troops be given a year at home before an additional deployment to Iraq.

Democrats have described these conditions as part of a slow strategy to stop the war without cutting funding completely, which most parties agree would be legally permissible -- but politically difficult.

White House press secretary Tony Snow declined to be drawn into a discussion with reporters yesterday about whether such provisions would be "micromanaging" the war -- which some scholars think would be unconstitutional. The new White House counsel, Fred F. Fielding, is considered a pragmatist not particularly interested in new fights with Congress, but administration allies in the conservative legal world predicted that the White House would eventually chafe at such restrictions.

"The administration might try to be as accommodating as possible on issues short of a complete shutdown of the war, but if Congress clamps down on a core commander-in-chief power that the president thinks might be necessary to use in the war on terrorism, I do not think pragmatism will prevail," said one former top administration lawyer, who conditioned his comments on anonymity.

David B. Rivkin Jr., a White House lawyer in the George H.W. Bush and Ronald Reagan administrations, described the proposed congressional restrictions as the "epitome of micromanagement." He said he thinks "the White House will end up fighting the congressional micromanagement and, if it continues, will publicly articulate the view that it is unconstitutional and not binding on the executive."

Others speculate that Bush may be backpedaling a bit from his broad assertions of presidential power, some of which the Supreme Court rejected last summer when it struck down his plan for trying terrorism suspects in military tribunals.

"He had said on quite a number of occasions that he's the decider," said Sen. Arlen Specter (Pa.), ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee. "He [is] not the sole decider. . . . As this debate has progressed, the president is acknowledging the constitutional role of Congress."

The administration declined to make available lawyers to discuss the constitutional issues surrounding the war debate, saying it does not want to discuss hypotheticals, but a Justice Department spokesman pointed to a number of opinions from the Office of Legal Counsel suggesting clear limits on congressional power.

In 1996, then-Assistant Attorney General Walter E. Dellinger III wrote a memo stating that congressional language prohibiting the president from placing U.S. forces under United Nations control during peacekeeping operations "would unconstitutionally constrain the President's exercise of his authority as commander-in-chief."

In an interview this week, Dellinger indicated that the Democratic proposals being floated on Capitol Hill -- such as a cap on troops in Iraq -- do not amount to that kind of tactical interference. He said there is a "striking consensus" on both the left and the right that Congress has the power to limit the scope and duration of the war -- not only through the power of the purse but through other war powers.

As Dellinger suggested, there is little question among most scholars that Congress has ample constitutional authority to shut down the war. "I am not aware of a serious dispute over whether it is constitutional for Congress to defund or otherwise terminate the war in Iraq," said Brad Berenson, who was in the White House counsel's office from 2001 to 2003. "The big debate is over whether it is wise."

Indeed, some Republicans seem to be baiting the Democrats to try to defund the war. John Yoo, a former Justice Department official who became well known for his expansive assertions of presidential authority, co-wrote a piece in the New York Times this week suggesting Congress has all the power it wants to stop the war but is engaging in "bluster" with nonbinding resolutions.

Dellinger said he is baffled by such arguments. "Although it does not become law, how can it possibly be considered meaningless for each house of the Congress to exercise the view in a formal recorded vote that a planned addition to U.S. forces is a mistake?" he said. "I think that the framers of the Constitution would be astonished that a president would proceed to increase U.S. involvement in a foreign war over the expressed objection of both houses of Congress."

Democrats Face A Struggle Over War Strategy (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — Now comes the hard part.

Congressional Democrats quickly and easily united behind a nonbinding resolution denouncing President Bush's plan to send more U.S. troops to Iraq. But after the measure's expected approval in the House today, party leaders will confront more divisive questions: how to force a determined president to back down from his plan, and whether to push for a complete withdrawal.

Senior House Democrats are crafting a strategy to block a troop escalation in Iraq without exposing the party to charges that it is undermining the military.

But antiwar advocates would rather set a firm target date for withdrawing all troops. More moderate Democrats, especially those in Republican-leaning districts, are worried that direct steps to limit Bush's war powers are fraught with political peril.

In the Senate, meanwhile, a more immediate obstacle looms.

Facing procedural hurdles set up by Republicans, Democrats are still struggling to pass a nonbinding resolution that mirrors the House measure. On Thursday, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said he would hold an unusual Saturday session to bring the issue to a head, although it remained unclear whether he had enough votes to break the deadlock that stalled action earlier this month.

Regardless of the outcome of the Senate tiff, Capitol Hill's focus in the weeks ahead will turn to Bush's request for additional funding for the war. As they consider it, Democrats will be exploring just how far they can go in challenging him.

One thing is clear: Democratic leaders will be under pressure from the party's rank and file — especially activists who will play a major role in choosing their 2008 presidential candidate — to go beyond symbolic denunciations of Bush's policy.

"Congress has no choice but to do some binding action after the nonbinding resolution, or the antiwar community will go berserk if they are perceived as hesitating," said Tom Matzzie, Washington director of Moveon.org, the liberal online group.

Today's House vote will stand as Congress' first formal repudiation of Bush's Iraq policy, a rare wartime rebuke for a commander in chief. Support for the measure demonstrates that Democratic lawmakers who just a year ago were wary of criticizing Bush over Iraq have been emboldened by the GOP's shellacking in the November election.

Democratic leaders acknowledge the limits of their power to change Bush's policy, noting their party's narrow majority in the Senate and Bush's veto power. But they say they are pushing to create a political climate that forces Bush to change his approach.

Bush has said the House resolution would not affect him, but House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) on Thursday told reporters, "I don't know that the president can completely ignore it; this is the voice of the American people."

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) said he and other party leaders "are going to keep ratcheting up the pressure so that public opinion and congressional opinion is so strong that the president will have no choice but to change strategy."

But he added, "There is not just one vote at any one time that is going to be the magic pill that changes it."

As part of their efforts, Democrats and political activists are planning to ramp up pressure on Republicans during next week's recess on Capitol Hill.

In an opening volley, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee today will start running newspaper ads in New Hampshire and Oregon — two states where antiwar sentiment runs strong — attacking Republican incumbents who face reelection next year and who voted with their party last week to block Senate debate on Iraq.

On the eve of the House's vote, Moveon.org Thursday hosted 1,300 meetings around the country where activists viewed an antiwar documentary and a video message from Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), an influential war critic.

During next week's recess, the group plans antiwar rallies at congressional offices of 180 Republicans and Democrats who are deemed insufficiently committed to ending the war.

"The message that keeps going out is: 'Stop the escalation; stop the war,' " said Matzzie.

Republicans are putting out a different message: that the nonbinding resolution denouncing Bush's troop buildup is a stalking horse for future efforts to roll back funding for the war.

Echoing comments by other GOP lawmakers throughout this week's House debate, Rep. Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.) said, "My opposition lies not in what [the nonbinding] resolution says, but in what I fear it is intended to do — and that is to lay the foundation to begin cutting funding from our troops."

That line of attack is, in part, why many Democrats worry about the consequences of trying to block the troop increase by tying strings to the supplemental war appropriations bill Bush has requested. These Democrats warn that Republicans will accuse the party of undermining the military because it is difficult to isolate funding for the troop increase without affecting military personnel already deployed.

"It is a Gordian knot," said California Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher (D-Alamo), who supports the nonbinding resolution.

Murtha, chairman of the defense appropriations subcommittee that will deal with the war funding request, Thursday announced his plan for trying to thwart the troop buildup. He proposed that the bill include a proviso banning the deployment of units that do not meet strict standards of readiness in their equipment and training.

Murtha said that with the military stretched thin, that requirement would make it difficult, if not impossible, for Bush to proceed with the troop increase. He also proposed prohibiting military action against Iran without congressional approval.

Although Murtha's proposal falls short of cutting off funding for the war or setting a timeline for withdrawal, it is embraced by leading antiwar activists.

"We're going to make sure people understand we're supporting the troops and protecting the troops," said Murtha in an interview broadcast on the Web by antiwar group Win Without War. "On the other hand, we are going to stop this surge."

That did not stop Republicans from immediately attacking Murtha, saying his approach amounts to "a slow-bleed" plan to undercut the mission in Iraq.

Conversely, Murtha's measure does not go far enough to satisfy some antiwar Democrats. Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D-Petaluma), for example, said she would vote against the war funding bill even if the House accepted the conditions aimed at blocking the troop increase.

"People voted for Democrats [in November] because they want us to change the course in Iraq," Woolsey said.

Pelosi stopped short of fully embracing Murtha's plan, while endorsing its thrust of putting a premium on troop readiness.

"It remains to be seen where the committee will go," she said.

Democrats In State Capitols Push Antiwar Resolutions (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 15 — Frustrated by the inability of Democrats in Congress to pass a resolution opposing President Bush's policies in Iraq, state legislators across the country, led by Democrats and under pressure from liberal advocacy groups, are pushing forward with their own resolutions.

Resolutions have passed in chambers of three legislatures, in California, Iowa and Vermont. The Maryland General Assembly sent a letter to its Congressional delegation, signed by a majority of the State Senate and close to a majority of the House, urging opposition to the increase in troops in Iraq.

Letters or resolutions are being drafted in at least 19 other states. The goal is to embarrass Congress into passing its own resolution and to provide cover for Democrats and Republicans looking for concrete evidence back home that anti-Iraq resolutions enjoy popular support.

"The end of this war has to start sometime and somewhere," the president of the Iowa Senate, John P. Kibbie, a Democrat, said Thursday. "And stopping the expansion of these troops needs to happen now."

The activity was spurred in a conference call last month that included state legislators; Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts; and advocacy groups like the Progressive States Network and MoveOn.org.

Mr. Kennedy said pressure by the states would push Washington to oppose the Iraq plans of the Bush administration. "Your voices, your calls, your e-mails and your resolutions have an impact on the debate," Mr. Kennedy said.

Many Republicans in state legislatures have remained silent on the resolutions, seeing no advantage in signing or voting for them. Others have called the actions essentially votes of no confidence in the troops on the ground.

"These resolutions are a colossal waste of time," said Kris Kobach, chairman of the Republican Party in Kansas, where a resolution was killed in committee. "Legislatures are spending valuable and limited time acting in an area where they have no authority. If all we are doing is sending messages, we should be concerned about the fact that soldiers are being told that their states are not behind them. I think that is particularly troubling."

Many resolutions use language from the Progressive States Network that apes language in a proposed resolution in Congress that says President Bush should obtain explicit Congressional approval before adding troops in Iraq.

Other resolutions go further, calling for a deadline for departure, immediate troop withdrawal or stopping the financing of the war. The votes have largely fallen along party lines — Democrats for and Republicans against — although there have been exceptions. In North Dakota, a Democrat and a Republican are sponsoring a resolution urging Congress and Mr. Bush to "disengage American combat forces in Iraq."

In a vote on Thursday in the Iowa Senate, Republicans insisted on a voice vote rather than a roll call on a resolution to condemn the increase in troops. The measure, which passed, is headed to the House, where its fate is uncertain.

The resolutions, much like the ones that Congress is considering, are nonbinding and have little effect beyond politics. But the states' debates function as an echo chamber for the debate over withdrawing troops from Iraq and help demonstrate growing concerns on the war.

"These resolutions have generated an incredible amount of local media," said Joel Barkin, executive director of the Progressive States Network, a liberal group that works to influence bills. "So they raise awareness that this is a local issue. But it is aimed at pressuring the Congress."

In California, Democrats and Republicans in the State Senate spoke passionately about a resolution that passed on Tuesday.

"As a people, we are getting fed up and want to express it and not be haunted by the effects of silence," said State Senator Carole Migden, Democrat of San Francisco, who sponsored the resolution. "We are trying to capture the mood of the people and offer some guidance as to how the largest state in the union is disposed in the matter."

State Senator Dennis Hollingsworth, Republican of Temecula, an opponent of the measure, said: "This resolution talks about not only opposing the troop increase but cutting off their funding. It lays bare the Democrats' true intentions. So they can stop the platitudes about supporting the troops but not supporting the mission. They want us to lose this war."

In states where Republicans control the legislatures, passage of such antiwar resolutions seems unlikely. Kansas lawmakers held a perfunctory hearing, only to have the committee chairman, Senator Pete Brungardt, Republican of Salina, say he would not schedule a vote.

"A number of people felt that was a rather public vote without an upside," Mr. Brungardt said. "There is not really a winning answer for them."

Bush Regains His Footing (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

It may seem perverse to suggest that, at the very moment the House of Representatives is repudiating his policy in Iraq, President Bush is poised for a political comeback. But don't be astonished if that is the case.

Like President Bill Clinton after the Democrats lost control of Congress in 1994, Bush has gone through a period of wrenching adjustment to his reduced status. But just as Clinton did in the winter of 1995, Bush now shows signs of renewed energy and is regaining the initiative on several fronts.

More important, he is demonstrating political smarts that even his critics have to acknowledge.

His reaction to the planned House vote opposing the increase he ordered in U.S. troops deployed to Iraq illustrates the point.

When Bush faced reporters on Wednesday morning, he knew that virtually all those in the Democratic majority would be joined by a significant minority of Republicans in voting today to decry the "surge" strategy.

He did three things to diminish the impact of that impending defeat.

DOJ_NMG_0132982

First, he argued that the House was at odds with the Senate, which had within the past month unanimously confirmed Gen. David H. Petraeus as the new commander in Iraq -- the man Bush said was the author of the surge strategy and the man who could make it work. Bush has made Petraeus his blocking back in this debate -- replacing Vice President Cheney, whose credibility is much lower.

Second, he minimized the stakes in the House debate by endorsing the good motives of his critics, rejecting the notion that their actions would damage U.S. troops' morale or embolden the enemy -- all by way of saying that the House vote was no big deal.

And third, by contrasting today's vote on a nonbinding resolution with the pending vote on funding the war in Iraq, he shifted the battleground to a fight he is likely to win -- and put the Democrats on the defensive. Much of their own core constituency wants them to go beyond nonbinding resolutions and use the power of the purse to force Bush to reduce the American commitment in Iraq.

But congressional Democrats are leery of seeming to withhold resources from the 150,000 troops who will be fighting in that country once the surge is complete; that is why they blocked Republicans from offering resolutions of their own in the House or Senate pledging to keep financing the war. Democrats did not want an up-or-down vote on that question, but Bush has placed it squarely before them.

In other respects, too, Bush has been impressive in recent days.

He has been far more accessible -- and responsive -- to the media and public, holding any number of one-on-one interviews, both on and off the record, leading up to Wednesday's televised news conference. And he has been more candid in his responses than in the past.

While forcefully making his points, he has depersonalized the differences with his critics and opponents. He has not only vouched for the good intentions of congressional Democrats, he has visited them on their home ground, given them opportunities to question him face to face, and repeatedly outlined areas -- aside from Iraq -- where he says they could work together on legislation: immigration, energy, education, health care, the budget.

With the public eager for some bipartisan progress on all these fronts, Bush is signaling that he, at least, is ready to try.

At his news conference, he also stepped away from personal confrontation with the rulers in Iran, making it clear that he does not necessarily hold its political leadership responsible for shipping arms to the insurgent Shiites fighting in Iraq. He insisted the U.S. military would do whatever is necessary to halt the shipments and protect the troops, but he said repeatedly that these defensive measures are not a prelude to aggressive action against Iran.

All this is to the good. But Bush, unlike Clinton, is in the middle of a bloody civil war, which can be ended only by the Iraqis themselves. All he claims to be able to do is to provide some breathing space for them by attempting to reduce the violence. As he said, "What really matters is what happens on the ground. I can talk all day long, but what really matters to the American people is to see progress."

And whether the American people will see it, no one knows.

Reluctantly, The Senate's Weekend Warriors (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

Now this is war.

After four years of fighting in Iraq, and two weeks of trying to force senators to debate the conflict, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid yesterday wheeled out the ultimate weapon.

He ordered his colleagues to work on Saturday.

To the average American, this would be an inconvenience. To a senator, a Saturday vote is a hardship reserved for national crises such as impeachment or Terri Schiavo. Votes have been held on Saturday only five times in the past 10 years.

"Time is of the essence," Reid told a rapt audience in the Senate television studio yesterday afternoon. "That's why the Senate will have another Iraq vote on Saturday."

The "vote on Saturday is a crucial vote not just for the moment or for the week, but for the history of America," added an overwrought Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.). "We're calling their bluff. We're staying here. Now vote yes or no."

But in trying to force Republicans to debate Iraq, Reid caused untold pain and suffering for his Democratic colleagues, many of whom prefer to spend their weekends running for president. Hillary Clinton was supposed to be campaigning in New Hampshire on Saturday. Barack Obama had plans to be in South Carolina and Virginia. Joe Biden had an Iowa trip scheduled. Chris Dodd had events scheduled in South Carolina.

And then there was Republican John McCain, who had an Iowa engagement, and all those senators on both sides planning to leave on trips for the Presidents' Day recess.

The Post's Shailagh Murray asked Reid whether he had considered the burden his Saturday plan was placing on his ambitious colleagues.

"I'm confident they will be -- most of them will be here," he hedged.

Moments after Reid's bombshell, one presidential candidate, Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), went to the Senate floor to voice his dissent. "I don't think that is a fair or appropriate process for this body to follow," he said. Particularly because he had plans to attend the National Religious Broadcasters convention in Florida on Saturday.

The prospective loss of his Saturday caused great distress to the Senate minority leader, Mitch McConnell (Ky.). He scheduled a news conference for 4 p.m., then moved it to 4:15, then 4:45, then back to 4:30, and finally arrived at 4:40. There, he was asked how his colleagues felt about surrendering their Saturday. "You'll have to ask all of them," he said tightly.

"We could have had a civilized, well-structured debate," McConnell lamented, "but that appears to be not possible at the moment."

It's not entirely clear why Senate Republicans were so determined to avoid a debate. If it goes anything like the three-day House debate this week, the world will little note nor long remember what they say.

House members spent much of their debate exchanging playground-style taunts. Each side tried to tar the other with supporting a "stay the course" plan -- a phrase that, not long ago, was seen as an expression of resolve.

"After months of campaigning against 'stay the course,' the Democrats are proposing just that," said Patrick McHenry (R-N.C.). Countered Earl Blumenauer (D-Ore.): "Stay the course? My Lord, that is not remotely what we are talking about here."

"The bottom line of this resolution tells the president to stay the course," insisted Pete Hoekstra (R-Mich.). Offered Steve Cohen (D-Tenn.): "The Republicans have come in here today and said that we need to in essence stay the course."

When they weren't bickering about the "stay the course" label, lawmakers fought about whose policy qualified as a "plan" for Iraq.

"If you have an alternative plan, introduce it," Jack Kingston (R-Ga.) challenged.

"What is the plan, Mr. President?" asked Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick (D-Mich.).

"I have presented this Congress with a 12-point plan," said Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio).

Fortunately, Ric Keller (R-Fla.) was on hand to restore gravity to the debate. He spoke about lawn care as a metaphor for Iraq:

"Imagine your next-door neighbor refuses to mow his lawn and the weeds are all the way up to his waist. You decide you are going to mow his lawn for him every single week. The neighbor never says thank you, he hates you, and sometimes he takes out a gun and shoots at you. Under these circumstances, do you keep mowing his lawn forever?"

Hearing such soaring rhetoric from the other chamber only made Senate Democrats more determined to have their own debate. "We demand an up-or-down vote on the resolution that the House is debating," Reid declared. He went to the Senate floor and announced that the vote will begin at 1:45 pm on Saturday. "There's really no time that meets everyone's expectations," he observed.

It appeared Democrats were serious. Then, just before 5 p.m., came official confirmation: an e-mail titled "Revised Hillary Clinton New Hampshire Schedule." The candidate's "Conversation with Granite Staters," which was to have been held at 2:30 Saturday in the Dover High School cafeteria, had been scrapped.

Democratic Leader Gambles That Weekend Detention Could End Senate's Squabbling On Iraq (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Robin Toner

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15 — As the House prepared to pass a symbolic resolution denouncing President Bush's war policy, Senate Democratic leaders on Thursday abruptly scheduled a weekend debate on Iraq in an effort to break a stalemate and avoid impressions that partisan bickering was weighing down deliberations over the war.

A steady line of Republicans and Democrats made their way to the House floor for a third straight day of debating Mr. Bush's troop buildup plan before the matter comes to a vote Friday. The Senate, stung by its own failure so far to act, spent much of Thursday locked in a debate about debating until Senator Harry Reid, the majority leader, called the rare Saturday session.

"We demand an up-or-down vote on the resolution the House is debating as we speak," said Mr. Reid, a Nevada Democrat. "We're determined to give our troops and the American people the debate they deserve."

But when they convene Saturday afternoon, senators will not debate the Iraq resolution itself. Instead, they will be taking up a procedural vote required under Senate rules to move forward to the actual debate.

Democratic leaders were hoping that 10 days of mounting public pressure would lure enough Republicans in the Senate to their side to attain the 60 votes necessary to move to the Iraq resolution. A procedural vote on a similar resolution last week fell 11 votes short, but since then several Republicans who voted to block consideration of that resolution have taken the floor to express dismay that the Senate was, in effect, sidelined in the debate.

Senate Republican leaders on Thursday forcefully rejected suggestions that they were blocking an Iraq debate. By the end of the day, they trooped into a news conference to declare that they were "disappointed" that they were not allowed a vote on a resolution of their choosing. Scrambling for the moral and political high ground, the Republicans asserted that it was the Democrats — not they — who were freezing the debate.

Throughout the week, as the House debated the Iraq war from morning to night, many senators came to the floor to complain that the upper chamber of Congress was "in real danger of becoming irrelevant," as Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, put it Thursday.

"I don't think we ought to be dominant over the House of Representatives," he said. "But I think we ought to be at least equal. What we have here is close to anarchy. We've been debating the debate all week."

In the Senate, Mr. Reid's announcement essentially called the bluff of Republicans who were increasingly unhappy with the stalemate and had threatened to vote against a motion to adjourn for the Presidents' Day recess. After a closed caucus with his fellow Democrats, Mr. Reid announced his decision for a Saturday vote.

Many Americans, of course, often have to work weekends. But the threat of a Saturday roll-call vote — attendance is taken, absences are noted — sent alarms across the Senate, particularly among those who hastily rearranged their presidential campaign schedules.

At least two Democratic senators, Barbara Boxer of California and Patty Murray of Washington, were already on planes for the West Coast, but aides said they intended to return to Washington for the Saturday vote.

"We hope everyone will be here," Mr. Reid said. "It's an important vote."

Republican leaders have asked to vote on a resolution of support for the troops and the full financing of the war effort. They have accused some Democrats of pursuing a strategy to cut war financing gradually — "a slow bleed," Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi, the Republican whip, put it, "a terminology that horrifies me."

Allowing a vote on war financing, Republicans said, would show that Democrats are just as divided.

In an interview on Thursday, Speaker Nancy Pelosi said that the Democrats were unified in their pledge to protect the troops already deployed in Iraq. She added that the House intended to provide the money and resources the troops needed to survive and perform their jobs.

"That's so stale," she said of the recurring Republican argument that Democrats would cut troop financing. "I think the American people have spoken on that point."

Ms. Pelosi said the House resolution, which is expected to pass with bipartisan support, represented the first Congressional message of disapproval over the war.

"I don't know that the president can completely ignore us," she said. "We are the voices of the American people. They were clear in the election that they wanted a new direction, no place more clear than in Iraq."

After the symbolic Iraq resolutions, a fight over the war's financing is coming into view. The president has asked Congress to approve $100 billion for wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, a request Democrats have vowed to examine carefully.

Also Thursday, Senator Joseph R. Biden, a Delaware Democrat who leads the Foreign Relations Committee, said he would work to repeal the 2002 war authorization vote in an effort to close down the war.

Representative John P. Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat who leads a defense appropriations subcommittee, said Congress could block at least part of the new deployments to Iraq by requiring troops to meet a series of conditions and training guidelines. There could also be a requirement that troops spend a year between tours of duty in Iraq.

Senate Vote Upsets '08 Hopefuls' Plans (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

The Senate's informal caucus of presidential hopefuls faces its first test in balancing their jobs with their White House ambitions tomorrow: Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid has scheduled a key vote on the Iraq war.

The Nevada Democrat yesterday said he did not take members' 2008 aspirations -- or planned weekend visits to Iowa and New Hampshire -- into consideration for his procedural move to debate President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq.

"We hope everyone will be here," Mr. Reid told reporters. "It's an important vote."

At least six senators are considering or actively pursuing presidential bids, and most had trips planned to early primary or caucus states in anticipation of Congress' first weeklong recess this year.

The news sent the 2008 hopefuls scrambling to rearrange schedules or, in one case, to insist their candidate potentially missing the vote was a non-story.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, was the first to say he would scrap plans for an Iowa visit to make sure he participated in the 1:45 p.m. Iraq vote.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, has a much-publicized visit to a high school in Dover, N.H., from 9:30 a.m. to noon tomorrow.

She already had to cancel one visit to the Granite State because of a death in the family, but staffers said she will keep the Dover event, fly back for the vote and attempt to keep another scheduled campaign stop in Portsmouth, N.H.

As for Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat with plans to travel to South Carolina, the schedule was a work in progress.

"We're still trying to find that out," one Obama staffer said when asked if the senator would still hold a 10 a.m. town-hall meeting in Orangeburg, S.C., tomorrow.

He is slated to deliver the keynote address at Virginia's annual Jefferson-Jackson Dinner in Richmond tomorrow night. But he will head to Las Vegas, Los Angeles and Austin, Texas, early next week, plans that Mr. Reid's scheduling could pressure him to change.

Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican, will stay for the vote. He was scheduled to attend an all-day convention of the National Religious Broadcasters, but he will try to do both.

There was no indication Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, would reschedule his morning town-hall forum in Des Moines, Iowa.

Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, Connecticut Democrat, had a full slate of events planned in South Carolina, starting with a breakfast in Columbia and ending with a happy hour in Myrtle Beach.

His staff did not have an answer last night.

Democratic leaders were unapologetic, though Mr. Reid did say he had tried to be accommodating.

"This is an unfortunate fact of life that they're going to have to deal with in the weeks and months to come," said Reid spokesman Jim Manley.

Mr. Reid, clearly irritated, yesterday further threatened to keep members in town for Iraq debate next week, refusing to speculate on which days or how long the chamber would be in session.

It is not his own Democratic senators who are making him angry. Mr. Reid, instead, is pushing back against Republicans who last week blocked debate on a different Iraq resolution.

Republicans who oppose the president's plan still voted with their party to stop debate on that measure because they wanted to consider amendments and other versions of Iraq resolutions. This week, the same Republicans had threatened to resist the recess adjournment if they could not vote on Mr. Bush's troop-surge plan.

Democratic leaders said yesterday they were "calling the bluff" of Republicans who wanted to stay in town.

Mr. Reid said he wanted to force an "up or down" vote on the House's nonbinding resolution that states lawmakers support the troops but oppose the president's plan.

Aides conceded privately it will be difficult for Democrats to get the 60 votes needed to pass the procedural vote, but Mr. Reid said if cloture passes, he would proceed immediately to debating war policy.

Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, in 2004 faced scrutiny for missing dozens of votes during his presidential campaign.

However, some 2008 staffers privately said yesterday the importance of the procedural "cloture" vote compared with overall Iraq policy was debatable.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, argued the vote is more than a political maneuver.

"That's why the cloture vote on Saturday is a crucial vote, not just for the moment, or for the week, but for the history of America because it will say where do you stand. ... Are you for the escalation or are you not?"

Plenty of other members weren't planning to be in Washington tomorrow at the beginning of a recess, and a three-day weekend to boot.

Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut has skipped previous Saturday votes and political events because he observes the Jewish Sabbath. Aides for the independent, who caucuses with the Democrats, did not respond to inquiries as to whether he would vote tomorrow.

Mr. Lieberman is one of the few members of the Democratic Caucus who supports Mr. Bush's Iraq plan.

Biden Vows To Narrow Bush's Iraq Mandate (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, February 16, 2007

Current rank: # 2,015 of 15,674 articles WASHINGTON - Democratic presidential candidate Joe Biden said Thursday he would move to repeal the authority Congress gave President Bush in 2002 to send U.S. troops into Iraq and replace it with a narrower mandate.

The chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee said the legislation was based on the idea that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction and was designed to oust Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

"The WMDs were not there," Biden said in prepared remarks at the Brookings Institution, a private research group. "Saddam Hussein is no longer there. The 2002 authorization is no longer relevant to the situation in Iraq."

The Delaware senator, who voted in 2002 to authorize military intervention in Iraq, said he was working to repeal the authorization and to replace it with "a much narrower mission statement for our troops in Iraq."

Congress should make clear the mission is to draw down U.S. forces in Iraq while continuing to combat terrorists, train Iraqis and respond to emergencies, he said.

"We should make equally clear what their mission is not: to stay in Iraq indefinitely and get mired in a savage civil war," Biden said.

Biden long has criticized Bush's strategy in Iraq. It is not clear whether he would be able to draw enough congressional support to succeed in his effort which also would face a Bush veto.

He renewed his proposed roadmap for a political settlement in Iraq, one that gives its warring factions a way to share power peacefully "and offers us a chance to leave with our interests intact."

"Federalism is Iraq's best possible future," Biden said. "But unless we help make federalism work for all Iraqis, the violence will not stop."

Auditors: Billions Squandered In Iraq (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, February 16, 2007

About $10 billion has been squandered by the U.S. government on Iraq reconstruction aid because of contractor overcharges and unsupported expenses, and federal investigators warned Thursday that significantly more taxpayer money is at risk.

The three top auditors overseeing work in Iraq told a House committee their review of $57 billion in Iraq contracts found that Defense and State department officials condoned or allowed repeated work delays, bloated expenses and payments for shoddy work or work never done.

More than one in six dollars charged by U.S. contractors were questionable or unsupported, nearly triple the amount of waste the Government Accountability Office estimated last fall.

"There is no accountability," said David M. Walker, who heads the auditing arm of Congress. "Organizations charged with overseeing contracts are not held accountable. Contractors are not held accountable. The individuals responsible are not held accountable."

"People should be rewarded when they do a good job. But when things don't go right, there have to be consequences," he said.

Also testifying Thursday were Stuart Bowen, the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, and William H. Reed, director of the Defense Contract Audit Agency.

The appearance before the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee came as Congress prepares for a showdown with President Bush next month over his budget request of nearly $100 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

So far, the Bush administration has spent more than $350 billion on the Iraq war and reconstruction effort.

The Army, which handles most of the Iraq contracting, said Thursday it had not reviewed the latest contract figures.

"The U.S. Army, along with the Departments of Defense and State, continue to help thousands of Iraqis daily with reconstruction projects to provide them with better lives," said spokeswoman Mary Ann Hodges. "We look forward to examining its findings and applying some of its recommendations in the future."

Senate Democrats said recently cited cases of waste were "outrageous rip-offs of the American taxpayer" and introduced legislation Thursday to stiffen punishment for war profiteers and cut down on cronyism in contracting.

According to their testimony, the investigators:

_Found overpricing and waste in Iraq contracts amounting to $4.9 billion since the Defense Contract Audit Agency began its work in 2003. Some of that money has been recovered. An additional $5.1 billion in expenses were charged without proper documentation.

_Pointed to growing Iraqi sectarian violence as a significant factor behind bloated U.S. contracting bills. Iraqi officials, they said, must begin to take primary responsibility for reconstruction efforts. That is an uncertain goal, given the widespread corruption in Iraq and the local government's inability to fund projects.

_Urged the Pentagon to reconsider its growing reliance on outside contractors in wars and reconstruction efforts. Layers of subcontractors, poor documentation and lack of strong contract management are rampant and promote waste even after the GAO first warned of problems 15 years ago.

Walker complained that GAO investigators have difficulty getting basic detail about reconstruction contracts such as expenses and subcontractors involved because many Pentagon divisions fail to consistently track or fully report them.

"It's absolutely essential if Congress wants to make an informed decision on authorizations and appropriations that we get this information," he said. "We're talking about billions of dollars and thousands of American lives at stake."

Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., the committee chairman, has pledged scores of investigations of fraud, waste and abuse — with subpoenas if necessary — on the administration's watch.

Of the $10 billion in overpriced contracts or undocumented costs, more than $2.7 billion were charged by Halliburton Co., the oil-field services company once headed by Vice President Dick Cheney.

Noting that auditors still have $300 billion of Iraq spending to review, Waxman said the total amount of waste, fraud and abuse "could be astronomical."

"It's no wonder that taxpayers all across our country are fed up and demanding that we bring real oversight to the 'anything goes' world of Iraq reconstruction," he said.

Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., the top Republican on the panel, pointed to ongoing, "systemic" problems in Iraq contracting. "This much is clear: Poor security, an arcane, ill-suited management structure, and frequent management changes have produced a succession of troubled acquisitions," Davis said.

Contract Probe Raises More Questions (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A congressional investigation into waste in Iraq reconstruction work by U.S. contractors threatens to mushroom into a wider inquiry into Pentagon contracting practices in general.

Under questioning by the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, Defense Contract Audit Agency chief William Reed confirmed that unsupported and questionable costs found in Iraq reconstruction contracting total more than $10 billion -- nearly three times the previous public estimate.

David Walker, head of the Government Accountability office, Congress's audit agency, said lax contracting practices in Iraq are merely "the tip of the iceberg." They are symptomatic of loose Defense Department contracting practices over all, he said, and he urged the committee and Congress in general to conduct a broad investigation into the way the Pentagon awards and oversees contracts.

Mr. Walker said, "There is no accountability. Organizations charged with overseeing contracts are not held accountable. Contractors are not held accountable."

Under Chairman Henry Waxman (D., Calif.) the committee is holding a series of hearings into contracting abuses in Iraq. Staffers confirmed that Mr. Waxman and other committee Democrats likely will take a much wider look at defense contracting after the Iraq hearings conclude.

Mr. Walker cited multiple problems with Pentagon contracting practices. He attributed these to a lack of control by senior leaders, a shortage of personnel to oversee contractor performance, poorly defined requirements for contractors, and "poor business arrangements," he said.

Said Shay Assad, director of the Defense Procurement and Acquisition Policy Office, said, "GAO has made a number of recommendations to improve the Department of Defense's management and use of contracts." Mr. Shay said, "In general we have agreed with these recommendations, and we have been, and are continuing, to work on implementing improvements to address them."

· The Situation: A House panel is holding a series of hearings examining waste in Iraq reconstruction contracts.

· What's at Stake: The Defense Contract Audit Agency chief says unsupported and questionable costs found in such contracts totals more than $10 billion -- nearly three times the previous public estimate.

· What's Next: The congressional investigation could lead to a much broader look into how the Pentagon awards and oversees contracts.

In recent years increasing amounts of military work have been let out to private contractors, and the percentage of no-bid contracts -- those awarded with no competition -- has risen. Until now, Congress hasn't focused in depth on the problem, while many members of Congress have been criticized for awarding "earmarks" that funneled defense contracts to particular favored companies.

Mr. Reed said during the House panel hearing that the Defense Department had disallowed and withheld from contractors working in Iraq only 25% to 37% of the amounts his agency had identified as improper or questionable. The defense audit agency has no power to order compliance with its audits, and the final decisions are made by the individual military services or other officials.

A report by the committee's staffers said the estimate of $10 billion in possibly illegitimate contracting costs in Iraq likely is low. Mr. Reed confirmed that while his agency had audited $57 billion in Iraq contracts, it doesn't know the total amount spent on contracts there. The staff report estimates at least $75 billion spent on contracts in Iraq.

During the hearing, Dyncorp International Inc., a large government contractor, was one of several firms singled out for criticism. An audit report last month by the Special Inspector General for Iraq, Stuart Bowen, raised questions about work Dyncorp did and was paid for that the government hadn't requested, particularly on a new police training camp in Baghdad.

During the hearing, members of the committee raised questions about a luxury swimming pool and hundreds of trailers that were built for the camp but ended up unused. Mr. Bowen told the committee he is launching an in-depth audit of Dyncorp's work in Iraq.

A Dyncorp spokesman said all of the work had been specifically authorized by U.S. officials of the Coalition Provisional Authority that ran Iraq until a new Iraqi government took over: "Everything that we've done, we did in good faith, and everything we've done was authorized by the U.S. government."

Leader Of Al-Qaeda In Iraq Injured In Clash, Official Says (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 15 -- The leader of the Sunni insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq, who is known by the alias Abu Ayyub al-Masri, was injured in a clash with Iraqi police Thursday night, a spokesman for the Iraqi Interior Ministry said.

One of Masri's deputies, Abu Abdullah al-Mujamie, was killed in the gunfight, which occurred about 11 p.m. near Samarra, ministry spokesman Abdul Kareem al-Kinani said.

U.S. officials have said Masri took over the leadership of the insurgent group following the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who was killed by U.S. forces in a June 2006 airstrike. In December, Iraqi officials said security forces had killed another aide to Masri, whom officials describe as a longtime associate of Osama bin Laden's deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri.

A senior al-Qaeda in Iraq leader, Abu Amar al-Dulaimi, confirmed the death of Mujamie, whom he described as Masri's "personal escort," but questioned whether Masri was even in the area. "We don't know if [Masri] was with him or not, or if he was wounded or not," Dulaimi said Thursday night in a phone interview.

Kinani, the ministry spokesman, said Iraqi forces conducted the operation "without U.S. intervention," but Dulaimi said people in the area reported seeing helicopters and fighter planes roaming the sky afterward, a possible indication of a U.S. role in the clash.

Also Thursday, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said anti-American Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr has ordered his top deputies to leave Iraq in order to ease the implementation of the Baghdad security plan, which U.S. and Iraqi forces began to roll out this week.

Sadr, the leader of the powerful Mahdi Army militia, recently went to Iran, according to U.S. officials.

During a news conference Thursday night, Talabani said Sadr told government officials that he was "eager for the stability of the state and the success of the security plan. He gave the government the green light to detain any outlaws."

In Washington on Thursday, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said he believed that Sadr's followers were concerned about the new operation to secure Baghdad and suggested that Sadr and his militia would "go to ground" over the coming months. "And the question is, during that space . . . can we and the Iraqis provide enough security so that economic development, improvements in governance, political reconciliation can all begin to make real progress in Iraq?" Gates said.

Gates said it was "an assumption" that Sadr has gone to Iran. "I haven't seen any factual proof of it at this point, but that's what people -- that's what I hear people think," Gates said.

In recent days, some of Sadr's aides in Iraq have denied that Sadr has left the country.

The security plan includes an increase in U.S. and Iraqi troops, a crackdown on civilians carrying weapons and increased security measures at the Iranian and Syrian borders. U.S. and Iraqi forces this week have been cordoning off sections of the city to root out insurgents and seize weapons. Several of the areas targeted recently are Sunni insurgent strongholds.

Also Thursday, the leader of one of Iraq's most revered Shiite mosques suspended Friday prayers to protest a raid conducted Wednesday.

U.S. military officials said in a statement that Iraqi forces raided the Barantha Mosque in north-central Baghdad because they suspected it was "used as a place to conduct sectarian violence against Iraqi civilians as well as a safe haven and weapons storage area for illegal militia groups." The officials said they confiscated three heavy machine guns and 80 assault rifles.

The mosque's imam, Jalal al-Din al-Saghir, a Shiite cleric and member of parliament who belongs to the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, decried the raid during a telephone interview Thursday night. He said it was conducted solely by U.S. forces.

"They insulted the mosque and they did not inform the Iraqi government of the operation," he said. "We had an agreement with the government. They should tell us before doing such a thing."

Meanwhile, violence continued in Baghdad, where additional checkpoints have been set up recently and a nighttime curfew was extended by one hour.

A car bomb in Sadr City and other explosions killed at least seven people on Thursday, a police spokesman said.

The heavily fortified Green Zone was struck by rocket or mortar fire early Thursday, injuring two people, including an American citizen, said Lou Fintor, the U.S. Embassy spokesman. Fintor also said an Iraqi employee of the embassy was killed Wednesday in central Baghdad in what he described as a "random and senseless" act of violence.

Also Thursday, the U.S. military disclosed in a statement the death of an American soldier killed Wednesday in Anbar province in western Iraq while "conducting combat operations."

Al-Qaeda In Iraq's Leader Reportedly Hurt In Clash (USAT)

USA Today, February 16, 2007

N

BAGHDAD — The leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq was wounded and an aide was killed in a clash Thursday with Iraqi forces, an Interior Ministry official said.

Brig. Gen Abdul-Karim Khalaf, a ministry spokesman, declined to say how Iraqi forces knew that the al-Qaeda leader, Abu Ayyub al-Masri, had been wounded in the clash north of Baghdad. There was no report on the matter from U.S. authorities, and the deputy interior minister, Maj. Gen. Hussein Ali Kamal, said he had no information that such a clash had occurred.

Khalaf said the skirmish happened near Balad, a major U.S. base about 50 miles north of the capital.

Khalaf identified the al-Masri aide killed in the fight as Abu Abdullah al-Majemaai.

Al-Masri took charge of al-Qaeda in Iraq after its charismatic leader, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, was killed in June in a U.S. airstrike in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad.

Meanwhile Thursday, U.S. and Iraqi forces pushed deeper into Sunni militant strongholds in Baghdad as part of a wide-ranging security sweep of the capital.

U.S. and Iraqi soldiers set up dozens of roadway checkpoints around the city and conducted top-to-bottom searches of vehicles as part of their new campaign to disarm militias and pacify the capital.

Low-flying fighter jets thundered over the capital. A spokesman for the U.S. military in Baghdad, Maj. Steven Lamb, said 17 suspects were arrested and three weapons caches seized.

Waiting in a snarl of traffic at one blockade, Mohammed al-Jubouri said people are willing to put up with the trouble as long as the security sweep shows some results. A wave of bombings has killed hundreds of civilians since the beginning of the year.

"We are fed up," al-Jubouri said. "We want only the security and stabilization."

In Baghdad's Dora neighborhood, long a stronghold of Sunni militants, two parked cars wired with explosives blew up as a joint U.S.-Iraqi patrol rolled past. The convoy was unharmed, but the blast killed at least four civilians and injured 15 others.

Two other car bombings came as security forces moved through the city. Those attacks killed at least three civilians.

A leader of the main Sunni bloc in parliament, Adnan al-Dulaimi, complained that the U.S.-led sweeps are attacking mostly Sunni areas. "It should concentrate on those who are perpetrating the violence and terrorist acts in all districts," he said — a possible reference to the Shiite militias and their stronghold of Sadr City.

In other developments:

·In southern Iraq, British and Iraqi security forces closed two crossings on the Iranian border at Sheeb and Shalamcha and expanded coastal patrols to monitor maritime traffic into southern Iraq.

·Authorities also set up checkpoints ringing Basra, Iraq's second-largest city and the commercial hub of the Shiite-dominated south. The British military said the operation would last for 72 hours.

·Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said in a statement that he believes that radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr has ordered leaders of his Mahdi Army militia to leave Iraq.

There continued to be conflicting reports about al-Sadr's whereabouts. On Tuesday, a spokesman for al-Sadr disputed the U.S. military's claim that he was in Iran.

Baghdad Crackdown Underway (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

BAGHDAD — It was just after lunch Thursday when the "surge" arrived at Haidar Karam's doorstep.

Out of nowhere, about 50 U.S. troops appeared and circled his northeast Baghdad neighborhood. Half a dozen Humvees arrived 15 minutes later. Snipers took up positions on rooftops. Troops stopped vehicles from moving.

They were the leading edge of a Baghdad security plan called Operation Law and Order, part of what the Bush administration has dubbed a "surge" in U.S. troops in Iraq.

After weeks of delay, the promised crackdown and troop increase were boldly evident Thursday during an hours-long tour of neighborhoods throughout the war-weary capital of 6 million people, where sectarian fighting kills an average of 100 residents a day.

A U.S. officer approached Karam, handing the government clerk a piece of paper with a phone number and an e-mail address to contact authorities if there was any trouble in his Shiite-dominated Shaab neighborhood.

He told Karam through an interpreter that American and Iraqi forces were going to secure the neighborhood. They were going to install a one-megawatt power generator.

"I told him, 'I find that difficult to believe,' " Karam said. "Our government always lies to us."

At that, the U.S. officer laughed, Karam said.

"We will prove it to you!" he said the American told him.

U.S. and Iraqi forces conducted raids, searched abandoned buildings and patrolled neighborhoods as part of the security plan, which officially began Tuesday evening.

At least 3,000 additional U.S. troops and about 2,000 Iraqi counterparts have arrived so far.

Despite the crackdown, authorities discovered the bodies of at least 20 men shot dead and dumped in west Baghdad. Dozens were killed or found slain around the country.

Troops to stick around

Under the security plan, units of U.S. and Iraqi forces will attempt to clear neighborhoods of unauthorized weapons and insurgents. They will stay rather than returning to base, in an attempt to halt spiraling sectarian warfare between Shiite Muslim and Sunni Arab gunmen, lure residents back to their homes and rebuild the economy.

"We are establishing a stronger presence throughout the city," said U.S. Army Maj. Steven F. Lamb, a spokesman for American forces in Baghdad. "We're going to have a 24-hour presence, which is going to stem the sectarian violence. All available troops that we can have on the street are on the streets."

On Thursday, U.S. forces often found themselves back at the small bases they used in the early months after the 2003 invasion. The facilities were abandoned as U.S. commanders under the direction of Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. decided to lower the American profile in neighborhoods and hand security over to Iraqi forces.

Since then, a once-vibrant Baghdad has become a forbidding maze of concrete walls and concertina wire roamed by mysterious gunmen, where petrified residents rush to their homes before dark.

The Dora district in south Baghdad was among the first neighborhoods targeted by the security plan. With Humvees and armored vehicles protected by aircraft, U.S. troops swept in Wednesday, setting off stun grenades before storming houses in search of insurgents.

By Thursday morning, explosions were shaking the district and security forces at newly established checkpoints had begun searching cars.

"Just four days ago, gunmen never stopped attacking checkpoints and firing at the Iraqi army," said journalist Ghesan Jabouri, a Dora resident. "Now that's all over."

Still, two car bombs killed at least four Iraqis and injured 20 in Dora, and by midafternoon the district's bullet-scarred main streets testified to the enormous challenges facing U.S. and Iraqi forces. Many of the closed shops were painted with an encircled X, a warning by insurgents not to reopen. Jittery Iraqi soldiers at a checkpoint stood guard, waving past the smattering of drivers braving the streets.

In nearby Sadiya, a violent Sunni neighborhood, U.S. troops stood near the kitchen of a home and watched Iraqi counterparts search the modest single-story house for weapons.

"What, grandma?" an Iraqi soldier joked to the family's matriarch, a woman in her 70s. "Don't you have any rocket-propelled grenades or roadside bombs?"

"No, son," she replied, laughing. "What would we do with such cursed things?"

The soldiers seized a handgun but let her family keep an AK-47.

DOJ_NMG_0132991

Numerous checkpoints staffed by Iraqi soldiers and police directed the sparse traffic.

"We are very motivated," said a burly young Iraqi army lieutenant standing guard on the outskirts of the Yarmouk district downtown. "This security plan is a significant turn of events."

Streams of unmarked white SUVs filled with masked security officers pointing assault rifles at motorists passed by. Blue-and-white police pickups with makeshift plates of armor slapped to the sides kicked up dust and exhaust as they sped past motorists.

The heavy police and army presence, as well as the advance publicity, may have scared off many of the gunmen. Few shops were open, and traffic was scant along the once-glittery 14th Ramadan Street in the Mansour district of west Baghdad, the site of frequent battles over checkpoints between insurgents and security forces.

Insurgents expected back

U.S. and Iraqi officials think the initial shock of the plan will wear off and the insurgents will be back.

"That's a common issue that you have to deal with in any combat environment," Lamb said. "They're going to evaluate what we're doing and adjust to it, just as we have to evaluate what they're doing and adjust to it."

Iraqi troops, often criticized for lax responses, appeared to move more aggressively. Their Humvees were arrayed along the main road through the Kadhimiya district. Two truckloads of soldiers wound their way along a narrow street in the Adhamiya neighborhood. A soldier wearing a purple bandana grinned as he manned a .50-caliber machine gun and gestured for vehicles to stop.

The situation was similar in neighborhoods of every sect and economic class.

Security forces also sealed off Sadr City, the Shiite district that is the power base of the Al Mahdi militia. Even so, a car bomb there killed three people and injured 25.

U.S. officials say that unlike previous efforts, the security crackdown has the support of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's government, which had blocked American efforts to target certain individuals and neighborhoods.

Raids in the last two days targeted the Baratha mosque, the base of a powerful Shiite politician, the Hillah offices of a local leader of Maliki's Dawa Party, and an office of radical cleric Muqtada Sadr's movement in Hillah.

In the southern city of Basra, officials launched a simultaneous security crackdown and sealed the nearby borders with Iran, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. One British soldier was killed and another injured during attacks on checkpoints west of Basra.

A U.S. Marine died in western Iraq on Wednesday, where 4,000 of the 21,500 additional U.S. troops being added for the security plan will be deployed by May.

U.S. officials, including President Bush, have urged patience in measuring results of the crackdown.

Six weeks ago, U.S. forces converted nine abandoned homes into a small military base in the once-leafy west Baghdad neighborhood of Ghazaliya.

"The first two weeks after the base was completed were really calm," said the owner of an electrical shop in the neighborhood who asked not to be identified.

But Sunni and Shiite gangs soon resumed attacking each other, he said. Shiites burned down a cherished library adjacent to a Sunni mosque. Sunnis responded with a killing spree.

"U.S. troops never did anything," the resident said. "I do not know what will happen, or whether this plan to secure Baghdad will succeed…. It seems like someone is always trying to make sure it doesn't."

Dispute Over Iraqi Cleric, Said To Have Gone To Iran (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 15 — Questions and accusations continued to swirl about the whereabouts of the militant Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr on Thursday, and American and Iraqi forces deepened their security push in Baghdad.

An Interior Ministry official said that the Iraqi police had wounded Abu Ayyub al-Masri, the leader of the terrorist group Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, and killed his top aide in a gun battle near Balad, in Diyala Province. But there were no further details, including whether Mr. Masri had been captured or how it was known he had been wounded, and the United States military declined to comment on the report.

Two Shiite leaders stepped forward on Thursday to confirm American reports this week that Mr. Sadr had gone to Iran.

But the two, a senior official in Mr. Sadr's organization who spoke on condition of anonymity, and Sami al-Askari, a Parliament member from a different Shiite party, took exception with suggestions that he had fled because of a crackdown on militias and had permanently moved to Iran. They said that the cleric often visited the country and that it was unclear why he had left or when he would come back; the Sadr official said he could return to Iraq on Friday.

In a sign of how volatile the topic has become, several of the cleric's aides continued their vehement denials that he had left at all, and accused the Americans of a propaganda campaign to paint him as a coward. "This is an American lie that aims to get information about the whereabouts of Sadr in any way possible," said Abdul Razzaq al-Nadawi, a top Sadr aide, in an interview on Al Arabiya. "Through this they can accomplish two things: the first is that either Sadr shows up on TV and announces that he is here, and in this case they can make sure that he is in Najaf, Iraq. If he doesn't show up they will also have achieved something, by depicting Sadr as a coward who fled to Iran fearing for his life."

For his part, Mr. Askari said he did not understand why either the Americans or Mr. Sadr's group were making such a fuss. The cleric has frequently traveled to Iran, he said, and rarely appears in public even when he is in Iraq. "I don't know why the Sadrists are denying that Moktada al-Sadr has left," he said. "Maybe because of the provocative statements by the Americans."

The American military has not divulged its motivation for highlighting Mr. Sadr's purported absence. Senior White House officials said that they believed that Mr. Sadr left several weeks ago and that it was unclear what led him to go. If he actually did leave, it is now unclear whether he could come back: the Iraqi government said Thursday that it had closed its borders with Syria and Iran as part of the new security plan.

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, a Shiite who owes much of his political rise to early support from Mr. Sadr, has struggled under recent pressure to show progress in reining in the militias. United States officials insist that the Mahdi Army and other Shiite militias have been taking a bigger role in attacking American troops, sometimes with help from Iranian materials and expertise. Meanwhile, Sadr loyalists portray themselves as nationalists, legitimate partners of the Shiite-led government, and the only capable defenders of Shiite families from attack by Sunni Arab groups.

The report on Thursday about the wounding of the Qaeda leader in Iraq came after the official, Maj. Gen. Hussein Ali Kamal, the deputy interior minister, had canceled a scheduled news conference. In making the announcement, General Kamal said he had no further information.

Mr. Masri was identified as the new leader of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia last summer, after the terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed in June. Mr. Masri, an Egyptian who said he was a founding member of the group, has been the subject of speculation before. On Oct. 5, news reports suggested that he had been killed. A month later, an audio recording surfaced with a voice attributed to Mr. Masri taunting President Bush.

In Baghdad, the top Iraqi and American commanders for the city — Lt. Gen. Abud Qanbar and Maj. Gen. Joseph F. Fil Jr. — visited a market area in eastern Baghdad recently hit by several car bombs.

In the southern Sunni area of Dora, gunshots and mortar fire rang out all morning as American troops set up tanks on corners and surrounded parts of the neighborhood, residents said. In the northeastern Shiite districts of Shaab, Ur and Bayda, American troops with Iraqi policemen continued to search homes for weapons. About 300 Iraqi security forces worked in the area with 2,500 American troops, said Col. Steve Townsend, the commander of the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team.

For the second day of their sweep, American troops found almost no resistance, instead mostly encountering compliant residents and children begging for attention. In the afternoon, some troops decided to cruise through nearby Sadr City. From the hatch of a 19-ton Stryker armored vehicle, the district appeared far less friendly than the three nearby neighborhoods had. There were lots of antagonistic hand gestures, hard stares and grimaces from young men.

About an hour later, near a restaurant in Sadr City, six people were killed when a minibus exploded outside a popular restaurant. With American troops on the neighborhood's edges and Iraqi forces inside, witnesses said that the heightened security presence helped evacuate bombing victims more quickly.

Salaam Sabri, 35, a microbus driver who ran to the scene after hearing the explosion, said that police cars and army vehicles were hauling bodies to the hospital while policemen and soldiers searched cars and pedestrians for signs of who might be responsible for the attack.

"It wasn't like before," he said. "They surrounded the area and they checked all the cars and all the people walking by."

Two car bombs exploded in Dora just after 1 p.m., killing four Iraqi civilians not far from where American tanks gathered on corners. Twenty bodies were found in Baghdad on Thursday, an Interior Ministry official said. At least one was headless, according to a hospital official.

A sniper killed an Iraqi Army soldier in the Sunni area of Adhamiya, an Interior Ministry official said. An Iraqi police commando was also killed by gunfire in the Amil neighborhood, another Sunni area.

In another Sunni district, the Jamaa neighborhood of western Baghdad, a car packed with explosives blew up near an Iraqi patrol, wounding two soldiers. The United States military said in a statement that a marine was killed Wednesday during combat in Anbar Province.

A missile or mortar round hit a building just across the Tigris River from the Green Zone, wounding two people, including an American Embassy contractor, said Louis J. Fintor, an embassy spokesman.

Iraq Troop Boost Erodes Readiness, General Says (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

Outgoing Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker said yesterday that the increase of 17,500 Army combat troops in Iraq represents only the "tip of the iceberg" and will potentially require thousands of additional support troops and trainers, as well as equipment -- further eroding the Army's readiness to respond to other world contingencies.

Although final decisions on deployments have not been made, Schoomaker said, U.S. commanders in Iraq have requested an additional 2,500 soldiers to serve as embedded trainers for Iraqi forces, and 5,000 to 6,000 additional soldiers could be needed to provide logistical and other support to the five Army combat brigades flowing into Baghdad.

"We are having to go to some extraordinary measures to ensure we can respond," he said, but he added that even then he could not guarantee the combat units would receive all the translators, civil affairs soldiers and other support troops they request. "We are continuing today to get requests for forces that continue to stress us."

Schoomaker, in one of his last congressional testimonies as Army chief, also made it clear that he had raised concerns in advance about President Bush's plan to increase troops in Iraq because it would further deplete Army units at home.

"We laid out . . . exactly what the risks are in terms of other contingencies . . . to include my concerns about the lack of adequate dwell time," he said, referring to the fact that active-duty soldiers now spend only about a year at home between 12-month war zone rotations.

Schoomaker noted that Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, was "obligated to present any dissenting opinions and he did that, as did we," in discussions on the troop increase with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and the president. Still, Schoomaker added that "our mission now is to support the commander in chief."

Virtually all of the U.S.-based Army combat brigades are rated as unready to deploy, Army officials say, and to meet the immediate needs in Iraq and Afghanistan they are finding it necessary to transfer personnel and gear to those units now first in line to deploy.

"I am not satisfied with the readiness of our non-deployed forces," Schoomaker told the Senate Armed Services Committee, noting that the increased demands in Iraq and Afghanistan "aggravate that" and increase his concern. "We are in a dangerous period," said Schoomaker, adding that he recently met with his Chinese counterpart, who made it clear that China is scrutinizing U.S. capabilities.

The Marine Corps commandant, Gen. James T. Conway, said in the same hearing that his chief concern is that Marines are not training for other types of conflicts beyond the insurgencies in Iraq and Afghanistan -- such as conventional ground wars. "My largest concern has to do with training," he said. "We're not doing amphibious training, we're not doing mountain training," as well as some large-scale exercises, he said.

About 40 percent of Army and Marine Corps equipment is now in Iraq or Afghanistan or undergoing repair or maintenance. To outfit the additional forces for Iraq and Afghanistan, the Army is drawing gear from prepositioned stocks of armored Humvees, tanks and other major equipment that would not then be available for another conflict, Conway said.

Schoomaker stressed the ongoing need for funding to repair, replace and upgrade Army equipment, criticizing funding shortfalls in 2005 and 2006 that forced layoffs and slowdowns in production at Army repair depots.

Even if the United States were to carry out a significant troop reduction in Iraq, Schoomaker said he would advise going ahead with the Army's plan for a permanent increase of 65,000 active-duty soldiers by 2013. "The Army's too small for the century we're in," he said.

House Call (WSJ)

By Martin Peretz

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

Our political imagination of evil is impoverished, and nowhere is it more impoverished than in Iraq. Even today, when the blood of innocents flows so richly and regularly, we do not seem to grasp its origins, or its power. That is, we do not seem to grasp the centrality, and the perdurability, of culture. And in this regard, the president and his party, as well as the Democratic Party, are equally blinded by their respective orthodoxies.

When the administration took us into Iraq, it was in transports of universalism, as all democratizers must be. All that it wished to know is that people, all people, people everywhere, yearn for liberty and for a fair state. This was not the traditional Republican view of these matters, and it took some courage for George W. Bush to buck the cynical and cynically elitist view of his father and James Baker that arrangements can always be made with dictators, and satisfactory arrangements at that. It was actually refreshing to hear this Four Freedoms trace of Franklin Roosevelt from the smug Grand Old Party, although we had already heard it once before from its slightly dopey but truth-seeing president, Ronald Reagan. All men and women want to be free, Mr. Bush said, and Iraqis too.

The problem is that this belief, which is probably true, is not all we need to know. Whatever people want, they want in their particularity. General aspirations are always locally inflected, sometimes to the vanishing point. The people we set out to liberate were not just human beings, they were also Arabs, and Muslims; and more particularly, they were Shia Muslims and Sunni Muslims, and Kurdish Muslims as well. We did not invade only an enslaved country, we invaded also an ethnos, a religion, a culture -- none of which have been historically (and frankly philosophically) receptive to the great blessing that we wished to confer. The president's belief in the omnipotence of the American military -- that it can outsmart and outfight militias that butcher indiscriminately -- only confirmed him in his sense that the persistence of cultural and sectarian hatreds would be no problem, that a 1,300-year-old fact of culture and religion could be effectively overcome by a new doctrine of counterinsurgency.

The Democratic opposition went through a similar process, but in the reverse. It is true that liberals are keenly aware of difference, and lovingly celebrate difference. That is what multiculturalism is about, and moving towards open borders too. But they do not like to see the virulence of diversity -- the historical persistence of the enmity of one element of the crazy quilt for the other, even one seemingly quite akin to the other. The liberal appreciation of the hateful dimensions of tribal and clannish identity generally extended no further than the blood rituals of "The Sopranos." Now they are so much wiser, and sagely lecture everyone within earshot about the permanent hatreds between Sunni and Shia, although their House chairman of intelligence oversight had not the foggiest notion of who was in discord and what the discord was about. In any case, they counsel smugness, since none of these inter- and intra-sectarian hostilities will ever come to our shores.

Where, then, are we in the war? No one knows exactly what to do about it. Everybody knows that we are in trouble. Even those of us who are skeptical about the ideological inclinations of many Democrats cannot but dignify the national anxiety that they represent. The House is now debating a nonbinding resolution supporting our troops already in Iraq and disapproving the dispatch of 20,000 more. The debate is, strategically speaking, pointless: The new troops are already on their way. The Senate will figure out how to make its own sense of the politically fraught perplexity. Now, both houses of Congress are perfectly entitled to debate anything of this magnitude. Indeed, they have a responsibility to do so. A war should not shut down free opinion, or -- worse yet -- informed opinion. So the attempt of the House minority leader, John Boehner, to scare them away from a serious debate with demagogic references to the American Revolution is unseemly. This is a weighty war, very weighty. The absence of a serious debate about its ends and its means would rightly earn the national legislature the contempt of all Americans.

But the formula that the House Democratic leadership has fixed on is a charade. It allows each of the 435 representatives five minutes at the podium, enough for them to posture for local television but not so much that anybody can say anything serious, let alone deep or even brave. And the resolution's text itself is rather cowardly. For, since it purports to be a declaration of support for American soldiers actually fighting in Iraq -- whatever "support" actually means -- why does it criticize the only help that can possibly enable the military in the war: more soldiers and more weapons? And, if the Democrats do not want the war to be continued, then they should bring forth legislation either cutting funds or setting a date for withdrawal, in the manner of George McGovern. There is no rationale for troops in terrible danger to be held hostage to the political expediency of nervous Democrats, who are not prepared to do what they really mean to do and to say what they really mean to say.

Only one resolution is being debated on the House floor, and no amendments will be permitted. Not quite a debate, is it? One sees in Nancy Pelosi's iron-fisted eagerness to get everyone into line a measure of her years in the wilderness. She will have her way. And the political hothouse is even more torrid in the Senate. There, after all, sit the candidates for president. One would think that, given the threat to her nomination posed by Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton would be more flexible in her views on the war. Her insistence on not saying that she had made a "mistake" in voting for the 2003 deployment of troops to Iraq puts her out of the center of gravity of her party. Mr. Obama has set the tone and the pace for the Democrats, and he has the advantage of having been clearly antiwar from the beginning. I suspect that almost all Democrat aspirants will end up imitating him. Why won't Mrs. Clinton capitulate to Democratic orthodoxy that the war was always a "mistake"? Out of pride, of course: Hillary Clinton doesn't make mistakes. Only other people do, and especially George Bush.

Senate Democrats are also making sure that no real debate will be held in that body. But, in a certain material sense, the Senate has already approved the administration's enhanced strategy in the war by confirming Gen. David Petraeus's appointment as the U.S. commander in Iraq. Whose strategy do the Democrats imagine our soldiers will be following? If they didn't want this strategy and they didn't want to continue the war, they should have turned him down. That would have been a real message, and a true one.

But the Democrats want it both ways. One of the tropes of many Democratic critics of the war is that, in going to war in Iraq, we squandered our near-victory in Afghanistan. The defeat of the Taliban was actually exhilarating, what with women out in the streets with normal clothes they wanted to wear and children even playing musical instruments. But the enthusiasm of the Democrat Party for Afghanistan is rooted in the fact that Afghanistan is not a strategic asset for the West. It is only a moral triumph. The Democrats prefer to look away from the colder long-term calculations of American and Western interests in the Middle East. We need more than moral triumphs there. We need strategic triumphs. If Iraq turns out not to be the latter sort of triumph, it will be remembered as one of the most momentous blunders in our history.

I think the odds against us are huge. One reason is that Iraq is neither a state that coheres nor a society that coheres. Its civil society, if that is what it is, is not quite a civilized society. The carnage between Shia and Sunni, and the carnage among other religious and ethnic communions, since the end of Ottoman rule have left deep and bloodied breaches in Iraq. If these cannot be repaired, it will be a huge defeat for George Bush -- and, whatever many liberals think of it, for liberalism as well.

Out Of Stricken Baghdad, Into Uncertainty (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher

The Christian Science Monitor, February 16, 2007

AMMAN, JORDAN

A mortar tumbled out of the sky and onto the Baghdad elementary school. Two of their three children were inside. The girls escaped, panicked but unharmed. Parents Mayada and Ali Hussein al-Obeidy decided enough was enough. They were getting out of Iraq.

That was six months ago. Since fleeing Adamiyah, a once middle-class area turned nightmare-zone even by Baghdad standards, the Obeidy family has taken shelter in Amman, Jordan. They spend days waiting. Like most Iraqis here, they aren't allowed to work and haven't been able to renew their temporary residency permits that expired months ago.

But they consider themselves fortunate: At least the children are safe and in school. The Jordanian government has said this is the last year it will allow Iraqis to send their children to class. With anywhere from 700,000 to 1 million Iraqi refugees pushing Jordan's already-stretched public services to bursting, the Iraqi presence in Jordan has become – in the words last month of the chief government spokesman – "a burden."

On the wall of their apartment are snapshots of the Obeidy's relatives, some living halfway around the world in Texas. There, the Obeidys have a slew of relatives. Mayada's older brother and mother, both citizens of the US, live in El Paso. They have been trying for several years – and recently, with great intensity – to get her and another brother in Amman to join the rest of the family in America.

They haven't been successful and they are not alone. Only 202 Iraqis were permitted to take refuge in the US in 2006. Since the US-led invasion, 466 Iraqis have been allowed entry to the US as refugees, according to figures given by the State Department at a Senate hearing last month. The numbers are particularly stark in comparison with the scope of a burgeoning refugee problem.

The UN High Commissioner for Refugees estimates that there are some 2 million Iraqi refugees, most in the region, with the numbers in Jordan rivaled only by those in Syria. Add to that number another 1.8 million Iraqis who are internally displaced. During the first half of 2006, the UN says, Iraqis became the largest asylum-seeking nationality in Europe.

US policymakers are gradually waking up to the reality of the scale of the refugee crisis caused by the war, and the likelihood that the numbers of people seeking a haven will increase. Under growing international pressure to do more, this week Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced a task force to enable more refugees to come to the US. The Bush administration this week said it would allow about 7,000 Iraqis into the US this year.

But to the Obeidys, change feels far off. Despite having immediate family members in the US keen to sponsor them, they've made no progress on their two-year attempt to come to America. Mayada's brother, Mustafa Ali, reached at his home in El Paso, said that he was told by the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) that the process could take five to eight years.

"For some reason, no one wants Iraqis in their countries," says Mr. Ali. "We've been suffering long enough. We were hoping we'd get a better life. The INS should process the Iraqi applications more quickly, because their situation is different from any other country. [The US] could make a special effort and arrangement, couldn't they?"

Adjusting to life in limbo

It's getting close to noon on a recent chilly February day at the residency office in Amman, a place through which any foreigner seeking permission to stay in Jordan must pass. Mayada and Ali Hussein are leaving after a long morning in which they, along with hundreds of other Iraqis, sought help in extending their residency permits. Hundreds of thousands (numbers are difficult to pinpoint) are now in Jordan illegally, fearing expulsion.

"The residency office isn't giving us an answer. Not 'yes' and not 'no,' " says Mayada. She looks down at the notepad of the reporter who has come to speak to her and, seeing that her name was misheard as "May," she begins to well up with tears. May was the name of her sister, who was killed when Baghdad was under bombardment by the US military four years ago next month.

Her husband's face locks up, he looks away. So many people have it worse than they do, he says. They are the fortunate ones. They're out. They and the throngs of Iraqi couples walking up and down the hill, looking for solutions.

Jordanians imagine them to be rich. Some are comfortable, but more typical are people like the Obeidys, who were both longtime schoolteachers. She taught primary school, he taught math. He's supposed to be getting an Iraqi pension now. He can't work here, and their money is quickly disappearing.

"If they see you working illegally, they'll throw you out," Ali Hussein says. "We just want to assure our survival. I'm ready to pay to stay here, if they would let us."

"We're spending our savings and we don't know how long it will last," he says. "We don't blame the Jordanians – they don't have so much money. But why doesn't the world help the Jordanians so we can survive?"

When they arrived, Mayada went to the UNHCR and registered as a refugee. However, unless she can prove they are specifically targeted for violence, it's unlikely they'll meet the current standards for asylum here or in most Western countries.

She displays the card, which has yet to be of much use to the family, and shrugs. "Does America not know how terrible things are for us?" She asks the question with a quiet calm, as if genuinely unsure of whether people in the US are aware of the scale of the carnage in Iraq. "Why are we allowed to come only to Jordan and Syria? Our situation is just getting worse. If we go back, we will be killed."

In Baghdad they knew several other middle-class families whose children had been kidnapped. They were sure it would happen to them sooner or later.

Before leaving, they invited a poor family who'd been living in a slum to come and stay in their home. Few would pay rent for a home in Adamiyah. And if the Obeidys left the place empty, it would be sure to be taken over by squatters or militant groups.

So began the dynamics of becoming a reluctant refugee: handing over the keys to your house in the hope that one day, they'll be returned in peace. You make a choice: your belongings or your very being. When you leave this way, you really never know when you are coming home again.

The Iraq effect in Jordan

It's afternoon in Jebel Hussein, a busy part of Amman that is so heavily populated with Iraqis that Baghdad-accented Arabic dominates the streets.

Jordanians complain that the influx of Iraqis has driven up real estate prices and the cost of living in general, making it harder to find affordable apartments. At the other end of this resentment, Amman society is buzzing with chatter about the crime rate going up due to the Iraqi refugee population. In the Iraqis' defense, one Jordanian analyst pointed to the fact that Iraqis here are economically trapped: They can spend but they can't earn. Many are getting desperate, and in such circumstances, it wouldn't be surprising for them move into the black market or find other ways to survive.

All of that is to say nothing of the fear that the Sunni-Shiite conflict could spill over into Jordan.

Newspapers reported that Shiites here might want to build a Shiite mosque, drawing ire from several Islamic leaders in Jordan, which has always been an almost exclusively Sunni nation.

The Obeidys, who are Sunnis, dislike even talking about the sectarian divide, which they prefer to leave behind. Before 2003 and today, they say, they've always simply been Muslims.

At home, Mayada and Ali Hussein are in a much smaller apartment than the home they had in Baghdad. They spend a lot of time watching TV and then calling people back home to make sure they are OK.

"You hear the news and we know we have friends and family there," says Mayada. "It's in your head all the time. It's not like you take everyone you know out with you. Things are shaky. We're not sure of anything now. Mortars fell yesterday right on the area we lived in."

Five days earlier, a mortar landed on a school just like the one their daughters went to, killing five girls.

The children are confused, unsure of where they'll be attending school next year. The adjustment was rough at first. Other children made fun of their Iraqi accents, but soon enough, they caught to the new dialect. Jordan is a hospitable country. Still, Jordan is not home.

And where is that? The children can't decide. They sit, quiet, and well-behaved, watching "The Biggest Loser," a US reality show about obese Americans competing to lose weight.

What should the family do now? Each child has a different answer.

"Stay here," says Nur, 9.

"Go back to Iraq," answers Mustafa, her fraternal twin brother.

"To America," declares Shams, 13 and slender, and stares back at the TV.

My War Away From War (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0132997

By Ayub Nuri

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

I WILL always remember last Aug. 13 as one of the best days of my life. On that day, after 47 days of waiting, and just four days before classes were to begin at Columbia, where I had received a scholarship, I was granted an American visa. Not only would I be able to fulfill my dream of studying in the United States, but I would also find some peace.

I am an Iraqi, and although I love my country, I needed to get out. I thought the 13-hour flight and the oceans would distance me from the tragic reality of the war. But on my first day in New York, I realized that I had not left the war. Rather, it had followed me here, and I had to fight it every day.

Every time I talked to someone at a party, in a taxi or at the store, the same chain of questions would follow after I said I was from Iraq. Some people gaped. Others sat silent for a second, then shook my hand differently. “Wow, so interesting,” they would say. “So what do you think of the whole situation? What went wrong over there?” Finally, the inevitable: “Do you think we should pull out?”

At school happy hours, while everyone was socializing and enjoying their drinks, I found myself having to explain the insurgency, the sectarian violence and what I thought would happen if American troops withdrew from Iraq. That was the question that troubled me most.

To me, it sounded like a question that only the defense secretary should be contemplating. Did people here feel entitled to ask it because they had voted for this government, and they therefore felt responsible for their government’s policies? I decided to think this was the reason, and it consoled me.

Soon, there was another question that began to trouble me. It mostly came from Arabs or other Muslims I encountered. “Who is behind these killings?” they would ask.

“It is difficult to point to a specific group,” I would tell them. “But most of the killings are perpetrated by Iraqis themselves, Shiites and Sunnis. I have witnessed it with my own eyes.”

But they were never satisfied with my answers. Most of them blamed America for everything. I agree that the American army is part of the problem, but Iraqi militias are now responsible for most of the killings.

Explaining the complexity of the situation in Iraq to everyone I met made me tired, and after a while I did not enjoy meeting people anymore. I stopped going to happy hour. I wished I could have a conversation about a different subject — American history or the American electoral system — but it rarely happened.

I realize now that there simply is no way for me to escape the bitterness of this war. It has become part of my life. One night, after a dinner party with some classmates, I turned on my computer to read my e-mail messages. The first message I opened was from Iraq. It carried the news of the death of a dear friend of mine. He was killed by a car bomb in Baghdad. I cried most of the night. A few days later I erased his e-mail address from my address book.

A month later, my phone rang very early in the morning. The voice on the other end told me that another close friend — a reporter in Ramadi — was killed while covering a story in Baghdad. I mourned alone in my apartment.

I slept very well my first two nights in New York and had no dreams, but I think it was because of the jetlag. The rest of my nights have been full of dreams and nightmares.

In one dream I am stuck in Falluja and I can’t get out. I am on the ledge of a high wall that separates the American soldiers from insurgents. They both see me and are ready to shoot.

In another dream I am kidnapped by the Iraqi Army and thrown into a dungeon with a foreign reporter. In yet another, I go to Baghdad and find the streets empty. There are only roofless houses and ruined walls.

When I wake up, I remember that I am in New York City, and I feel at peace. But that little escape from the nightmare of the war does not last long. At some point during the day I will have to give another war lecture. No matter how I perceive the war, no matter how many more friends I lose, no matter who is killing whom, as long as there is a war, I have to live with its nightmares and fight them thousands of miles away.

Marines Honor 100 Who Sacrificed Their Lives (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

CAMP PENDLETON — In a ceremony filled with tears and expressions of pride, 100 members of the Regimental Combat Team 5 killed during the recent deployment in Iraq were remembered Thursday as among "the finest young men our nation has ever produced."

Col. Larry Nicholson, the regiment's commanding officer, said the 100 were part of the "newest greatest generation" who answered their nation's call after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

"The fact is that Iraq is a better and safer place because of the services and sacrifices made by the Marines, sailors and soldiers" of the 5th regiment, Nicholson told the hundreds of Marines and dozens of family members assembled for the memorial.

It was a day when the sprawling base was filled with Iraq-related activity: In one area, combat Marines were being trained for deployment; in another, 300 Marines returned from Iraq to a joyous greeting from family members; and, in a courtroom, a sentencing hearing was underway for Lance Cpl. Robert Pennington, who confessed to conspiracy and kidnapping in the death of an unarmed Iraqi man.

The memorial service was held on a parade ground near the headquarters of the regiment, known as the "fighting fifth," the most heavily decorated regiment in the Marine Corps. The 5th was the first unit across the Line of Departure into Iraq when the assault on Baghdad began nearly four years ago; for its latest deployment, it was assigned to Al Anbar Province, the heart of the Sunni insurgency.

Breaking with a Marine tradition that says Marines from the "old corps" were the toughest ever, Nicholson said that Marines of the past "are no match for the caliber of the Marines of today." As their commander, each death was a "numbing" experience, said Nicholson, who was himself severely wounded in a previous deployment to Iraq.

Each of the names was read solemnly, to the accompaniment of a tolling bell. For each name a Marine marched toward a row of inverted rifles and placed a dog tag on them. There were 13 inverted M-16s, each representing a battalion or company that made up the regiment.

The reading of the names took nearly 20 minutes. Among the dead were 91 Marines, 7 soldiers and 2 Navy corpsmen. The most common rank was a Marine lance corporal.

Family members, some of whom had traveled across the country for the ceremony, listened and wept and, when the ceremony was over, talked of their grief but also their pride in their family member's military service.

"I feel our family is broken," said Madeline Buerstetta, mother of Lance Cpl. Richard Allen Buerstetta, 20, killed Oct. 23. "We're missing a part, and the hurt won't stop."

With tears streaming down her cheeks, Buerstetta explained how her son, a reservist, was killed in a roadside bomb explosion that ripped apart his Humvee, also killing another Marine and injuring a third.

"He died doing something he loved," she said. "He was a Marine's Marine."

Buerstetta's father, Paul, a healthcare consultant in Tennessee, said he has trouble coping with the fact that "many people don't seem to realize there is a war going on, that young men are dying for them. Every day is hard."

Some of the 100 were on their second or third tours in Iraq. Others were on their first.

"He was only there 18 days and he was blown up," said K'Ann Hines of Ventura, mother of Lance Cpl. Joshua Hines, 26, killed Oct. 25 by a roadside bomb while on foot patrol.

Hines is survived by his parents, his wife and their son, Rylie, born just eight weeks before Hines was killed. "People should remember my son's smile," his mother said. "He'd do anything for anyone. He even put his life down for his buddies."

During the ceremony, regimental Sgt. Major Melvin Roundtree quoted from John 15:12-13: "This is my commandment: Love one another as I have loved you. There is no greater love than this: To lay down one's life for one's friends."

Lance Cpl. Lucas Bell, 22, still recuperating from a gunshot that shattered his femur, came to show respect for Marines from his unit, a reserve group from the Midwest. He was evacuated after being wounded Dec. 7 and remains on crutches.

"For me, it was the first time I was able to mourn for my brothers," said Bell, his eyes red-rimmed. "It was good to get it off my chest. It was beautiful."

Madeline Buerstetta said she prays daily for the Marines still in Iraq.

"They're men, but to me they'll always be boys, my boys," she said as her husband tried to comfort her.

A Higher Calling Than Duty (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

"WHY I joined: The question has been asked of me so many times in so many different contexts that I thought it would be best if I wrote my reasons for joining the Army on my page for all to see."

Oct. 29, 2006. On the night before he deployed to Iraq, Army 2nd Lt. Mark Jennings Daily sat down at his laptop in his Texas apartment and began tapping out an essay for his MySpace Web page. Daily, a 23-year-old Irvine native who considered himself a liberal humanist, had decided to join the fight despite initial doubts about the war.

Before shipping out, he wanted to explain why.

DOJ_NMG_0132999

The decision had befuddled some. After all, Daily was a UCLA political science graduate with a wide circle of friends and dreams of becoming a senator, or a history professor, or a foreign correspondent. Why join the Army?

His essay would turn out to be a last testament to one soldier's courage and convictions.

And that essay, in recent weeks, has ricocheted throughout the Internet, taking on a life of its own. It was read on the U.S. Senate floor and posted on the websites of columnists and talk show hosts. It has prompted hundreds of letters from strangers. Daily's words, his astonished parents say, seemed to resonate with all kinds of folks, stirring a common altruistic impulse.

He wrote it in just 20 minutes, his parents say, as he chatted with his family in his packed-up El Paso apartment near Ft. Bliss, Texas, where he was assigned to the 2nd Squadron, 7th Cavalry Regiment, 4th Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division.

"First, the more accurate question is why I volunteered to go to Iraq. After all, I joined the Army a week after we declared war on Saddam's government with the intention of going…. "

Daily's parents, John and Linda Daily of Irvine, didn't particularly want to see their eldest son ship out to Iraq. They would never tell him that directly. They respected their children too much to try to interfere.

"If not me, then who?" Linda Daily remembers her son asking, his earnest eyes leaving her with no good answer.

So the Dailys did what they believed parents should do: They embraced their son, affirmed his decision and sent him off, shielding as best they could their fears and doubts. His wife of just three months, Janet, did the same.

"Anyone who knew me before I joined knows that I am quite aware and at times sympathetic to the arguments against the war in Iraq. If you think the only way a person could bring themselves to volunteer for this war is through sheer desperation or blind obedience then consider me the exception."

Mark Daily, born on the Fourth of July, grew up in Irvine's Woodbridge Village, on a street of spacious homes and well-manicured lawns. His father, John, is an aerospace project manager; his mother, Linda, an audiologist.

His family says he became a registered Democrat who read voraciously and delighted in fervent debate. He read liberal intellectual Noam Chomsky, conservative Sen. John McCain of Arizona and everything in between.

His first passions were animal rights and environmental protection, prompting him to become a vegetarian and Green Party member in high school for a few years. He defended American Indian rights so loudly in one backyard debate that Linda Daily imagined the neighbors would think it a family brawl. His heroes were immigrants because "they risk their lives to achieve better ones," he wrote on his MySpace page.

Fascism and anti-Semitism particularly troubled him. If you really want to understand me, he wrote on MySpace, watch "Schindler's List."

He sought out neo-Nazis for online debates. In a string of e-mails, Daily invited one young man who featured swastikas on his MySpace page to explain his sentiments. After a wide-ranging discussion over German history, the Holocaust, African DNA, North Korean fascism and democratic values, Daily turned the Nazi lover around. "I think most certainly a lot, if not all of my beliefs have changed," the young man wrote. Daily, he said, was right. "Nothing was ever created with a system of hate."

After the 9/11 attacks, Daily was not convinced that a military response was the best option. In his MySpace essay, he runs through the gamut of reasons he used at one time or another to argue against confronting the Taliban and Saddam Hussein: cultural tolerance, the sanctity of national sovereignty, a suspicion of America's intentions. Weren't we really after their oil? he wondered.

Somewhere along the way, he changed his mind. His family says there was no epiphany. Writings by author and columnist Christopher Hitchens on the moral case for war deeply influenced him. A 2003 phone conversation with a UCLA ROTC officer on the ideals of commitment and service impressed him.

Ultimately, his family says, Daily came to believe that his lifelong altruistic impulses and passions for the underdog had to extend to Iraqis crushed under decades of oppression. It was time to stop simply talking about human rights and actually do something to help secure them.

And he decided that joining the Army was the best way to do that.

One thing is certain, as disagreeable or as confusing as my decision to enter the fray may be, consider what peace vigils against genocide have accomplished lately. Consider that there are 19-year-old soldiers from the Midwest who have never touched a college campus or a protest who have done more to uphold the universal legitimacy of representative government and individual rights by placing themselves between Iraqi voting lines and homicidal religious fanatics. Oftentimes it is less about how clean your actions are and more about how pure your intentions are.

Daily had read historian Stephen Ambrose's writings on World War II and the generation of soldiers who fought for freedom from the forces of fascism. If not Iraq, Daily thought, he wanted to help save those being slaughtered in Sudan.

In the fall of 2003, he entered the UCLA ROTC program. The UCLA military science faculty selected Daily as cadet of the year for 2005. He was named a Distinguished Military Graduate, an honor given to 20% of cadets nationwide.

Lt. Col. Shawn Buck, who headed the UCLA military science department at the time, said Daily was a deep thinker and natural leader who persuaded many cadets to stick with the program. "Once he made the decision to join, he jumped in with both feet and gave it everything he had," Buck said.

In a 2005 videotape of his officers' commissioning ceremony, Daily told the crowd that the U.S. Army is one of the few militaries in the world that teach not only tactics but also ethics. "I genuinely believe the United States Army is a force of good in this world," he said.

He was not blind to military transgressions and fumed to his father that the abuse of Iraqi prisoners by U.S. soldiers at Abu Ghraib was a failure of leadership. But that was exactly why he needed to get over there, he said. He was going to make sure that his men upheld Army values of integrity and honor.

So that is why I joined. In the time it took you to read this explanation, innocent people your age have suffered under the crushing misery of tyranny.

Don't forget that human beings have a responsibility to one another and that Americans have a responsibility to the oppressed. Assisting a formerly oppressed population in converting their torn society into a plural, democratic one is dangerous and difficult business, especially when being attacked and sabotaged from literally every direction.

So if you have anything to say to me at the end of this reading, let it at least include "Good Luck."

Daily touched down in Iraq on Nov. 19 and was sent to the northern city of Mosul. In calls and e-mails home, he began asking for presents for his new Iraqi friends: cigars for the soldiers, candy and soccer balls for the children. He vividly described his adventures with them: a Thanksgiving Day game of musical chairs, a rooftop cigar session; his first Kurdish meal, his first local haircut.

In one video he sent, Iraqi soldiers surround him with grins, crowning him with a turban as a gesture of friendship.

In typical fashion, he sought out new points of view. In one discussion, he wrote that he asked a Kurdish man whether the insurgents could be viewed as freedom fighters. The man cut him off. "The difference between insurgents and American soldiers," Daily said the man told him, "is that they get paid to take life — to murder — and you get paid to save lives."

"That Kurdish man's assessment of our presence means more to me than all of the naysayers and makeshift humanists that monopolize our interpretation of this war," Daily wrote in a Dec. 31 e-mail.

He was equally expansive with his troops. His wife, Janet, says he was constantly asking for tea bags so he could invite his soldiers to his room for tea and talk. They asked him for advice about careers, finances and family problems, discussed politics and philosophy. His troops jokingly posted a sign on his door: "Mark's Tea Hour."

In January, Daily was transferred from a support operation to a security one. He told his family that if he should die, he would never regret a thing.

In an e-mail to his brother, Eric, Daily wrote: "I know it is hard for you knowing that I am over here in danger, but never forget that I came here on behalf of the countless brothers who were torn apart by the savage exploits of this region's tyrants."

On Jan. 14, the family received another e-mail:

"All is well. More war stories then I can fit in this e-mail. Having the time of my life!"

It was his last e-mail.

The next day, Jan. 15, Daily was killed when a roadside bomb detonated beneath his vehicle in Mosul. Three of his comrades died with him.

But his words have become a living appeal for his most treasured Army value — selfless service — as it rips through the Internet and reaches unimagined audiences.

U.S. Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) recently read part of the essay on the Senate floor. It has been posted on the websites of syndicated columnist Michelle Malkin and Los Angeles radio talk show hosts Larry Elder and Hugh Hewitt. It has traveled overseas to places as far-flung as Bulgaria, where it is being translated for publication in the local newspapers.

His family has received official letters of condolence from President Bush, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, California First Lady Maria Shriver, senators, congressmen, judges. Most touching to them are the hundreds and hundreds of heartfelt notes from ordinary folk, most of them strangers, who read Daily's essay and wanted to share how it inspired them to serve others.

One woman said she had begun volunteering in a children's cancer hospital. Others have donated to Make-A-Wish-Foundation and other charities in Daily's name. Trees have been planted, scholarships planned.

So many people reached out that the family scrapped plans for a 175-person memorial service and moved it to Mariners Church in Irvine instead. More than 1,600 people attended the Jan. 27 service.

The response has filled the Dailys with a strange mix of grief and pain, mingled with gratitude and awe. All of it, his parents muse, affirms Daily's faith in the decency of people and the value of community.

Which doesn't make his loss any easier to bear.

"I'd give it all back a thousandfold," his father says, "just to hug him one more time."

The Forgotten Families (WP)

By Donna St. George

The Washington Post, February 15, 2007

Her daughter was killed by a bomb in Iraq. Eight months later, Susan Jaenke is both grief-stricken and strapped -- behind on her mortgage, backed up on her bills and shut out of the $100,000 government death benefit that her daughter thought she had left her.

The problem is that Jaenke is not a wife, not a husband, but instead grandmother to the 9-year-old her daughter left behind. "Grandparents," she said, "are forgotten in this."

For the Jaenkes and others like them, the toll of war can be especially complex: They face not only the anguish of losing a son or daughter but also the emotional, legal and financial difficulties of putting the pieces back together for a grandchild.

They confront this without the $100,000 "death gratuity" that military spouses ordinarily get -- a payment intended to ease the financial strain as families await government survivors' benefits.

"It really does get complicated for them," said Joyce Raezer of the National Military Family Association. The load of responsibilities placed on that generation -- both during deployment and if a service member is injured or killed -- "is a huge issue."

The case of Petty Officer 2nd Class Jaime S. Jaenke, a Navy construction-battalion medic killed last June in Anbar province, is particularly striking because she was a single parent who clearly meant to assign her mother the benefit. Jaenke, 29, filled in her mother's name on a form and carefully spelled out her wishes in a letter.

But by law, the $100,000 benefit goes first to a spouse or a child. So 9-year-old Kayla Jaenke collects the $100,000 -- plus $400,000 in life insurance -- after she turns 18, leaving Susan Jaenke to ask, "What about the next nine years?"

In some other families, the $100,000 death benefit has gone to neither the children nor the grandparents who are raising them.

In California, Barbie and Matt Heavrin are caring for a 2-year-old grandson without the death gratuity or life insurance. Their daughter, Pfc. Hannah McKinney, assigned her $400,000 in life insurance to the man she wed just before deployment, her father said; by law, her husband also received the gratuity.

The Heavrins are happy to raise the boy -- from an earlier relationship their daughter had -- but wonder why he would get nothing. Five months after their daughter died last September, their only assistance is monthly benefits they expect will total about $800, most of which goes to day care.

In Missouri, grandmother Gail Kriete is raising 9-year-old Taylor Purdy, the child of Lance Cpl. Erik R. Heldt, a Marine killed in Iraq in June 2005. His wife collected the full $500,000. Kriete said none went to his daughter, from a previous relationship.

"It just needs to be thought out a little more carefully," Kriete said. "There are so many blended families that the suffering is very spread out."

The death gratuity, more than many other benefits, adheres to a strict next-of-kin rule, which Pentagon officials say makes it possible to pay out the $100,000 within a few days. They say that, in the "vast majority of cases," spouses are most in need when paychecks stop.

But there have been thousands of single parents deployed into combat zones since 2001. How many have died at war is unclear, but the Jaenke case shows that, in those cases, the benefit may be at odds with its original intent: to help the grieving family stay afloat when a service member's income suddenly stops.

Susan Jaenke said her family fell behind shortly after Jaime died -- and has never caught up.

Larry Jaenke is a truck driver, and Susan worked as a letter carrier for 23 years until an accident left her disabled. Their daughter Jaime and granddaughter Kayla lived with them. Susan provided child care when Jaime worked, and Jaime contributed to the family income.

Jaime's passion for horses led the Jaenkes to start a business with her on their 10-acre Iowa property. When Susan Jaenke got an insurance settlement from her accident, she put much of it toward building a horse stable on the property, which was Jaime's dream. Jaime -- energetic and skilled with power tools -- did the drywall and flooring.

Not long afterward, Jaime -- a reservist who was an emergency medical technician in her civilian life -- went to war.Unable to Make Ends Meet

It was a June afternoon last year, and the Jaenkes were returning from Kayla's softball game. She had made her team's only hit -- and her first hit ever. In a celebratory mood, they stopped to buy ice cream.

When they pulled into their driveway, the scene was one that no parent of a deployed soldier wants to see: two uniformed Navy men, waiting.

They soon learned that a roadside bomb had exploded near Jaime's Humvee, killing her and a fellow Seabee.

DOJ_NMG_0133002

At the funeral, Kayla stood solemn next to her mother's flag-draped casket, the folded flag laid into her small arms.

Then came the dawning of the family's new reality -- the emotional, the practical, the financial.

There was a lawyer to hire to get legal guardianship. There were survivors' benefits to apply for. There was a trust to set up. There was health insurance to obtain for Kayla. Inexplicably, there was no official will left behind.

For the Jaenkes, the trouble was not that raising Kayla is so expensive but that their entire financial picture shifted with Jaime's death. Jaime's checks immediately stopped. Larry Jaenke was out of work for a time. The family paid $2,800 for a handsome headstone. The stable was still losing money.

Last fall, Susan Jaenke watched as Jaime's pickup truck, and then her car, were repossessed.

The family scraped by, thanks to acts of kindness, Susan Jaenke said. When the Jaenkes' dryer broke, nearby Seabee units stepped up to replace it. The Seabees have come three times to do finishing work on the stable, which Susan Jaenke says she will not give up. Kayla is there all the time, she said, and giving it up would be like losing what is left of Jaime.

The local Veterans of Foreign Wars gave the family a $1,000 Target gift card, which she said made the family's Christmas.

Since October, the Jaenke family has been collecting monthly government benefits for Kayla's care -- $1,700 in all -- but not enough to replace Jaime's contributions. From Iraq, she had been sending home $3,200 a month, her mother said. The child's father, long estranged, does not pay child support, Susan Jaenke said.

The Jaenkes can request money from Kayla's trust for certain expenses related to the girl's "health, education, maintenance and welfare," but the process involves lawyers and court appearances. The court recently agreed to a $200 monthly stipend for the family.

"The court is just very conservative here in Iowa," said Mona Bowden, an attorney for the Jaenkes.Clear Wishes, Clear Rules

Every now and then, Susan Jaenke rereads the letter that Jaime left behind for her:

"I have got all my paperwork done and here is what I did. My big policy [$400,000] goes to Kayla. That has to be put away for when she gets 18. You will know what to do and how to handle it. There is a smaller policy that goes to you. That is for 100,000. That is for you to raise Kayla with and 25,000 goes to the barn. . . . I can't wait to get home to my girl and my horses, so you had better take care of them all."

Patrick J. Palmersheim, executive director of the Iowa Department of Veterans Affairs, explained that the problem came down to the fine print on death gratuities. Jaime had written in her mother's name as beneficiary, but in the same blank the form said "No spouse or child surviving."

Susan Jaenke could be awarded the benefit only if there were no spouse or child to receive it.

The tight regulations are meant to guard against fraud and abuse, said Chief Petty Officer Randy Erdman, the Navy casualty assistance officer who has worked closely with the Jaenke family. "I see the need for the money going to the right spot and being protected," he said, "but at the same time I see what the family needs."

In Washington, Lt. Tommy Crosby, a Navy spokesman, said the Navy "recognizes the significant loss the family has suffered" and has done all it can, within the law, to help.

The death gratuity, created in 1908, originally was equal to six months' pay and was intended to ease financial burdens after a military death.

During the war in Iraq, the gratuity was increased markedly; it had been at $6,000, then grew to $12,000 and finally $100,000. Lawmakers had said the original award seemed offensively low, especially in contrast to the large settlements awarded to families of those killed in the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Still, there was little rethinking about beneficiaries for the $100,000 gratuity, several experts said. To troops, the large lump sum came to resemble life insurance, said Raezer, chief operating officer of the National Military Family Association.

Jaime's handwritten letter and possibly her form suggest she did not realize the gratuity could not go to her mother.

Whether that is because she misunderstood what was said during a benefits briefing or was not advised well is unclear. "They don't always get that kind of counseling that they need," Raezer said.

The problem could have been avoided altogether if Jaime had directed part of her life insurance money, rather than the death gratuity, to her parents.

Steve Strobridge, government relations director of the Military Officers Association of America, said Jaenke's case suggests that the regulations should be reexamined.

"We certainly need to look at whether there needs to be some additional flexibility in who the member can assign the death gratuity to and whether we need to adjust the counseling requirements to help protect people from unintended consequences," he said.

In her three-bedroom house in Iowa, Susan Jaenke said she has been reduced to worrying about grocery money and dreading calls from creditors. "It just hurts bad in so many different directions," she said. "My girl was supposed to come back."

Some days, the whole episode overwhelms her. Three of her four children have served in the Navy, and she said she considers herself "a flag waver." But she gets angry that her daughter's wishes are not being honored and that the family now struggles.

"It's not bad enough that I lost my daughter," she said. "What else do they want me to lose?"

Post Offices Honor Troops (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya And Monica Hortobagyi

USA Today, February 16, 2007

Federal lawmakers are increasingly naming post offices in their states after troops killed in combat, a tribute traditionally reserved for former members of Congress and famous figures such as Bob Hope and Ronald Reagan.

Since 2003, the gesture has honored 26 servicemembers who died in Iraq and Afghanistan: 17 soldiers, seven Marines, a Navy SEAL and an Air National Guardsman.

They include Army Sgt. 1st Class Paul Smith and Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham, both posthumously awarded the Medal of Honor for gallantry in Iraq.

A mail center in Thomaston, Ga., will be renamed in a ceremony in April for hometown postal worker Robert Lee "Bobby" Hollar Jr. He was killed in Iraq by a roadside bomb in 2005 while serving with the Georgia National Guard. "I was ecstatic," says his widow, Amanda Hollar. "He was modest. He didn't like to brag. He didn't expect credit and recognition. … He would really be honored."

Laws naming post offices are the most common U.S. legislation, according to a 2005 Congressional Research Service study.

The 108th Congress (2003-2004) passed 89 such bills — eight that honored troops. The 109th Congress (2005-2006) passed 98 bills — 17 that honored fallen soldiers or Marines. One of the bills honored two servicemembers. Four bills are pending in the current Congress.

"It just seems to be a great way to honor our fallen soldiers back home where people have known them," says Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite, R-Fla., who sponsored two of the laws. "I always give the family time to grieve. At about anywhere from three- to eight-, nine-month period, I will ask them if they believe it would be appropriate to have a post office named after their loved one."

Postal Service guidelines require that a person be deceased for at least 10 years before his or her name is placed on a post office. Congress has ignored the restriction for decades, the Research Service study says.

The laws are easy, inexpensive gestures, the report says.

The name on the outside of the building — commonly a geographical designation — is usually unaffected, says Postal Service spokeswoman Yvonne Yoerger.

The only practical difference is the posting of a plaque explaining the honorary name change in the post office lobby, Yoerger says. Each plaque measures 11 by 14 inches and costs the Postal Service $250 to $500.

Democrats and Republicans alike push the bills.

DOJ:

White House Is Reported To Be Linked To A Dismissal (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15 — A United States attorney in Arkansas who was dismissed from his job last year by the Justice Department was ousted after Harriet E. Miers, the former White House counsel, intervened on behalf of the man who replaced him, according to Congressional aides briefed on the matter.

Ms. Miers, the aides said, phoned an aide to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales suggesting the appointment of J. Timothy Griffin, a former military and civilian prosecutor who was a political director for the Republican National Committee and a deputy to Karl Rove, the White House political adviser.

Later, the incumbent United States attorney, H. E. Cummins III, was removed without explanation and replaced on an interim basis by Mr. Griffin. Officials at the White House and Justice Department declined to comment on Ms. Miers's role in the matter.

Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, said at a hearing last week that Mr. Cummins had done nothing wrong but was removed to make room for Mr. Griffin. It was not known at the time Mr. McNulty testified that Ms. Miers had intervened on Mr. Griffin's behalf.

Her involvement was disclosed on Wednesday by Justice Department officials led by Mr. McNulty, who held a closed-door briefing for senators on the Judiciary Committee after Democrats criticized the dismissals of 7 to 10 United States attorneys as politically motivated.

Ms. Miers, whose resignation as White House counsel was effective Jan. 31, could not be reached for comment Thursday.

At the briefing, Justice Department officials denied that the White House had been involved in any of the other dismissals, suggesting that the department had acted on its own after advising the White House of its intention to remove incumbents.

Democrats have said the removals represented an effort to make room for rising political favorites of the Bush administration and to be rid of independent-minded prosecutors, all of whom had been appointed by President Bush.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said that he was not satisfied by the Justice Department's explanations at the briefing.

"Yesterday's briefing by the deputy attorney general did little to alleviate our concerns that politics was involved and, in fact, raised those concerns," Mr. Schumer said. "Some may have been fired for political reasons because they may have not done what Justice Department wanted them to do."

Justice Department officials have said that because United States attorneys are presidential appointees they may be replaced at any time without a specific reason, although they have said that none were removed for pursuing politically sensitive cases.

Another United States attorney asked to resign was Carol C. Lam of San Diego, who departed on Thursday at the request of the Justice Department. Two days earlier, Ms. Lam announced two indictments, including one against a former high-ranking Central Intelligence Agency official, in a corruption inquiry that began with last year's guilty plea by a former Republican representative, Randy Cunningham, who was sentenced to more than eight years in prison.

Karen P. Hewitt, an assistant in Ms. Lam's office, was named Thursday to serve as the interim United States attorney in the Southern District, while Scott N. Schools, a general counsel in the Justice Department, will fill the interim role in the Northern District, in San Francisco.

Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, said in a statement on the Senate floor Thursday that Ms. Lam had been dismissed despite a strong record of prosecutions.

"Ms. Lam has had a distinguished career, and she served the southern district of San Diego well and everyone in that district knows that," Ms. Feinstein said. "I regret that main Justice does not. I am quite disappointed that main Justice chose to remove her, especially given the ongoing work in which the office is involved."

Republicans Block Bill To Curb Justice Department's Power Over Prosecutors (AP)

By Laurie Kellman, The Associated Press

AP, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — Senate Republicans blocked a bill Thursday that would curb the Justice Department's power to fire and replace federal prosecutors. Democrats had sought to give the courts a role in the appointments of U.S. attorneys, to GOP opposition.

The objection by Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., to the proposal was long anticipated. So Democrats used the occasion to complain anew about the firings of at least seven prosecutors, including John McKay in Seattle, under a little-known part of the Patriot Act.

Democrats say Attorney General Alberto Gonzales used the law to get around the Senate confirmation process and install Republican allies.

"I believe that their intent was to bring in people from the outside to give some of their bright people an opportunity," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. "That is wrong."

Her bill says a replacement U.S. attorney could serve no longer than 120 days without confirmation. After that time, an interim replacement would be named by a U.S. District Court.

Gonzales, Kyl and other Republicans say this approach could lead prosecutors to be appointed for reasons other than their qualifications.

Republican and Democratic leaders tried for a compromise that might lengthen the 120-day period or curb a district court's appointment power, but those efforts were abandoned early Thursday, according to officials on both sides.

A private briefing Wednesday night by Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty did not change any Democrats' minds about the firings of the prosecutors, senators said.

Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., said that if the Justice Department does not provide detailed performance reports on the fired prosecutors, the Senate Judiciary Committee would subpoena them.

"I am not satisfied with the answers we've gotten. There are just too many holes in too many different places," Schumer said.

Newly empowered Democrats are seeking to curb what they say is the Bush administration's virtually unchecked power during the years of GOP congressional control. Yet the version of the Patriot Act that contains the disputed provision passed overwhelmingly last year with bipartisan support.

Senators from both parties, including the Republican author of the law, say they were unaware of the way the Justice Department might use that rule.

Gonzales has said that he intends to submit the name of every newly installed prosecutor to the Senate for confirmation.

Democrats contend that prosecutors were forced to resign to make way for Republicans' political allies and that the White House slipped the provision into the Patriot Act to permit such indefinite appointments.

Was McKay Ousted Over 2004 Election? (SEATIMES)

By David Bowermaster, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, February 16, 2007

Two months after John McKay was fired as U.S. attorney for the Western District of Washington, the reason for his dismissal remains a mystery.

One of the most persistent rumors in Seattle legal circles is that the Justice Department forced McKay, a Republican, to resign to appease Washington state Republicans angry over the 2004 governor's race. Some believe McKay's dismissal was retribution for his failure to convene a federal grand jury to investigate allegations of voter fraud in the race.

McKay was appointed by President Bush in October 2001.

The Evergreen Freedom Foundation filed a formal complaint with U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in 2005 about what it considered McKay's lax oversight of the election, in which Democratic Gov. Christine Gregoire defeated Republican Dino Rossi by 129 votes. Many influential Republicans publicly criticized McKay.

But a Justice Department official on Thursday rejected the idea and said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty has repeatedly insisted politics did not influence the controversial firings of McKay and six other U.S. attorneys in December.

McNulty had previously said the firings were "performance-related" despite the fact McKay received a positive evaluation seven months before he was fired.

McKay said he was not given a reason when he was asked to step down.

McNulty defended the dismissals during private briefings with a handful of senators Wednesday.

Democrats were not mollified.

"There was nothing that was said to me ... that I found was a credible reason for dismissing" McKay, said Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash.

Murray said McNulty did not detail what was lacking in McKay's work.

"They gave some general things, alluded to things, but gave me nothing specific," she said.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., also said McNulty wasn't telling the whole story.

"I am not satisfied with the answers we've gotten. There are just too many holes in too many different places," he said.

The Justice Department official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, accused Democrats of mischaracterizing the briefings because they didn't agree with the department's conclusions.

"Any suggestion that we were not thorough or forthcoming is just political gamesmanship," the official said.

Senate Republicans blocked a bill Thursday that would curb the Justice Department's power to fire and replace federal prosecutors. Democrats had sought to give the courts a role in the appointments of U.S. attorneys.

Democrats believe the White House was trying to use a new provision in the Patriot Act to get around the Senate confirmation process and install Republican allies as U.S. attorneys.

McKay has always had strong support among moderate Republicans such as King County Prosecutor Norm Maleng, who spoke out on his behalf earlier this month.

But many conservative Republicans have been incensed with McKay since the 2004 governor's race.

Tom McCabe, executive vice president of the Building Industry Association of Washington, summarized the complaints in a BIAW newsletter after McKay announced in December he was stepping down.

In a column titled "Good Riddance," McCabe said McKay "had a disastrous six years as U.S. Attorney. Two years ago, he steadfastly refused to investigate voter fraud despite overwhelming evidence." McCabe also said he had "urged the President to fire McKay."

McCabe could not be reached for comment Thursday.

Republicans argued that illegal votes by felons and others, and errors in the election count, cost Rossi the race.

Emily Langlie, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Seattle, said that in 2004 and 2005 prosecutors and the FBI jointly monitored the election.

"We not only had senior people within our office coordinating our investigation, but we worked jointly with the Department of Justice's Public Integrity section," she said.

Diane Tebelius, who was chairwoman of the Washington State Republican Party when McKay was asked to step down, acknowledged that many Republicans had been upset with McKay after the 2004 election.

But Tebelius said no one from the Justice Department or the White House contacted her about McKay in the months before he was dismissed, and she doubts anyone lobbied for his ouster because of the 2004 race.

"I do not believe anybody in this state would have asked for his resignation," Tebelius said.

Justice Department Names Interim U.S. Attorneys For San Diego, SF (AP)

By Allison Hoffman, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 16, 2007

The Justice Department announced temporary replacements Thursday for two recently ousted U.S. attorneys in San Diego and San Francisco.

Outgoing San Diego chief federal prosecutor Carol Lam will be succeeded by Karen Hewitt, a career federal prosecutor who is currently the executive assistant U.S. attorney for the Southern District of California.

In San Francisco, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan will be replaced by Scott Schools, a career federal prosecutor who currently works for the Justice Department overseeing legal guidance and personnel matters for all 94 U.S. attorney's offices across the country.

Hewitt's appointment was announced as staff and local law enforcement personnel gathered for a simple office farewell party just hours before Lam was due to leave her post. Ryan was scheduled to depart on Friday.

Both Hewitt and Schools will serve on an interim basis until new U.S. attorneys are nominated by the White House and confirmed by the Senate.

Lam and Ryan were among more than seven federal prosecutors recently fired, some without cause, by the attorney general under, under a little-known part of the Patriot Act.

Federal prosecutors serve at the pleasure of the president, subject to Senate confirmation.

Democrats contend that prosecutors were forced to resign to make way for Republicans' political allies and that the White House slipped the provision into the Patriot Act to permit such indefinite appointments.

Lam's dismissal, in particular, prompted criticism from Democrats who questioned whether her departure was linked to the prosecution by her office of disgraced former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a Republican who is currently serving more than eight years in federal prison after pleading guilty to accepting more than $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors.

On Tuesday, Lam's office won a pair of long-awaited indictments against a former top CIA official and a defense contractor implicated Cunningham case.

Also on Thursday, San Diego-based wireless technology giant Qualcomm, Inc., announced that Lam will join its legal department as senior vice president and legal counsel starting on Feb. 26.

The chip maker is currently embroiled in a global web of lawsuits with Nokia Corp. and other major equipment makers claiming that Qualcomm levies unjust, inflated licensing fees to use its patented technologies in their products. Regulators in Europe, South Korea and Japan are probing Qualcomm's business practices as the company trades lawsuits with rivals across the U.S. and Europe.

"From our perspective, she's the ideal person," said Louis Lupin, Qualcomm's general counsel. "She's got experience managing large and very complex cases and a very large staff, and she'll be involved on a global basis."

Hewitt Named To Fill In For U.S. Attorney Lam (SDUT)

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 16, 2007

SAN DIEGO – Karen P. Hewitt, third-in-command at the San Diego U.S. Attorney's office, has been chosen by Justice Department officials to replace outgoing top prosecutor Carol Lam on a temporary basis while a committee searches for a permanent candidate.

Hewitt joined the San Diego office in 2000 and prosecuted civil fraud cases before she was appointed Executive Assistant U.S. attorney a year ago.

Before coming to San Diego, she was a lawyer in the Justice Department's civil division in Washington, where she specialized in constitutional law and civil rights cases for about eight years.

Thursday is Lam's last day.

Justice Department officials asked her to step down because of declining prosecutions of immigration-related cases. Critics contend Lam's ouster was politically-motivated because of her pursuit of corrupt public officials like ex-Congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

NEW: Interim U.S. Attorney Named To Succeed Ryan (OAKTRIB)

By Josh Richman, STAFF WRITER

Oakland Tribune, February 16, 2007

The Justice Department named an interim replacement today for U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, who'll spend his last day as Northern California's top federal prosecutor Friday.

Ryan was one seven U.S. Attorneys across the nation who recently resigned or were forced out by the Bush Administration. U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., spoke today on the Senate floor in favor of a bill protecting her chamber's constitutional power to confirm those appointed to these jobs.

The interim U.S. Attorney for this region -- including coastal counties and a few inland counties from Monterey Bay to the Oregon border -- will be Scott Schools, who has been general counsel to the Justice Department's Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys. That Washington, D.C.-based agency provides legal guidance in ethics and employee matters to federal prosecutors' offices from coast to coast.

From 2001 to 2005, Schools was First Assistant U.S. Attorney in South Carolina, overseeing about 125 attorneys and support staff; before that, he'd served as interim U.S. Attorney there for nine months. He was a prosecutor in that office from 1989 to 1992 and from 1997 to 2001; between those periods, he was in private practice. Schools holds a mathematics degree from Duke University and a law degree from the University of Texas.

U.S. Attorneys typically have been appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate, but under a provision inserted in the USA Patriot Act at its reauthorization last year, the Attorney General now can name interim replacements to fill vacancies indefinitely without confirmation.

Seven recent vacancies in rapid succession raised concerns on Capitol Hill that the Bush Administration was making politically motivated choices; Senate hearings ensued.

A bill approved today by the Senate Judiciary Committee, on which Feinstein sits, would restore the old process. The Attorney General would be able to name an interim U.S. Attorney for no more than 120 days; if the president hasn't nominated someone for permanent appointment and had that person confirmed when that period ends, that district's federal court judges would then be empowered to pick an interim U.S. Attorney.

Ryan, formerly a San Francisco Superior Court judge, served four and a half years as Northern California's U.S. Attorney, supervising a staff of more than 200, including 115 prosecutors, and an annual budget of about $25 million.

His tenure included high-profile prosecutions such as the BALCO sports-doping case; aggressive gang prosecutions; convicting former Ukrainian Prime Minister Pavel Lazarenko on extortion and money laundering charges; and several crackdowns on counterfeit and pirated music, software and videos. His time also was marked, however, by reports of massive employee turnover and low morale.

U.S. ATTY. RYAN LEAVING, INTERIM REPLACEMENT NAMED (KPIX)

KPIX-TV, CBS 5, San Francisco, February 16, 2007

United States Attorney Kevin Ryan announced this afternoon that Friday will be his last day on the job, and the Justice Department simultaneously named a former South Carolina federal prosecutor as his interim replacement.

Ryan had announced last month that he was stepping down after more than four years heading the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Northern District of California, which encompasses 14 coastal and Bay Area counties stretching from Big Sur to the Oregon border.

"I am grateful to have had the opportunity to serve as the United States Attorney. I sincerely thank all of the staff at the office for their hard work to make our community a safer place to live. I also thank all of our partners in law enforcement who have put in countless hours in investigating and prosecuting crimes in Northern California," Ryan said in a statement.

Ryan's interim replacement will be Scott Schools, who currently works for at the Justice Department headquarters in Washington, D.C. From 1989 until 2005, with a five year break between 1992 and 1997, he worked as a federal prosecutor in the United States Attorney's Office for the District of South Carolina serving as interim U.S. Attorney there for 10 months in 2001. He was in private practice in Charleston, South Carolina from 1992-1997. He graduated from Duke University and the University of Texas School of Law.

A permanent replacement for Ryan must be nominated by President George W. Bush and approved by the Senate.

The U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of California supervises a staff of more than 200 people, including 115 Assistant United States Attorneys, and manages a $25 million annual budget, according to the district's website.

Qualcomm Hires U.S. Attorney for San Diego Who Was Among Several Recently Ousted

SAN DIEGO (AP) -- Qualcomm Inc. said Thursday that recently ousted U.S. Attorney Carol Lam will join its legal department as senior vice president and legal counsel, effective Feb. 26.

The San Diego-based wireless technology giant is currently embroiled in a global web of lawsuits with Nokia Corp. and other major equipment makers that claim Qualcomm levies unjust, inflated licensing fees to use its patented technologies in their products.

Regulators in Europe, South Korea and Japan are probing Qualcomm's business practices as the company trades lawsuits with rivals across the U.S. and Europe.

"From our perspective, she's the ideal person," said Louis Lupin, Qualcomm's general counsel. "She's got experience managing large and very complex cases and a very large staff, and she'll be involved on a global basis."

Qualcomm's announcement came as the Justice Department announced temporary replacements for Lam, whose last day as the chief federal prosecutor in San Diego was Thursday, as well as Lam's counterpart in San Francisco.

Lam will be succeeded by Karen Hewitt, the executive assistant U.S. attorney for the Southern District of California. In San Francisco, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan will be replaced by Scott Schools, who currently oversees legal guidance and personnel matters for all 94 U.S. attorney's offices across the country.

Hewitt and Schools will serve on an interim basis until new U.S. attorneys are nominated by the White House and confirmed by the Senate.

Lam and Ryan were among more than seven federal prosecutors recently fired, some without cause, by the attorney general under a little-known part of the Patriot Act.

Federal prosecutors serve at the pleasure of the president, subject to Senate confirmation.

Democrats contend that prosecutors were forced to resign to make way for Republican political allies, and that the White House slipped a provision into the Patriot Act allowing the interim appointments to remain indefinite.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has pledged to submit the name of every replacement to the Senate for confirmation.

Lam's dismissal, in particular, prompted criticism from Democrats who questioned whether her departure was linked to the prosecution by her office of disgraced former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a Republican who is currently serving more than eight years in federal prison after pleading guilty to accepting more than $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors.

Senate Consternation Process (WSJ)

By Kimberley Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

The House spent this week debating an Iraq resolution that will damage U.S. efforts to fight terror overseas. Never to be outdone, the Senate got busy undercutting the war on terror here at home.

That's one way to view the fight Senate liberals are picking with President George W. Bush over the issue of Justice Department nominations -- a battle that bubbled to the surface this week with regard to U.S. attorney appointments. California ringleader Dianne Feinstein is hoping to score a few political shots, as well as give the White House a taste of what's to come in future Senate confirmation brawls. If a little thing like national security gets in the way, so be it.

Ms. Feinstein and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid picked up the U.S. attorneys football in January, after the news leaked that the White House was dismissing seven federal prosecutors. The administration says it's unhappy with these lawyers' performance, and at least it is firing its own appointees. One of Bill Clinton's first acts was to cashier pretty much every sitting U.S. attorney, all of whom had been appointed by Mr. Clinton's predecessors. Nothing in the record suggests either Mr. Reid or Ms. Feinstein were all that cut up over the Clinton dismissals.

This time, however, Mr. Reid is labeling the firings "cronygate," and accusing the administration of ousting capable U.S. attorneys in order to award political allies with plum posts. Ms. Feinstein went further, suggesting the administration's real goal was to circumvent the Senate confirmation process. She noted that a 2006 Patriot Act amendment gives the attorney general -- rather than federal courts -- the right to appoint interim U.S. attorneys, and to keep those interims in place until the Senate confirms a permanent replacement. Clearly, said Ms. Feinstein, the White House intended to pack the Justice Department with shady prosecutors and avoid the Senate altogether.

What we have here, then, is Ms. Feinstein, the serial filibusterer, the woman who rarely saw a Bush judge who deserved an up-or-down vote, accusing the administration of abusing the confirmation process. It might be fall-down hilarious, if everyone weren't taking the Californian so seriously. Instead, Ms. Feinstein recently convinced a majority of her fellows on the Judiciary Committee (including Republicans Arlen Specter, Orrin Hatch and Chuck Grassley) that the Senate was getting slapped about, and to vote to revoke the Patriot Act amendment.

Thus is the Senate lurching back to a pre-9/11 mentality, putting politics and turf ahead of key security issues. If Ms. Feinstein wins this battle, the appointment procedure reverts to the status quo ante. Under that old process, the attorney general can appoint an interim U.S. attorney for 120 days. But if the Senate doesn't get around to confirming a full-time replacement by then, the federal courts get to name a new interim.

That old system was primarily a constitutional oddity, but it also posed a threat to terror investigations. History shows that it is a rare event for a White House to get a permanent attorney through the confirmation process in 120 days; it usually takes closer to a year. Yet after the first 120 days, the federal courts officially get to staff the Justice Department.

Some courts, understandably, see the concept of the judiciary making executive appointments as constitutionally suspect. That's one reason why, in the past six years, courts in Florida, Oklahoma and Virginia have outright refused to make appointments. Courts also have little insight into the Justice Department's ongoing investigations, or who best can step in to fill an attorney vacancy. While many courts will, as a result, re-appoint the AG's interim selection, they aren't required to do so.

That can lead to very bad selections. In 2005, a South Dakota judge attempted to appoint a buddy of former Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle; the court pick came from outside the Justice Department and lacked security clearances. This led to a standoff between the attorney general and the court, and a crisis over who was really in charge. Hardly the best way to go about breaking up terrorist cells, or prosecuting Zacarias Moussaoui.

As it happens, nothing suggests the administration is trying to subvert confirmations. Since the Patriot Act amendment in March 2006, the White House has nominated 15 individuals to serve as U.S. attorneys, and all have gone, or are going, through the Senate confirmation process. There's zero reason to believe the next seven won't as well. But try telling that to Mr. Reid, who yesterday unsuccessfully tried to push the Feinstein proposal through the full Senate.

Meanwhile, Ms. Feinstein is only the latest to play politics with key national-security nominees. Carl Levin spent six months blocking the confirmation of Ken Wainstein, who was tapped as assistant attorney general for national security. That position was designed to further break down the infamous "wall" between intelligence and law enforcement, a goal that even Mr. Levin claims is important. Yet the Michigan Democrat was in a strop about documents he wanted from the Bush administration, and was only too happy to hold Mr. Wainstein hostage. Mr. Levin waged a similar war against Alice Fisher -- nominated to head the Criminal Division of Justice -- for more than a year.

The latest victim is Steven Bradbury, who was nominated in the distant past of June 2005 to head up the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel. As acting head of that office, Mr. Bradbury offered legal advice on the administration's domestic wiretapping program. This proved too much for Ted Kennedy, Dick Durbin and Russ Feingold. The last was so incensed over the wiretapping program he proposed censuring President Bush. That didn't fly, so he and fellow critics settled for blocking Mr. Bradbury from even getting a vote.

One big question after Democrats won the election was how they'd handle the all-important question of national security. The public's been getting a taste of that management via the Iraq debate, but the nominations flaps are equally revealing. Democrats like to say that having a robust criminal justice system is key to fighting terror, and that's true. Many Democrats (while they won't admit it) even still believe the courts are the only place to fight al Qaeda. The least they can do is show they mean it and ensure the Justice Department has the people it needs.

Column: OUSTING OUR U.S. ATTORNEY (SDUT)

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 16, 2007
Firing is difficult to justify
By Lionel Van Deerlin

Carol Lam gathers her belongings today, and departs the office of U.S. Attorney in California's Southern District. Because she faithfully honors a Justice Department tradition of silence, no one can be sure why she's leaving. She's not talking about it.

But what an exit line she gave us Tuesday with those eleventh-hour indictments. It was worthy of Charles Dickens, who sent Sidney Carton to the guillotine saying, "It is a far better thing I do than I have ever done. . . ."

Hours before returning to private life, our U.S. attorney took an action widening the net that snared San Diego's Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham. Her swan song racked up three more suspected miscreants. The homegrown CIA biggie, Kyle Foggo, added colorful icing on the cake. But the most important new action, by far, was against defense contractor Brent Wilkes. It was this man's bribe money that cemented the government case against Cunningham. But Wilkes himself was left free as a bird. Lam staffers, certain that a guy who has lived spectacularly high on the hog will aim to avoid a prolonged diet of prison food, are now positioned to bargain a plea agreement. They'll likely propose easing his sentence as a swap for information that will help hook bigger fish.

A couple of upstate congressmen, known to have done cash-and-carry business with Wilkes, may now feel understandable trepidation.

And so, the question presses ever more urgently – why has the Bush administration sacked Carol Lam and six other trusted U.S. attorneys? No one, it seems, feels required to say. Only one of the seven, New Mexico's David Iglesia, demanded to be told why he was terminated, but got no explanation.

Custom holds that federal prosecutors serve "at the pleasure of the president," who is free to appoint or remove them without explanation. Yet the Justice Department has shown itself pretty touchy about these most recent switches. Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty seemed shaken before the Senate Judiciary Committee. New York's hard-charging Sen. Charles E. Schumer had wondered aloud if the hiring and firing of prosecutors reflected politics, rather than prudence.

"When I hear you talk about the politicizing of the Department of Justice, it's like a knife in my heart," McNulty stammered. Perhaps this sensitive fellow should seek a gentler assignment, sparing him the hostility he and others will face if we don't get a fuller explanation of what Justice is up to.

The only hint offered thus far for the change in San Diego has been that the local office seemed so absorbed with corruption cases that it has been less aggressive than certain lawmakers might have wished against illegal immigration and border smuggling. North County Republican Rep. Darrell Issa spoke approvingly of the Lam ouster.

The case against her? Well, something called the Transactional Records Clearinghouse, operating out of Syracuse University, finds that in 2001, its last year before Carol Lam took charge, the San Diego office filed nearly one-third more border-related cases than it managed under her leadership in 2005, the last full year on which records are complete.

So she flunks the bureaucratic bean-counter test? I know at least one person who fervently wishes government prosecutors had spent more time in pursuit of border brigands, and had left him alone – to wit, "Top Gun" Cunningham, currently ensconced under minimum security in Tucson.

It might seem rash to accuse Bush administration masterminds of pulling political strings, but nothing surfacing thus far discourages skepticism. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' child-like mantra, "at the pleasure of the president," rings hollow. Let's nail this idea that the president – any president – handpicks the dozens of lawyers in line for prosecutorial slots across the land. He's not likely to know even the names of most. Recommendation for appointments is usually left to senators of the president's party. Inasmuch as both California senators are presently Democrats, Bush has relied on a selection system said to be headed by the veteran Rancho Santa Fe Republican politico and presidential insider Gerald Parsky.

Parsky is astute enough to know that the way this switch has been managed so far adds up to abysmally bad politics. It suggests that public corruption, which figured so prominently in last year's election outcome, might no longer concern us. Are we to suppose that Congressman Cunningham was a lone stroller on his path to perdition?

We may soon know better – and only, perhaps, because Carol Lam refused to fold her tent as many expected her to do.

Van Deerlin represented a San Diego County district in Congress for 18 years.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Monster General Counsel Pleads Guilty In Options Case (WSJ)

By Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

The former general counsel of Monster Worldwide Inc. pleaded guilty to two criminal charges related to backdating stock options, ensnared in large part because of a series of damaging emails that helped prosecutors build the case against him.

DOJ_NMG_0133011

Myron Olesnyckyj, 45 years old, entered his guilty plea Thursday in Manhattan federal court to conspiracy and securities fraud. He admitted in court that he systematically backdated stock option grant dates, concealed the expense in company financial disclosures, and provided misleading information to auditors.

In one email filed in court by prosecutors yesterday, Mr. Olesnyckyj instructed a human resources executive not to discuss a company practice of giving new hires options at the lowest stock price in the month after they joined the company, a form of backdating. He wrote: "no written document should ever state lowest price over next 30 days! The auditorw [sic] will view that as backdating options and we'll have a charge to earning in the amount of the difference between price on day 30 and any lower price which is used."

Mr. Olesnyckyj, who joined Monster in 1994 and was fired last year, is expected to cooperate with federal prosecutors against Monster founder Andrew McKelvey. Mr. McKelvey, who hasn't been charged, quit rather than be interviewed by company lawyers examining Monster's options problems.

Based in New York, Monster operates the popular Monster.com job-search Web site.

Separately, the Securities and Exchange Commission filed an eight-count civil complaint against Mr. Olesnyckyj on Thursday alleging that he backdated the vast majority of stock options that Monster granted beginning in 1996 until about April 2003. In court, Mr. Olesnyckyj said the practice went on until 2006, four years after new regulations went into effect that should have curbed the improper activity.

Options typically allow recipients to buy company shares in the future at the price on the day they are granted. Holders can benefit if share prices rise. Backdating involves pretending that the options were granted at an earlier date, so that the recipient can later buy for a lower price, increasing profits.

As a result of the backdating, Monster inflated its earnings by $339.6 million between 1997 and 2005, according to federal prosecutors.

At Monster, stock options regularly were issued to coincide with dates of low closing prices for the company's stock. Most of the options were "in-the-money" on the day they were granted, but the company failed to properly expense or disclose it to shareholders, according to the SEC.

At a Jan. 15, 1999 meeting, according to the SEC, Monster's then-CEO said he wanted to grant options at an exercise price of $25 a share. After the meeting, a Monster employee selected the Dec. 9 closing price of $26.87 as the exercise price.

Mr. Olesnyckyj also personally benefited from the practice, receiving backdated option grants on at least six occasions from 1997 to 2001, according to the SEC. As part of his guilty plea, Mr. Olesnyckyj agreed to forfeit $381,000 in personal gain from the stock options.

In December 2003, after Monster changed its stock option approval process, Mr. Olesnyckyj emailed members of Monster's finance department saying the company should "get serious about firing people who still fail to realize the accounting repurcussions [sic] of promising someone a total of 1000 stock options 'at a strike price equivalent to the lowest price of the stock on the market within a 30 day period preceding your starting date,'" according to prosecutors.

Mr. Olesnyckyj, of New Providence, N.J., is scheduled to be sentenced Aug. 24. He faces a maximum of 25 years in prison but likely will receive a much shorter sentence as a result of his cooperation.

Former Monster Executive Admits Illegal Backdating (WP/AP)

By Larry Neumeister

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

NEW YORK, Feb. 15 -- A former senior vice president of the company that runs the Monster job-search Web site admitted in court Thursday that he illegally backdated millions of dollars in employee stock option grants.

Myron Olesnyckyj, 45, faces up to 25 years in prison and fines of more than $5.2 million after pleading guilty to securities fraud and conspiracy to commit securities fraud. His guilty plea was part of an agreement in which he promised to cooperate fully in return for leniency.

Olesnyckyj said his crimes occurred between 1996 and 2006, when he agreed with others at the company to backdate options and hide the action from federal regulatory agencies and investors. He agreed to forfeit $381,000, which he said was the amount he gained from the scheme.

The Securities and Exchange Commission on Thursday filed a civil complaint against Olesnyckyj for securities fraud in connection to backdating.

The charges were the first for a Monster executive related to the backdating scandal at the company, which overstated the value of its earnings by more than $250 million between 1997 and 2005. Backdating involves issuing stock options retroactively to coincide with low points in the share price, thus boosting payouts. It can be illegal if it is not properly accounted for and disclosed to investors.

Monster Worldwide, whose job site competes with newspaper classifieds, is among scores of companies whose stock options backdating practices have been investigated by federal authorities.

The company announced in July that it might need to restate its finances to record additional charges for stock options expenses, and in September it said it had suspended Olesnyckyj, who also was general counsel and secretary, while it reviewed past stock options grant practices. It dismissed him two months later.

In October, Monster said former chief executive Andrew J. McKelvey had resigned from its board after refusing to be interviewed for an internal investigation on the options practice.

Monster also received a subpoena from the U.S. attorney's office in the Southern District of New York over stock options.

It said in December that it filed restated financial statements to include charges related to the investigation into its stock option granting.

BEARING DOWN Probes Of Backdating Move To Faster Track (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

On Jan. 4, 2002, the chief financial officer of Broadcom Corp. tapped out an email about stock options to his chief executive and others.

"I VERY strongly recommend that these options be priced as of December 24," he wrote.

They were, and that was fortunate for recipients. Broadcom's share price rose 23% between the two dates. The pretense that the options had been granted on the earlier date made them extra valuable.

It also violated the rationale of stock options. They give recipients a right to buy stock in the future at the price when the options are granted, so that recipients can profit only if the price of their company's stock goes up. Setting a lower "exercise price" for the options gives recipients a head start on profiting.

The Broadcom correspondence, found in an internal investigation at the maker of communication chips, is just one of a number of internal documents that have drawn the attention of federal prosecutors and Federal Bureau of Investigation agents in Orange County, Calif. Prosecutors are strongly considering filing criminal charges against the former Broadcom chief financial officer who wrote the email, William J. Ruehle, and at least one other former executive, according to people familiar with the situation.

Mr. Ruehle's lawyer said his client didn't break the law.

The Broadcom probe is a sign of how long-running investigations of stock-options backdating are heating up. Yesterday, a former general counsel of Monster Worldwide Inc. pleaded guilty to securities fraud in federal court in Manhattan. The day before, the founder of Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. pleaded guilty to a New York State charge in a backdating scheme.

Prosecutors in a half-dozen jurisdictions are zeroing in on other cases. The filing of criminal charges in some of these in coming months would mark a watershed in the scandal, as prosecutors and regulators winnow the roster of some 140 companies with options problems to a tighter list of promising cases.

The government is nearing charges against a former official of computer-security company McAfee Inc., say people familiar with the situation, and is strongly considering bringing cases against ex-executives of Apple Inc. and semiconductor-equipment maker KLA-Tencor Corp. In St. Louis, at least one former executive of Engineered Support Systems Inc., a defense contractor now owned by DRS Technologies Inc. of Parsippany, N.J., has been told of a likely charge, says a person close to the matter.

The former Monster Worldwide general counsel who pleaded guilty yesterday is Myron Olesnyckyj, 45. He admitted that he and others conspired to systematically backdate stock options, inflate the company's earnings and mislead auditors. Separately, the Securities and Exchange Commission filed a civil complaint against him. Mr. Olesnyckyj agreed to forfeit $381,000 in personal gains. He faces sentencing in August.

Mr. Olesnyckyj, fired last year, is expected to cooperate with prosecutors investigating Monster founder Andrew McKelvey. Mr. McKelvey, who hasn't been charged, quit late last year rather than be interviewed in an internal company probe of options. A lawyer for him declined to comment.

In a 1999 email cited by the government, Mr. Olesnyckyj wrote to a human-resources official: "No written document should ever state lowest price over next 30 days! The auditorw [sic] will view that as backdating options and we'll have a charge to earning in the amount of the difference between price on day 30 and any lower price which is used." (Read more on Mr. Olesnyckyj's guilty plea3.)

That's the type of evidence investigators are looking for -- "plus factors" that can give a case more promise of success. Such factors might include written indications of deliberate backdating; falsified documents; efforts to hide manipulation from auditors or investigators; or indications that top executives gave themselves backdated options. With so many companies admitting to an improper options practice, investigators have an abundance of possible cases.

Broadcom illustrates some of the elements investigators are focusing on as they set their priorities. The Irvine, Calif., company is one of the biggest companies in the options spotlight. It makes chips that help power all sorts of communications devices and has a stock-market value of more than $19 billion. The SEC in addition to the Justice Department is looking at Broadcom.

Also being investigated are Henry Nicholas -- the former chief executive to whom the CFO's email was addressed -- and Henry Samueli, Broadcom's chairman. Messrs. Nicholas and Samueli co-founded Broadcom. The two made up the committee that handed out options Broadcom has admitted were backdated.

Mr. Nicholas said in a statement his focus was on running Broadcom, and "the minutiae of employee paper-work and documentation were not at the top of my list." Mr. Samueli's attorney declined to comment except to say that some of the Journal's information was "misleading."

Mr. Nicholas founded the company in 1991 with help from Mr. Samueli, his former engineering professor. After they took it public in 1998, its stock soared 20-fold in two years. Together the men sold more than $1 billion in Broadcom shares near the end of the tech boom. Each still holds about $1 billion of Broadcom stock.

A domineering figure, Mr. Nicholas routinely scheduled late-night staff meetings and boasted of working for days without sleep. At a yearly sales conference, he quizzed subordinates about chip designs, forcing those who erred to gulp down shots of hard liquor. He stepped down from his CEO post in 2003. Along the way, he settled into a 15,000-square-foot mansion, which he outfitted with a billionaire's toys: waterfalls, secret tunnels into the hills, a sports bar.

Mr. Samueli cuts a less flamboyant figure. A leading philanthropist in Orange County, he also owns the Mighty Ducks hockey franchise. Two University of California engineering schools bear his name.

Last year Broadcom admitted rampant backdating. It restated several years of results, taking $2.24 billion in charges against earnings -- the biggest restatement so far in the scandal.

Mr. Ruehle stepped down as Broadcom's chief financial officer a few days before he was to be interviewed by outside lawyers doing the internal investigation. Broadcom said in a securities filing that Mr. Ruehle was "at the center" of backdating. Mr. Ruehle's lawyer, Richard Marmaro, said that if his client is charged, he "will not plead guilty because he did not commit any crime."

Broadcom in its filing also blamed a former human-resources chief, Nancy Tullos. It said she "encouraged, assisted in and enabled" the backdating. A lawyer for Ms. Tullos, who left in 2003, declined to comment for this article. The lawyer has said previously that Ms. Tullos followed the directives of superiors, didn't select any grant dates and always acted in the company's best interests.

Broadcom's backdating, which it has said occurred from 1998 to 2003, took place amid a gyrating stock price and a heated technology industry in which valued employees were often poached by others with big options packages. Broadcom emails, described by people who have seen them, suggest that executives sometimes deliberately gave grants earlier dates and sometimes cautioned others not to mention the dating process in writing.

Broadcom's auditor, Ernst & Young, raised concerns in 2000 about an aspect of the options process and reminded executives about the rules, say people familiar with the matter. At that time, options granted at the current stock price didn't affect companies' earnings. But a grant at below-market prices was considered compensation, so that companies had to count it as an expense.

In 2000 Broadcom made a giant options grant to a large number of employees, purportedly on a day in May when the stock had its lowest close for the quarter. Ernst discovered that the company hadn't finished divvying up the grant among employees until months later. Accounting rules say an option isn't recorded as granted until recipients are determined.

Ernst warned company officials, including Mr. Ruehle, not to make such "subsequent allocations" again, according to people familiar with the matter. Ernst reminded executives of how options should be accounted for, taking them through the rules.

Like many stocks, Broadcom's sank after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. It hit its lowest price in three years on Oct. 1, before recovering and then more than doubling by year-end. Broadcom claimed to have granted a slew of options to non-officers on Oct. 1. Investigators are looking at whether the company may actually have made this grant later and backdated it, say people familiar with the situation.

Broadcom said in its federal filing that co-founder Mr. Nicholas was "at times" involved in the backdating, and bore a large responsibility for the problems because of "the tone and style of doing business he set." A person familiar with the grant dated Oct. 1 said it engendered jealousy among those who didn't get options then, and that Mr. Nicholas and others appear to have retroactively added more people to the list.

DOJ_NMG_0133014

In an email on Jan. 2, 2002, Mr. Nicholas sent a list of employees included in the Oct. 1 grant to at least two people, including Ms. Tullos, say people familiar with the email's contents. "I found my old share grant spreadsheet from before October," he wrote.

But the electronic time stamp on the computer file indicated the spreadsheet had been created toward the end of 2001, long after Oct. 1, say people familiar with the matter. The discrepancy has led investigators to examine whether the email and spreadsheet might be an attempt to provide written cover for manipulated grants.

Broadcom said in its federal filing that co-founder Mr. Samueli was "involved with" the "flawed option granting process." The company cleared him, saying he "reasonably relied on management and other professionals" regarding proper treatment of the options. According to people familiar with the matter, Mr. Samueli, as a member of the Equity Award Committee, received a number of emails that discussed retroactive date selection.

Mr. Samueli cooperated with the internal probe but so far has declined a request to speak to government investigators -- unusual for a sitting chairman. When weighing how much responsibility corporations themselves bear for fraudulent conduct, prosecutors are supposed to consider how cooperative top officials have been, according to Justice Department guidelines.

An outside lawyer for Broadcom said it wouldn't comment on the investigation except to say that it was cooperating fully. "Dr. Samueli did cooperate fully and voluntarily with the company's independent internal investigation," said the lawyer, David Siegel.

In any effort to link backdating to Messrs. Nicholas and Samueli, prosecutors would face a potential hurdle: The co-founders didn't regularly receive option grants themselves. The two received just one grant, for a million options each, in 2002. Broadcom has said no grants to the founders or to directors were among those misdated.

Ms. Tullos and Mr. Ruehle, by contrast, received numerous options, including grants the company has said were manipulated. Mr. Ruehle had $32 million of unexercised options when he left last year. The company canceled them. Last year the company canceled $4 million of options Ms. Tullos held.

Several emails written by Ms. Tullos suggest she may have been aware the dating practices were troublesome. In a period when Broadcom's stock was falling, a business-unit head repeatedly asked her when his subordinates would get options. Eventually, she told him "I cannot tell you what we are doing" in a "post-Enron" world, according to people familiar with the matter. In a message to another employee asking about options, she wrote, "I cannot answer in writing."

Prosecutors would need more than suggestive emails to make a successful criminal case. A document that seems like a smoking gun can grow cold when the context is explained to a jury by an experienced defense lawyer.

Another obstacle for the government in prosecuting backdating is at some companies the practice was discussed openly, making it harder to argue that executives knew they were engaged in wrongful conduct.

Defense lawyers will doubtless pass blame around. Those representing CEOs are likely to argue that their clients -- being business leaders, not accountants -- relied on others to figure out how options should be issued and accounted for. Those representing subordinates are likely to argue that the boss made them do it.

Helping boost momentum toward the filing of charges is the statute of limitations. It's five years for securities fraud and wire fraud. But there's some flexibility, based on the notion that misdated options might affect earnings in later years.

Executive-Pay Summaries Conceal As They Reveal (WP)

By David Cho And Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

The first overhaul in 15 years of executive-pay disclosures has been billed as the most transparent window ever into the clubby world of corporate compensation.

But as these filings have begun to roll out publicly, analysts are finding there's a catch.

Due to an accounting loophole for stock options and an eleventh-hour rule change made by securities regulators just before Christmas, some of the biggest names in technology, health care and financial services will be able to cloud what their top executives make.

The anomaly is being discovered by compensation consultants who have been hired by firms to draft these filings. In some cases, it is lowering the compensation figures reported by firms, they said. In others, executives who should be named in the filings as the five highest-paid officers in their companies are being replaced with employees making less.

The Securities and Exchange Commission's first changes to pay disclosures since 1992 were meant to be user-friendly. Shareholders could look at a summary table and easily see what the top executives of a company were taking home in salary, perks, retirement bonuses and stock options.

Now, that summary table "won't give you the full picture," said Brian Foley, a compensation consultant based in White Plains, N.Y. "It misses a big part of the puzzle."

SEC officials said they had no control over which companies used the stock options loophole. But they said the agency's late December rule change will provide more accurate figures in the long run and will better reflect what an executive is making in a given year. Although the summary table may not provide full information on options, that data will be included elsewhere in the filing, they said.

No issue in the SEC's history has generated as much interest as the new executive-pay disclosures, Chairman Christopher Cox said last year, adding that the agency had received more than 20,000 comments about it from businesses, trade groups and investor advocates.

While hailing the new filings as a breakthrough, several academics and analysts were critical in interviews of the way the disclosures handle stock options. They also questioned whether the average shareholder could page through these filings to link different tables and charts.

"The proxies will provide you three or four times as much information as before," Foley said. "But . . . now you will have to pick through the mess to get the value of the options. It's not going be in plain English."

Employees who are granted stock options can buy a company's stock at a set price within a specific time frame. They then can reap a windfall if the price goes up, but typically they can sell only a portion of these shares each year. This "vesting period" often keeps prized workers from defecting to a rival.

The story behind the loophole began when an accounting rule, FAS 123R, came into effect last year and changed the way companies account for these options.

The rule had a huge impact on the all-important bottom line: If firms gave stock options to executives, they had to subtract the total value of those grants from their earnings that year. Before, options were not counted as an expense.

Suddenly, under FAS 123R, it could appear as if a company's profit took a big hit, especially in industries such as health care and technology in which granting executives hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of stock options is common.

To avoid the appearance of a profit dip, more than 900 companies, including Dell, Sun Microsystems, CBS, J.P. Morgan Chase, Whole Foods Market, Viacom, Corning and Northrop Grumman, sped up the vesting date of their options to occur before FAS 123R took effect, according to a Bear Stearns report. This was neither illegal nor improper under accounting rules.

But the acceleration helped these firms collectively erase about $8 billion of future stock option expenses from their books, meaning they awarded the options but would not have to include the cost in their financial results, according to Bear Stearns.

"Option-vesting acceleration was used as a means to temporarily benefit reported earnings," the report said. The analysis says Dell accelerated the most options -- $591 million in total -- followed by Sun Microsystems, with $400 million.

Then, on the Friday before Christmas, the SEC gave corporations a present: It changed a rule to allow them to report the amount of stock options that vest per year rather than the total value of the options granted to an executive.

One compensation consultant, who has major technology firms as clients, said the difference in reported compensation levels before and after the SEC's December rule change has been striking.

In almost every case, the SEC change and the acceleration of options altered the total amount of compensation reported on the disclosure's summary table. For many firms, the final number was lower. For other companies, at least on paper, it created a different pecking order for the highest-paid executives. The consultant spoke on condition of anonymity because the filings have not yet been released to the public.

The new summary tables are "potentially misleading if you are looking for a single number to guide you. . . . You don't get a picture of what the compensation committee originally intended the compensation to be," he said. "The number that you get is precisely wrong."

Especially in the first year, the compensation expert added, shareholders should be cautious about taking these figures at face value.

SEC officials said shareholders should not rely solely on the summary tables and should read a company's entire filing. They added that if the December rule altered the composition of a company's "top five," the change made the filing more accurate.

"There are still problems . . . but this reporting season, we will know much more about both the amount and the structure of compensation than we've known for a long time," said Lucian Bebchuk, director of the Program on Corporate Governance at Harvard Law School.

Government Won't Challenge Appeal Court's Decision In Enron-related Case (HC)

By Kristen Hays, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, February 16, 2007

The Justice Department has decided not to challenge an appeals court's decision last year to throw out most of the 2004 convictions against several former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives in an Enron-related case.

But three of those former executives — who each served nearly a year in prison before being released pending the result of their appeals — could still be retried on charges of participating in a sham deal to help Enron book bogus profits.

Justice Department spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch said Thursday that federal prosecutors had decided not to appeal the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals' ruling to the U.S. Supreme Court. The Justice Department had until Friday to make that call.

"While we review the matter before the district court, we remain committed to holding accountable those responsible for the massive frauds that accompanied the collapse of Enron," Lesch said.

She declined to say whether prosecutors will retry Daniel Bayly, Merrill's former head of investment banking; James A. Brown, former head of the firm's asset lease group; and Robert Furst, the brokerage's former liaison with Enron.

A status hearing in the case is slated for this afternoon.

Last August, the appellate court threw out fraud and conspiracy convictions of Bayly, Brown, Furst and a fourth former Merrill executive, William Fuhs. A jury in 2004 convicted all four of fraud and conspiracy for helping push through a deal in which the brokerage pretended to buy three power barges from Enron so the energy company could appear to have made earnings targets in late 1999.

In a 2-1 decision, an appeals panel ruled that prosecutors improperly presented jurors with a theory that the defendants deprived Enron of its right to their honest services.

The panel said the theory was flawed in that case because their actions were consistent with corporate goals and did not rob the energy company or shareholders of money or property.

Had the deal involved bribery or theft, the theory could have been proper, the panel said in reversing most convictions against Bayly, Brown and Furst. Perjury and obstruction of justice convictions against Brown for lying about the nature of the deal were upheld.

Fuhs' convictions were thrown out for lack of evidence, and he cannot be retried. Also, former Enron finance executive Dan Boyle, who also was convicted for his role in the scheme, chose not to appeal and is in prison.

The honest services ruling has permeated other Enron cases.

Former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling aims to raise the issue in his appeal of his 2006 jury convictions last year of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors. Skilling is serving a 24-year, four-month prison term.

Prosecutors presented the honest services theory only with the single conspiracy count against Skilling. However, a 5th Circuit panel said in a December opinion denying Skilling's request for bail pending the outcome of his appeal that it found "serious frailties" in his securities fraud and insider trading convictions as well.

Skilling's lawyers expect to file his appeal next month.

Late last month, a Houston federal judge ruled that prosecutors wrongly used the honest services theory in last year's retrial of a former Enron broadband division executive and threw out all five jury convictions of conspiracy, wire fraud and falsifying books.

The government had already conceded that four of the five convictions of Kevin Howard, the unit's former finance chief, should be erased because they likely wouldn't stand up on appeal in light of the honest services ruling. U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore wiped out the fifth count as well, saying it was tied to one of the tainted counts.

The government retains the right to retry Howard.

Still other cases have been affected. For example, Christopher Calger, a former vice president of power origination at Enron, is seeking to withdraw his guilty plea to wire fraud on the claim that he could not have deprived Enron of his honest services in a power plant deal because his actions were in line with company goals. That request is pending.

2 Former Enron Traders Get Probation For Driving Up Energy Prices During Calif. Power Crisis (AP)

By David Kravets, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 16, 2007

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-Two of three former Enron Corp. traders accused of driving up energy prices during California's power crisis were each sentenced in federal court to two years of court-supervised release.

Timothy Belden, the former head of trading in Enron's Portland, Oregon, office, was sentenced Wednesday after pleading guilty in October 2002 to one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud. Belden's plea was the first prosecution of anyone related to the West's energy crisis in 2000 and 2001. He had faced up to five years in prison and must forfeit $2.1 million (â,¬1.6 million).

The second defendant, Jeffrey Richter, was a lower-level trading manager in charge of the so-called "short-term desk" who also pleaded guilty to two counts related to manipulating energy prices. He had faced up to five years and agreed to pay a $410,000 (â,¬313,408) fine.

A third trader, the alleged mastermind behind the scheme, is expected to be sentenced next month for his role in the scam that fraudulently sent California energy prices soaring, causing energy shortages and rolling blackouts.

Internal company memos describe how Belden's trading unit took power out of California at a time of rolling blackouts and shortages and sold it out of state to elude price caps, according to documents obtained by investigators.

Enron bought California power at cheap, capped prices, routed it outside the state, then sold it back into California at vastly inflated prices, authorities said. The sham trades were designed to circumvent the California-only price caps on wholesale energy.

The crisis played a role in Pacific Gas & Electric Co.'s bankruptcy and will leave California consumers paying abnormally high electricity prices for years.

Prosecutor Laurel Beeler said the government sought lenient sentences because of their "extraordinary assistance" in the investigation. Beeler said they gave hundreds of hours of their time to assist authorities at understanding the scheme, assisting authorities in the government's successful case against Enron Chairman Ken Lay, Chief Executive Jeff Skilling and dozens of others.

Beeler, however, said it was unclear how much the energy trading scheme cost ratepayers.

"Calculating a particular loss to that activity is difficult," she told U.S. District Judge Martin Jenkins.

The third defendant, John Forney, the manager of Enron's trading desk, pleaded guilty to one of 11 charges in exchange for his cooperation and is to set to be sentenced in March.

Forney pleaded guilty to wire fraud - specifically, that he promised to supply energy Enron did not have and improperly collected electrical grid management fees for Enron.

In Fraud Case, 7 Years In Jail For Contempt (NYT)

By Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

On Jan. 14, 2000, Martin A. Armstrong, a globe-trotting investment manager, was told to produce $15 million in gold and antiquities, as well as documents, in response to a civil suit by the government accusing him of securities fraud involving hundreds of millions of dollars.

When he said that he did not have the items and could not produce them, a federal judge ordered him jailed for contempt of court.

Seven years later, Mr. Armstrong sits in the Metropolitan Correctional Center in Lower Manhattan.

Imprisoned two years before Enron and WorldCom brought corporate crime to center stage, Mr. Armstrong, 57, is the white-collar defendant whom time forgot. Over the years, the losses of his former clients have been repaid by a bank involved in his trades.

Still, he remains jailed on one of the longest-running charges of contempt. In many cases, a federal law limits to 18 months how long someone can be held under civil contempt while the court tries to coerce compliance with an order. Even in cases of criminal contempt, whose goal is punishment rather than coercion, an individual is entitled to the full protections of due process after six months.

“A legal proceeding is supposed to be the quest for truth,” Mr. Armstrong said in a phone interview last week from the 12-story building, which is used mostly as a temporary holding site for prisoners. “But this contempt was used to stop me from going to trial, and it’s been nothing but bad faith from the government ever since.”

How Mr. Armstrong has been held for so many years without a trial is a tangled and bizarre tale. Mr. Armstrong, his lawyers say, has been stuck in a surreal situation in which criminal prosecutors have never had to prove their 24-count indictment at trial while the civil case tied him up. Nevertheless, they have gotten their desired result — a lengthy prison term for Mr. Armstrong.

Last August, he pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy in the criminal case. He struck that deal with federal prosecutors after he was moved from the 75-square-foot cell he shared with another prisoner into solitary confinement and had not slept for days, his lawyer said. Over the years, prosecutors have said that they were ready to proceed to trial and that civil contempt had nothing to do with their case. Mr. Armstrong countered that his detainment impeded his efforts to mount a proper defense, blocking his access to essential documents and computers as well as the assets to pay counsel.

Because there has been no jury trial in the case, it is impossible to say which side is right: the government, whose indictment in September 1999 contended that Mr. Armstrong misappropriated hundreds of millions in client funds; or Mr. Armstrong, who said that officials at the bank executing his trades generated temporary losses that could have been recovered in the market. (Two of those officials later pleaded guilty to fraud in a related case involving the bank.)

Exceeding a Sentence

But this much is certain: Mr. Armstrong’s years in jail for civil contempt will soon exceed the sentence of 6.5 to 8 years that he would have received if he had been convicted of all 24 criminal counts of securities fraud, commodities fraud and wire fraud.

DOJ_NMG_0133018

"The case sends a very bad signal," said Bernard V. Kleinman, a criminal lawyer in White Plains who represented Mr. Armstrong until 2004 and argued twice for his release before the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, in Lower Manhattan. "I think it bodes very ill for anybody held in civil contempt. District court judges can look at this case and feel that the likelihood of the circuit reversing them is small and that time is, in and of itself, no factor in determining whether civil contempt has lost its coercive effect and has become punitive."

John F. Keenan, the Federal District Court judge overseeing the criminal case, has not yet sentenced Mr. Armstrong. It is unclear whether the judge will give Mr. Armstrong credit for the time he has served. Under federal sentencing guidelines, his lawyers expect a sentence of about five years.

A spokeswoman for the United States attorney in Manhattan said that the office did not comment on open cases.

Judge Richard Owen, the senior district judge who ordered Mr. Armstrong held in contempt, still sits on the bench in the Southern District of New York, where he has been for 34 years. When he ordered Mr. Armstrong taken away by federal marshals, he declared, "Mr. Armstrong has the keys to the jail cell in his pocket by production and telling people where to go to get it and dig it up and turn it over."

Over the years, Judge Owen would revisit the contempt order every 18 months, guided by the federal statute. He repeatedly said that Mr. Armstrong was motivated by greed and was awaiting his release from jail to retrieve the $15 million that the government said was missing. According to lawyers who worked on the case in the early days, the financier's headstrong manner irritated Judge Owen almost immediately.

But Judge Owen was moved off the case in November by a panel in the Second Circuit Court hearing Mr. Armstrong's third appeal on the contempt charge.

The three judges unanimously rejected the appeal to free Mr. Armstrong but found that on the seventh anniversary of his confinement, "his case deserves a fresh look by a different pair of eyes."

It was the second time in less than a year that the Second Circuit had ordered Judge Owen replaced on a high-profile case. In March, a panel overturned the 2004 conviction of Frank P. Quattrone, the former investment banker at Credit Suisse, because Judge Owen failed to instruct the jury properly; the panel assigned the case to a new judge in the "interest of justice." Later, the government decided not to retry Mr. Quattrone.

Judge P. Kevin Castel has taken over the Armstrong civil case. A hearing is scheduled on the contempt matter for March 15. A request to interview Mr. Armstrong in person was denied by corrections officials, and Judge Owen did not return a call seeking comment.

A Budding Businessman

At the peak of his career in the mid-90s, Mr. Armstrong oversaw $3 billion in client assets. He was widely quoted in the financial news media, including The New York Times, on interest rate and currency movements. He began working at a coin and stamp dealership when he was 13 and opened a collectors' store when he was 21. He founded Princeton Economics International, based in Princeton, N.J., in 1981.

Mr. Armstrong, an intelligent and imperious man who claimed to have made his first million by age 15, seems to have begun having trouble in 1999 when trading losses turned up in accounts that were held for the firm at Republic Bank. The problems appeared as the HSBC Group conducted a financial review before acquiring Republic.

The government said that Mr. Armstrong had improperly commingled accounts and overstated the value of the account's securities in client statements.

Mr. Armstrong said that he did not authorize the transactions that produced losses and that he was not involved with commingling of the accounts. He was indicted in September and released on $5 million bond.

In January 2000, the receiver appointed by the court in the civil case said that Mr. Armstrong had purchased gold coins and other assets with his firm's money. His lawyers argued that the assets might have been purchased before the suspected wrongdoing.

When Judge Owen ordered the assets returned, Mr. Armstrong delivered 4 of the 5 computers sought, 8 of the 11 requested boxes of documents and gold coins worth $1.1 million. He said that was all he had. The receiver said assets worth about $15 million were missing. Mr. Armstrong's odyssey in the judicial system began.

His assets frozen, Mr. Armstrong has been unable to pay lawyers. He now relies upon David Cooper and Steven Z. Legon, two lawyers from the Criminal Justice Act panel, set up to help indigent defendants, and Thomas V. Sjoblom, a lawyer at Proskauer Rose, who has received nominal compensation.

"On what grounds can you tie up the system of criminal procedure and civil procedure and hold everything in abeyance during contempt?" Mr. Sjoblom asked. "What about your speedy trial rights? What about the government's need to move forward in the civil case? You're using the contempt process to wring a settlement or a plea out of the person. That, to me, is abuse of the process."

Over the years, more than half a dozen government lawyers have cycled through the case. In 2003, Mr. Armstrong changed his legal approach in challenging the contempt charge, saying that he did not have to produce the assets and citing his Fifth Amendment right.

The receiver, meanwhile, has recovered the vast majority of money said to have been lost by investors in the case. In January 2002, Republic New York Securities, a brokerage firm that housed Princeton Economics' accounts, pleaded guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud charges. Republic Bank paid $606 million to victims, all Japanese companies. It was "full restitution," the assistant United States attorney said at the time.

Alan M. Cohen, then a lawyer at O'Melveny & Myers and now executive vice president and global head of compliance at Goldman Sachs, is the court-appointed receiver.

His former colleague, Tancred V. Schiavoni, a lawyer at O'Melveny, said that all the victims had been satisfied. "We tried to do the right thing, and we've gotten nothing but grief," he said. "What this guy wants is to be given credit for time served on the contempt and leave with the money."

O'Melveny & Myers has received at least $3.9 million to cover its fees and disbursement over the years, according to court filings.

The discovery process was protracted partly because of the complexity — hundreds of boxes of materials had to be examined and data transcribed into digital format — and because Mr. Armstrong was in jail and relying on lawyers working pro bono.

In January 2006, criminal prosecutors said they were eager to put Mr. Armstrong on trial in October. Then in early August, federal prosecutors appeared at the correctional center to strike a plea deal. The visit, Mr. Sjoblom said, came a week after Mr. Armstrong had been ordered into solitary confinement — known as "the hole" — for damaging a vent in a common area.

Mr. Armstrong pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud for failing to keep his investors informed about losses and for agreeing to make investor funds available to Republic to cover Princeton Economics' unrelated trading losses.

"I think the government just wore Marty out," Mr. Sjoblom said.

On Dec. 7, Stephen J. Obie, regional counsel for the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, visited Mr. Armstrong, with a settlement offer in which he would sign over some $30 million as a penalty. Mr. Armstrong declined.

The Securities and Exchange Commission and the C.F.T.C. declined to comment on the case.

The government has said that $21 million is still owed. Even if that must be paid by Mr. Armstrong's firm and not Republic Bank, an estimated $40 million is left in what was once Princeton Economics: $30 million in the United States and $10 million in a British entity. Mr. Armstrong and his lawyers learned of the $10 million three weeks ago.

Weekly Visits

Mr. Armstrong, who is divorced, has two children and an elderly mother who await his release. His daughter, Victoria Armstrong, 30, visits most Wednesdays, spending about one hour with him in a common room with other visitors and prisoners.

"You never stop thinking about where he is and what he goes through," Ms. Armstrong said in an interview last week.

Her brother, Martin, 31, said he was bewildered at what he sees as the breakdown of due process in his father's case. "That you can keep someone in contempt for such a long time with so many unanswered questions — that part of it has been a real eye-opener," he said.

Sonia Sotomayor, a judge on the Second Circuit panel that heard Mr. Armstrong's appeal last year, seemed to echo this point. "The district court's finding that Armstrong is motivated solely by greed is not enough to justify disregard for due process," she wrote. "Courts must exercise caution in their use of the contempt power and must recognize when it has reached the limits of its utility."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Nevada Governor Faces FBI Probe Into Contracts (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

Federal prosecutors are investigating whether Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons accepted unreported gifts or payments from a company that was awarded secret military contracts when Mr. Gibbons served in Congress.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation is examining whether any gifts or payments violated federal contracting rules or were offered in exchange for official acts by Mr. Gibbons, people briefed on the investigation said. Mr. Gibbons, a Republican, represented Nevada for five terms in Congress, where he served on the House Intelligence and Armed Services committees. He was sworn in last month as governor of the nation's fastest-growing state.

The close ties between the congressman and the contractor, Warren Trepp, were disclosed in a Nov. 1 Wall Street Journal article1, which revealed that Mr. Gibbons accepted private jet flights and a Caribbean cruise from the software-company owner. Mr. Gibbons says accepting the cruise and flight didn't violate House ethics rules.

New evidence has emerged that includes emails to Mr. Trepp -- the majority owner of eTreppid Technologies LLC and the former chief trader for convicted junk-bond dealer Michael Milken -- discussing a payment or gift to then-Rep. Gibbons. They also show Mr. Gibbons repeatedly using his congressional office to help the firm seek classified military and civilian contracts.

The emails show that since at least 2003, Mr. Trepp maintained close ties to Mr. Gibbons, who helped eTreppid get no-bid software contracts from the Air Force, U.S. Special Operations Command and Central Intelligence Agency. The software was used in video tracking of military targets and other, classified applications.

Messrs. Trepp and Gibbons have denied any wrongdoing, and no charges have been filed; indeed, such investigations sometimes end without official action.

'Hit the Ground Running'

In a Sept. 25, 2003, email to Mr. Trepp after Mr. Gibbons had been particularly helpful on a recent contract, eTreppid executive Len Glogauer reports that "Jim really hit the ground running on that one." He adds, "we need to take care of him like we discussed." It isn't clear what Mr. Glogauer meant, and he declined to comment.

A second email, cited in court filings by Mr. Trepp's former partner, was more explicit. On March 22, 2005, days before Mr. Trepp and his wife embarked on the Caribbean cruise with the congressman and his family, Jalé Trepp sent a reminder to her husband. "Please don't forget to bring the money you promised Jim and Dawn," referring to Mr. and Mrs. Gibbons.

Minutes later, Mr. Trepp responds, "Don't you ever send this kind of message to me! Erase this message from your computer right now!" Mr. Gibbons failed to disclose the cruise and travel on Mr. Trepp's leased private jet, as required by House ethics rules. He later asked the House Ethics Committee for an exemption, but left office before any action was taken.

The eTreppid emails include dozens to and from then-Rep. Gibbons. In one of the first such exchanges, on Sept. 23, 2003, Mr. Gibbons said he was "greatly impressed" with the technology and that he asked a military aide on his staff to set up a meeting with the National Security Agency to demonstrate the company's products. "No doubt, the Agency will be just as impressed," Mr. Gibbons wrote. He also tells an eTreppid executive to begin using a private email address that is "a direct link to my desk and does not go through anyone else."

In later exchanges, Mr. Gibbons discusses his efforts to set up meetings with the Department of Homeland Security, and arranges meetings with several Pentagon officials, including a top defense intelligence official. An eTreppid executive responds, "now if we can get into the Navy, it would be great."

In a statement yesterday, a spokesman for the governor said Mr. Gibbons has "consistently stated that he and Warren Trepp have a longstanding friendship." Mr. Gibbons, the statement continued, is proud of his efforts "to highlight the good work of Nevada companies as part of his duties to represent his constituents. However, he held no special power in awarding defense contracts, which go through a multilevel approval process."

Mr. Trepp didn't return phone calls or emails seeking comment. His attorney, Steven Peek, said yesterday, "Warren has had no inquires or questions from any federal officials about his relationship with Jim Gibbons." Mr. Peek said Mr. Trepp continues to talk to the FBI "about the theft of his company's intellectual property" by his former partner, the crux of continuing legal disputes between the two men. Mr. Peek also said Mr. Trepp "unequivocally denies that he wrote any emails regarding any payments to Jim Gibbons, and questions their authenticity."

Preliminary Stage

The FBI declined to comment on the investigation, which appears to be in a preliminary stage. The bureau has stepped up its pursuit of public-corruption cases, and says it now has about 620 agents working on federal, state and local cases, compared with 260 in 2002. On Tuesday, former senior CIA official Kyle "Dusty" Foggo was indicted on fraud, conspiracy and money-laundering charges for allegedly accepting jet flights and a vacation from a contractor, Brent Wilkes, who was indicted on related charges. Both pleaded not guilty yesterday. The indictments arose from a continuing FBI investigation of former Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California, who last year began serving a prison sentence for accepting bribes.

The Cunningham case and claims made against Mr. Gibbons have drawn attention to alleged congressional abuse of the classified or "black" portion of the federal budget, which covers CIA, NSA and other secret government activities and has grown to at least $30 billion. New limits on special-interest spending known as earmarks were enacted by Congress last month, including rules meant to restrict earmarks in the classified budget.

The Nevada case is being watched closely in Washington: John Negroponte, former director of national intelligence, warned in a court filing of "exceptionally grave damage" to national security if details of the secret contracts are disclosed.

The new federal probe follows a Nevada investigation of the dispute over ownership of eTreppid software used in secret government programs. That investigation was initially focused on Dennis Montgomery, the former partner of Mr. Trepp who designed the software on which eTreppid was founded in 1998. The men have accused each other of trade-secret theft, among other claims, and have been battling in court for more than a year.

The new emails and internal documents would appear to support some of the claims made in legal proceedings filed by Mr. Montgomery, who in court papers has alleged that Mr. Trepp gave at least $100,000 in cash and casino chips to Mr. Gibbons. Public records show Mr. Trepp gave $90,000 to the governor's campaign through a series of separate companies, avoiding a $10,000 limit on individual or corporate contributions.

Defamation Suit

In court filings, Mr. Trepp has denied Mr. Montgomery's claims. He also filed a defamation suit against the chairman of the Nevada Democratic Party, Tom Collins, over published comments about the business dispute before last year's election. He cites "false testimony" by Mr. Montgomery, who he says "engaged in a campaign to spread falsehoods...which led up to a story published in the Wall Street Journal." The Journal isn't a defendant in the libel suit, which is pending in state court in Reno.

The Nov. 1 page-one story in the Journal reported that Mr. Gibbons and his family accompanied Mr. Trepp on a Caribbean cruise and that the congressman had helped Mr. Trepp win federal contracts. Mr. Gibbons at the time said his assistance to Mr. Trepp's company was simply intended to promote promising technology, and that the cruise and jet flights didn't violate House ethics rules because of his "close personal friendship" with Mr. Trepp.

Mr. Montgomery has accused Messrs. Trepp and Gibbons of using their political clout to get local FBI agents to raid his home and investigate him. In December, a federal magistrate found flagrant constitutional violations in the FBI raid, according to people briefed on her ruling, which remains under seal. The court found that the local FBI and U.S. attorney's office had effectively acted as armed enforcers for eTreppid's wealthy owner in a private business dispute with a former partner.

Mr. Peek, Mr. Trepp's attorney, said, "If the magistrate decided the search was improper, I'm disappointed in the decision, but without knowing the basis, I can't comment."

In his court filings, Mr. Montgomery alleges that Mr. Gibbons himself called in local federal officials at the behest of Mr. Trepp, who is one of Mr. Gibbons's biggest campaign contributors. In an interview last year with The Wall Street Journal, Mr. Gibbons's wife, Dawn, acknowledged that Mr. Trepp's wife had called her about the dispute. In response, Mr. Peek said: "Any citizen has a right to report a crime like a theft of intellectual property and computer equipment, and the government should rightfully act on the report of a crime regardless of who reports it."

Nevada Governor Facing FBI Probe Of Classified Federal Contracts (LVS)

By Brendan Riley

Las Vegas Sun, February 16, 2007

CARSON CITY, Nev. (AP) - Federal authorities confirmed Thursday that Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons is being investigated to see if there are links between any gifts or payments he may have received from a software company and secret military contracts the firm got when he was in Congress.

The newly elected Republican governor denied any wrongdoing and told The Associated Press that "they can look as deeply as they need to and I encourage them to do so, but there would have been absolutely no influence."

A federal law enforcement official confirmed the FBI probe. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation, said the inquiry is focusing on what role Gibbons played in awarding military contracts to eTreppid Technologies LLC in Reno and whether he received any gifts in exchange.

Gibbons said he had not been contacted by the FBI regarding his contacts with Warren Trepp, a longtime friend and owner of eTreppid who contributed nearly $100,000 to Gibbons' campaign for governor through different companies he controls.

"They never talked to me. They never have given me any kind of hint or whatever," he said.

The governor said he's a "pretty public person" and figured that if an investigation was under way he would have been contacted.

Asked whether he had hired an attorney as a result of the reported investigation, Gibbons said friends have volunteered to help and he would look into the issue if needed.

"I've done nothing wrong though," he said.

Trepp, a former chief trader for convicted junk-bond dealer Michael Milken, also has denied any wrongdoing.

Trepp's attorney, Stephen Peek, said Thursday that he and client were unaware of an investigation, "other than what we read."

"Warren Trepp was not contacted by any governmental agencies with respect to the allegations," Peek said.

The Wall Street Journal first reported that investigators were looking at whether federal contracting rules were violated in the case involving Gibbons, who was sworn in last month as governor after five terms in Congress, where he served on the House Intelligence and Armed Services committees.

Gibbons said he had read the news story and was "disturbed" that it "tried to connect dots where there are no dots to connect."

"I don't think that I have done anything that hasn't been done by others, which is opening doors for businesses in the state of Nevada," Gibbons said.

Gibbons had asked the House ethics committee in November for an opinion about whether he improperly reported flights aboard Trepp's jet and a Caribbean cruise paid for by Trepp, whose company has millions of dollars worth of classified federal software contracts from the Air Force, U.S. Special Operations Command and the CIA. Gibbons did not disclose the trip as required by House ethics rules and later asked the committee for an exemption, but left office before any action was taken.

The Journal reported new evidence had emerged in a federal lawsuit in Reno involving Trepp and Dennis Montgomery, his former technology chief at eTreppid. Montgomery claimed in November that Trepp and Gibbons used political clout to get local FBI agents to raid his home and investigate him.

Trepp and Montgomery are involved in litigation related to the copyrights of the company's video surveillance technology, which reportedly is used with unmanned aircraft to identify terrorism suspects.

The evidence cited includes e-mails to Trepp discussing a payment or gifts to then-Rep. Gibbons. The e-mails also show Gibbons using his congressional office to help the company seek classified military and civilian contracts, the newspaper said.

"Please don't forget to bring the money you promised Jim and Dawn," Trepp's wife, Jale Trepp, said in a March 22, 2005, e-mail days before Trepp and his wife embarked on the Caribbean cruise with Jim Gibbons and his wife, Dawn, a former Nevada state assemblywoman.

According to the Journal, Trepp responded minutes later saying: "Don't you ever send this kind of message to me! Erase this message from your computer right now!"

Gibbons said he knew nothing about the e-mails and questioned their authenticity, as did Peek.

"We categorically, unequivocally deny any such e-mails exist or were written," Peek said.

Peek also said Trepp and Gibbons were being "vilified" by Montgomery, who he described as "a disgruntled former employee who will do anything and everything to tarnish the names of two very well-respected citizens."

Gibbons called the Journal report the "misguided" result "of a civil case between two former business associates, which I have now been dragged into."

Tom Collins, the state Democratic Party chairman sued for defamation by Trepp after seeking access to the Reno court records on grounds they might show "potential improper conduct," renewed his criticism of the governor.

"Gov. Gibbons already has made a mockery of his office in more ways than one, and now we learn the FBI is investigating him for political corruption," he said. "This governor has embarrassed the state, and lost most of his effectiveness and respect. And we're not even two months into his term."

Nevada Governor Denies Wrongdoing Over Contracts (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons denied any wrongdoing in the face of a federal investigation into whether he accepted gifts or payments from a company that won government contracts while he was in Congress.

"They can look as deeply as they need to and I encourage them to do so, but there would have been absolutely no influence," the newly elected governor told the Associated Press in Carson City, Nev. The Wall Street Journal reported in a page-one article yesterday that federal authorities are investigating his dealings with a contractor in his state when he was a member of Congress.

A federal law-enforcement official said the preliminary inquiry is focusing on what role Mr. Gibbons may have played in awarding military contracts to eTreppid Technologies LLC in Reno and whether he received any gifts in exchange. Mr. Gibbons said he hadn't been contacted by the FBI regarding his contacts with Warren Trepp, whom he described as a longtime friend; Mr. Trepp is the majority owner of eTreppid and contributed nearly $100,000 to Mr. Gibbons's campaign for governor.

"They never talked to me. They never have given me any kind of hint or whatever," Mr. Gibbons said.

FBI Reportedly Investigating Nevada Governor Over Contractor's Gifts (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0133023

The FBI is investigating whether Nevada's governor failed to report gifts from a military contractor that he received while serving in Congress, law enforcement officials said yesterday.

Investigators are also examining whether Jim Gibbons, a Republican, performed any official acts on behalf of the contractor in exchange for gifts or payments, according to the officials.

The governor released a statement yesterday in which he defended his efforts to "introduce" the contractor's software products to fellow members of the House intelligence and Armed Services committees. He said he has "never been notified of any investigation by the FBI."

"I am confident that my actions were ethical," he said in his statement. "However, if there is ever found to be an inaccuracy or mistake, I will rectify it."

Reporting yesterday on the investigation, the Wall Street Journal published a series of alleged e-mail exchanges about Gibbons's dealings with Warren Trepp, the software entrepreneur whose company won millions of dollars' worth of classified military contracts during the time Gibbons served in Congress.

Among the dozens of e-mails is one allegedly sent days before Trepp and his wife prepared to set sail on a Caribbean cruise with Gibbons and his wife. In it, Trepp's wife allegedly wrote to her husband: "Please don't forget to bring the money you promised Jim and Dawn." Trepp's reply, according to the Journal report, was: "Don't you ever send this kind of message to me! Erase this message from your computer right now!"

The gifts allegedly included the cruise and travel on Trepp's private jet, as well as some suggestion of a payment that Trepp made to Gibbons, the Journal reported. Gibbons was first elected to the House in 1996 and served five terms.

The probe is at an early stage, and no conclusions have been reached about whether any crime was committed, one of the law enforcement officials said.

Trepp's attorney, Steven Peek, told the Journal that the software company executive has not been contacted by federal investigators about his relationship with Gibbons. Peek said yesterday that his client is unaware of any investigation and questions the authenticity of the e-mails cited in the Journal report.

None of those involved has disputed that Gibbons and Trepp are friends. Trepp and his relatives have donated more than $30,000 to Gibbons and his wife, who unsuccessfully made her own bid for Congress, in the past five years.

"My relationship with Mr. Trepp has no bearing on the effectiveness of the technology created by his company or its ability to aid in our efforts to improve national security," Gibbons said.

Details about the relationship between Gibbons and Trepp appear to have become public through a legal dispute between Trepp and a former employee of his company, eTreppid Technologies LLC. The case concerns the fair use of software technology, according to court papers.

The Reno, Nev., firm holds several federal software contracts, the nature of which has largely remained concealed because of the secrecy surrounding some aspects of military and intelligence budgeting.

In September, then-Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte filed a declaration in the eTreppid lawsuit, in which he said that if some elements of the case became public, it could be "reasonably expected to cause serious, and in some cases exceptionally grave damage to the national security of the United States."

The probe of Gibbons has also raised questions about the impending departure of U.S. Attorney Daniel G. Bogden of Nevada, whose office will oversee the investigation. Bogden is among seven U.S. attorneys who were abruptly fired by the Justice Department without explanation. His last day is Feb. 28.

Libby Defense Skirted Conspiracy Theory (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — In his opening statement three weeks ago in the federal perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, defense lawyer Theodore V. Wells Jr. dropped a bombshell. In dramatic tones, Wells declared that Libby had been the victim of a White House conspiracy to make Libby the fall guy for the CIA leak scandal.

But when the jury begins deliberating the fate of the former vice presidential aide next week, it will have seen virtually no evidence to back up the provocative claim.

The difference between what Wells promised and delivered, and how it will play with the 12-member panel, is just one of the wild cards as the trial winds up. Libby himself did not take the stand, and the unusually spare defense seemed built on the hope that prosecutors did not make their case.

Indeed, the case is hardly a slam-dunk for the government. The defense punched some holes in the stories and memories of government witnesses, including journalists.

The biggest worry for the prosecution may be whether the jury will think it fair to convict Libby, the only person charged in the three-year federal probe, when he was neither the first nor the only high-level government official to talk about CIA operative Valerie Plame.

Libby is charged with attempting to conceal his involvement in the events that led up to the disclosure of Plame's identity in published reports in the summer of 2003. Plame, a CIA arms-proliferation analyst, is married to Bush administration critic Joseph C. Wilson IV. The New York Times published a scathing anti-administration op-ed article by Wilson in July 2003, and eight days later his wife's identity was exposed by syndicated columnist Robert Novak.

Testimony at the trial indicated that Libby and several other administration officials were discussing Plame with journalists, offering up her identity to explain Wilson's CIA-directed trip to Africa, which turned up evidence that contradicted administration claims about Iraq's nuclear intentions.

Libby denied to a federal grand jury that he knew about Wilson's wife, but conceded that at one point he had heard it from a journalist, and then passed along the information as gossip.

The government said that he was lying, and that he had fabricated a story after realizing he may have disclosed classified information.

Special Prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald's parade of witnesses gave testimony indicating that Libby had come to know about Plame through a number of official sources, including Vice President Dick Cheney, well before he said he learned about her from a reporter. The government also called three journalists who spoke with Libby and who all disputed the version of conversations about Plame that Libby offered investigators.

By comparison, the defense that Wells offered was short and uneventful; the most provocative move was the decision not to call Libby to the witness stand.

His lawyers argued that if Libby misspoke to anyone, it was because he was swamped at work, essentially doing double duty as Cheney's chief of staff and national security advisor. His former right-hand man testified that Libby was a workaholic who was constantly dealing with life-and-death issues.

Many experts believe the jury wanted to hear that from the defendant himself, and that they will question why he chose to stay mum.

"This is a case that cries out for Libby to take the stand," said Jeffrey Frederick, a Charlottesville, Va., jury consultant. Under the law, the jury is not supposed to consider the fact that Libby did not testify in weighing his guilt or innocence. "Still, a number of jurors will be disappointed," he said.

But some lawyers said the move made sense. If Libby had taken the stand, Fitzgerald would have launched a far-reaching attack on his credibility.

"He stood the risk of being branded a liar," said John Hueston, a Los Angeles lawyer and former federal prosecutor who helped convict former Enron chief executive Kenneth L. Lay.

Hueston said the Lay case was an object lesson in why lawyers should think hard before subjecting their clients to cross-examination; Lay was quickly exposed as duplicitous.

Hueston said he thought that in Libby's case, "the defense made a sensible move in not risking everything."

How Wells will handle the once-jarring conspiracy theory is unclear.

In his opening statement, the lawyer produced a note from Cheney expressing concerns that Libby was being "sacrificed" and being put through "the meat grinder." The theory was that the White House was angling to protect political strategist Karl Rove and dispense with Libby — a theory that cast Libby in a sympathetic light.

But the conspiracy theory never really took root in court. Libby's lawyers never called Cheney or Rove to explore the theory.

Fitzgerald attacked the scapegoat theory by introducing videotape of former White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan, who it was insinuated was part of the alleged anti-Libby cabal, publicly clearing Libby of any wrongdoing. The defense did not call McClellan either.

Legal experts said Wells could deal with the dropped conspiracy claim during his closing statement Tuesday by saying that the defense strategy changed because the lawyers thought the government case was so weak that it did not have to be addressed.

But lawyers said failing to follow up such a dramatic claim with harder evidence could backfire. Undelivered promises can raise questions in jurors' minds about other defense claims.

"It gives the government an opportunity during closing arguments to cast doubt on the entire defense case," said Daniel French, a former U.S. attorney. Fitzgerald, he said, "is now free to say … 'You didn't hear about a conspiracy because it did not happen.' "

Libby Trial Offers Little On Rove Theory (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

Long Island Newsday, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Attorneys for I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby told jurors at the onset of the CIA leak trial last month that Libby was the victim of a conspiracy to protect White House political adviser Karl Rove. But like the anticipated testimony from Libby and Vice President Dick Cheney, details of any save-Rove conspiracy were promised but never materialized.

That leaves defense attorneys, who will spend the long weekend fine-tuning their closing arguments, to decide how to describe Rove for jurors when summing up their case on Tuesday.

Libby is charged with lying and obstructing the investigation into the 2003 leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity. Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald said Plame's name was leaked to the press as part of White House effort to discredit her husband, prominent war critic and former Ambassador Joseph Wilson.

During opening statements, defense attorney Theodore Wells described a different White House effort: one in which Rove, Bush's top political strategist, was protected for leaking information while Libby took the fall.

"Libby was an important staffer," Wells said. "But Karl Rove was the lifeblood of the Republican Party."

As evidence, Wells described how White House spokesman Scott McClellan publicly declared Rove's innocence in the leak case but failed to do so for Libby. Angered, Libby appealed to Cheney, who intervened and had McClellan exonerate Libby, too.

"Not going to protect one staffer and sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others," Cheney wrote in a note.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald says Libby felt guilty about discussing Plame with reporters and was trying to cover his tracks by lying to the FBI and to a grand jury investigating the leak. The Rove theory allows defense attorneys to say Libby felt wronged by the White House and was acting as an innocent man trying to clear his name.

But Libby's attorneys never dug deeper than that during the trial. While cross-examining government witnesses, they took every opportunity to mention Rove but never elicited details about how the president's top political operative was being protected or why.

Libby lawyers also opted not to call Cheney, McClellan or White House Communications Director Dan Bartlett to testify about whether Libby was being made a scapegoat.

The most explicit testimony on Rove came from columnist Robert Novak, who outed Plame in a July 2003 column. He testified that Rove, a frequent source, was one of two officials who told him about Plame. Libby, with whom he seldom spoke, was not a source.

The jury did not hear testimony that Rove was not indicted after testifying five times before Fitzgerald's grand jury, occasionally correcting misstatements he made in his earlier testimony.

Nor did the jury hear testimony about how Rove is credited as an architect of Republican political victories and has been accused by opponents of playing dirty tricks.

All that jurors heard is that Rove leaked Plame's identity and, from the outset, got political cover from the White House. He was never charged with a crime.

His name came up sporadically in handwritten memos and testimony. He was clearly cast as an important White House aide but his job was never fully explained. His influence was never clearly defined, only hinted at.

Bribery Charges Could Indicate Trouble For Unindicted Members (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, February 16, 2007

Indictments handed down to two major allies of former Rep. Randy “Duke” Cunningham (R-Calif.) earlier this week provide clues about other evidence and material federal prosecutors are seeking from Congress and which members could face more legal trouble in the wide-ranging bribery investigation.

In between the more lurid details about prostitutes, hundreds of thousands in cash payments and luxurious trips to Hawaii and Coeur d’Alene, Idaho included in the indictments of defense contractors Brent Wilkes and his longtime friend, former top-ranking CIA official Kyle “Dusty” Foggo, are eight references to letters Cunningham sent members of the Appropriations, Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence and Armed Services committees requesting tens of millions of dollars in contracts for Wilkes’ companies. Cunningham served on each of the panels.

The indictments do not include the panels’ responses to these requests; and that is, in all likelihood, because prosecutors were having a difficult time convincing Congress to hand over the relevant records – until recently. In December, the U.S.

Attorneys office in San Diego issued a series of subpoenas for records to the three committees. Also late in the year, prosecutors served subpoenas for testimony to two key staffers: one who worked as Cunningham's executive assistant and another who worked for the Appropriations Defense subcommittee, which was chaired by Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) during many of the time periods in question.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has been in discussions with the House General Counsel's office and the bipartisan legal advisory group about whether to work with prosecutors and provide access to the hundreds of pages of material requested or decide to protect the documents by invoking the Constitution's Speech or Debate clause, a separation-of-powers protection that has been used in the past to protect congressional information from judicial inquiry.

Earlier this week, a Democratic aide said discussions are "still ongoing" and the two sides hope to resolve the matter as soon as possible. Of the eight letters of request, four were sent to the House Appropriations panel and the indictment specifically mentions one sent to the chairman of the Appropriations Defense subcommittee.

"On or about July 31, 2001, in support of defendant Wilkes's request for Congressional Appropriations, coconspirator Cunningham wrote the chair of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee seeking to maintain the level of funding for his 'earmarks,'" the indictment states.

In another instance, the indictments mentions that "on or about May 1, 2000" Cunningham's legislative director sent a memo to a House Appropriations Committee staffer indicating that two programs that funded Wilkes's contracts, were among the congressman's "highest priorities."

The indictment also references a letter Cunningham sent in late May 1998 to the chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on national security, requesting a total of $64 million for Wilkes's Document Conversion Programs for fiscal year 1999.

Rep. Bill Young (R-Fla.) chaired that subcommittee until late November 1998 when Lewis moved into that post. The name of the panel was then changed from national security to defense subcommittee, although the indictment does not reflect that the name was changed in 1999.

On or about May 21, 1999, co-conspirator Cunningham wrote the chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on national Security, requesting a total of $94 million for the Document Conversion Program for fiscal year 2000, specifying that the funding was to be used for a Panama-based document scanning project, which had been using Wilkes's company, ADCS, as the prime contractor.

According to the indictments, Cunningham sent the House Armed Services Committee a series of letters.

For instance, in mid-April 2000, Cunningham wrote the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, on another Wilkes's project related to the Global Infrastructure Data Capture program, for which he requested a total of $16 million. At the time, Rep. Floyd Spence (R-S.C.) was chairman of the Armed Service Committee. Spence died in 2001.

But the indictment includes multiple letters sent to the House Armed Services Committee chairman when Cunningham's close friend, Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), was the panel's chief.

On or about Sept.15, 2004, coconspirator Cunningham sent a letter to the Chairman of the House Armed Services Committee on behalf of Wilkes's alleged coconspirator Mitchell Wade seeking the "Chairman's support in obtaining $16 million in funding for the Counterintelligence Deception Program during the 2005 conference negotiations."

In 2005, Cunningham wrote two letters: one to Hunter seeking $25 million in funding for what is referred to in the indictment as the MRG program during the 2006 budget cycle, and another to the chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence urging his support for the same program. Former Rep. Porter Goss (R-Fla.), who went on to become CIA director before resigning last May, was chairman of the Intelligence panel at the time.

F.B.I. Raids On The Mayor Make Him Topic A In A Small Town (NYT)

By Jonathan Miller

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

GUTTENBERG, N.J., Feb. 12 — The whispers were everywhere in this sliver of a town on the Hudson: Federal investigators were here looking for something.

Then on Jan. 26, the F.B.I. agents seized several computers, rifles and files from the home of Mayor David Delle Donna, as well as records from Town Hall.

Mr. Delle Donna has not been charged with a crime and insists that he has done nothing wrong, though a person close to the investigation said the January raids were connected to a former bar owner and eight others charged in 2005 with running a human trafficking ring.

DOJ_NMG_0133027

In that case, the defendants are accused of conspiring to recruit young women in Honduras and smuggle them into the United States, then forcing them — some are as young as 14 — to dance and entertain at three bars in Guttenberg and nearby Union City.

So far, four people have pleaded guilty, including Luisa Medrano, 51, of Cliffside Park, whom investigators had accused of being the leader of the trafficking operation. But in September she pleaded guilty to the relatively minor charges of illegally harboring aliens and tax evasion.

According to state election records, Ms. Medrano contributed $3,000 to Mr. Delle Donna's election campaigns. Mr. Delle Donna, 48, who has been mayor since 2002, told The Hudson Reporter last week: "I don't believe I've done anything illegal. I feel I'll be exonerated."

Then he went on to say: "We live our lives based on the premise that we're supposed to always try to help people when you're a public servant. I have always had a very open-door policy here. I welcome people into my home, sometimes people I barely know, because they've come to me for help. And in the past, I've gone out of my way to help. I'm just disappointed that some of that help can be misconstrued as being illegal."

When contacted for this article, the mayor declined to comment further.

The January raids have left many in this town of 10,800 scratching their heads. "I thought it was crazy," said Leon June, 51, who was waiting for a bus recently on Bergenline Avenue. "It's a small town; how much damage can you do?"

And although no one is suggesting any connection to the trafficking, chatter in this town that measures all of 4 blocks wide and 11 blocks long reached new heights in recent weeks after two fires broke out at the only high-rise apartment building in town, killing one person, and another fire erupted at an abandoned building.

But Guttenberg — a name that even New Jerseyans are not sure how to pronounce (the first syllable sounds like gut, not toot) — is in Hudson County, where skullduggery is a spectator sport, and attention soon snapped back from the fires to Town Hall.

In addition to being mayor, a part-time job that pays $6,700 a year, Mr. Delle Donna is the coordinator for maintenance at the Hudson County Schools of Technology in North Bergen.

The day after the raid on the Delle Donna home, a modest two-story house wrapped in green aluminum siding, the mayor's wife, Anna, said in a telephone interview: "We don't know anything. We are very good people."

She added that the weapons the F.B.I. took were hunting rifles, though her husband has not hunted in 15 years.

The mayor's political adversaries say he is "a nice guy." "David Delle Donna doesn't come across as a bad person," an opponent said.

The United States attorney's office, which is handling the trafficking case, declined to comment.

This isn't the first time that tiny Guttenberg, wedged in next to West New York, has been on the wrong side of the headlines.

In 2003, the former mayor, Peter LaVilla, pleaded guilty to misappropriating campaign funds and using the money for a private brokerage account after an investigation by the United States attorney's office. In 2002, a councilman accused of receiving illegal advances on his salary resigned, although he was never formally charged. The same year, the town's chief financial officer pleaded guilty to misappropriation of funds.

Despite the latest goings-on, the mayor is keeping up with his normal responsibilities at the school and at Town Hall. At a council meeting on Monday, he could be found poring over the minutiae of local government: youth softball and baseball signups, problems with the prescription drug program, a shortage of computers in the planning office.

Though it was the first meeting since the January raids, no one spoke of the recent investigations and prosecutions, except the town's attorney, Charles Daglian, who said outside the meeting in a second-floor conference room at Town Hall: "I've been a lawyer 27 years. I've seen it all."

New York Boy Band Architect's Florida Office Searched By FBI (NSDY/AP)

By Travis Reed, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 16, 2007

ORLANDO, Fla. -- Federal agents executed search warrants on Thursday at New York native Lou Pearlman's Florida office and home, the latest in a string of legal problems facing the man who built the Backstreet Boys and 'NSYNC.

The search came less than two weeks after a state court-appointed receiver took control of three Pearlman companies. A judge issued that order after Florida's Office of Financial Regulation alleged that for 15 years Pearlman has sold unregistered securities through a bogus savings program. Also on Thursday, Pearlman's attorneys in that case filed a court motion to withdraw from representing him.

Pearlman, who moved to Orlando in 1990, conjured multi-platinum success by piecing together boy bands in the 1990s. He claims to have done nearly $2 billion in retail music sales and owns a restaurant franchise, a new steakhouse and a dining and entertainment complex in downtown Orlando. He has been sued over the years by several of the young stars he managed, who accused him of locking them into predatory deals. Pearlman has said the now-resolved lawsuits were just overblown contract negotiations.

FBI agents and other law enforcement investigators spent hours on Thursday carrying boxes away from Pearlman's offices.

The FBI referred comment to the U.S. attorney's office, which issued a statement saying: "Other than confirming the existence of an investigation, we are not in a position to comment further at this time. Today's searches are part of this investigation."

A former Pearlman spokeswoman reached for comment Thursday said she has not worked for him since last month. Pearlman did not immediately return a message from The Associated Press left on one of his voice mail accounts. He could not be reached by e-mail because the inbox was over capacity.

Stephen LaFreniere, the head of an Orlando real estate brokerage who said he was hired to manage Pearlman's complex, said he's been unable to pay its electric and garbage bills for three or four months because Pearlman's employees have been collecting the rent before he could get it. LaFreniere said he doesn't know where the combined $100,000 from Church Street Station's 15 or 16 tenants has been going. He also had no idea where Pearlman was.

"I've only met the man twice," he said.

Besides the state's allegations and possible federal charges from the Thursday search, Pearlman faces four lawsuits from banks alleging past-due loans of $14 million and overdue loan guarantees of $49 million, according to the Office of Financial Regulation complaint.

The state accuses Pearlman of collecting more than $95 million from more than 1,000 investors "by making a variety of misrepresentations." He's accused of promising to put people's money in insured bank accounts earning better-than-average dividends but instead transferring those funds to himself and his companies.

The state found less than $15,000 in four bank accounts used over the past four years for Pearlman's savings program, according to the complaint.

Ranbaxy Says U.S. Officials Searched Two N.J. Offices (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Catherine Larkin

Bloomberg, February 16, 2007

Feb. 15 (Bloomberg) -- Ranbaxy Laboratories Ltd., India's biggest drugmaker, said U.S. officials conducted a surprise search of two of its New Jersey offices yesterday, seeking documents on a variety of topics.

Federal agents spent all day at Ranbaxy's administrative office in Princeton and manufacturing facility in New Brunswick, said Chuck Caprariello, a spokesman for the company. He declined to specify which documents were taken and said business operations have continued as usual.

``The only thing we know right now is that it was an information request and they needed information on a variety of topics," Caprariello said today in a telephone interview. ``We're trying to open up dialogue now as to why, and what information they wanted."

The Trentonian, a New Jersey newspaper, reported today that criminal investigators from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration searched the Princeton facility, saying they were serving a warrant.

The U.S. Attorney's Office in Maryland, part of the Justice Department, is working on the Ranbaxy case and won't comment because there is a pending investigation, spokeswoman Vickie LeDuc said today in a telephone interview from her Baltimore office. Doug Arbesfeld, a spokesman for the FDA, said the Justice Department was handling all media inquiries.

Ranbaxy, a maker of generic drugs based in Gurgaon, near New Delhi, issued a statement after the close of trading in Mumbai saying it wasn't aware of any wrongdoing. Earlier in the day, the company's shares had their biggest one-day percentage drop in more than seven months. The shares fell 21.1 rupees, or 5.1 percent, to 393.5 rupees on the Bombay Stock Exchange.

6 Years In Prison For Strip Club Bribes (AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 16, 2007

(AP) - LAS VEGAS-A former Clark County commissioner was sentenced to six years in prison Wednesday for delivering bribes to politicians on behalf of a strip club owner.

U.S. District Judge Larry Hicks branded Lance Malone the "organizer, manager and leader" of "probably as gross a case of political corruption in the state of Nevada, certainly, that has ever occurred and been successfully prosecuted."

Hicks blamed Malone for distributing up to $550,000 in bribes to three former commission colleagues from 2000 to 2003, and said he was imposing three years more than Malone received in a related case in San Diego. Malone will serve the sentences at the same time; he also was fined $100,000.

Malone pleaded guilty in September to one count of conspiracy under the federal Racketeer Influenced Corrupt Organizations, or RICO Act, for the Nevada case.

In the San Diego case, Malone was convicted on similar charges that he delivered bribes to politicians there on behalf of strip club owner Michael Galardi.

On Wednesday, Malone, 45, told the judge that he had been greedy, and he pleaded for leniency.

"I did start with good intentions, and those intentions went horribly, horribly wrong," Malone told the judge.

"I did things that I regret and I wish I could take back, but I cannot," he said.

Malone becomes the third person sentenced in a case that grew from years of FBI wiretaps and led to indictments against Galardi, Malone, and former Clark County commissioners Dario Herrera, Erin Kenny and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey. The commission wields control over a wide area of southern Nevada, including the Las Vegas Strip.

Herrera, 33, is serving four years and two months in prison. Kincaid-Chauncey, 68, is serving 30 months. They were convicted last year.

Kenny and Galardi, who said he sought votes from the commission that would benefit his strip clubs, pleaded guilty and awaits sentencing.

West Mifflin Policeman Held For Trial (PTR)

By Karen Zapf, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, February 16, 2007

In a hearing that lasted almost four hours, seven witnesses testified Thursday about alleged wrongdoing by suspended West Mifflin police Officer Noel Missig.

Brookline District Judge Charles McLaughlin held Missig, 39, of West Mifflin, for trial on charges of perjury, simple assault, obstructing the administration of law or government function, tampering with public records or information, two counts of unsworn falsification to authorities and official oppression.

The charges stem from a joint FBI and state police investigation that spanned four years and led to accusations that Missig planted cocaine in a suspect's clothing, assaulted a handcuffed boy and lied about the seizure of video poker machines from a borough business.

Mark Kocak, of West Mifflin, testified that on March 31, 2004, Missig and other officers came to his Maryland Avenue home looking for Richard Jasek, who was wanted by police for a probation violation.

Kocak testified that he saw an officer hand Missig a package that was on a table, and Missig placed the package, which contained cocaine, into the pocket of a sweatshirt belonging to Jasek.

Kocak said Missig told him: "This is going to help you out."

Kocak and Jasek were charged with drug violations.

Another witness, Andrew Palmer, 23, testified that during his arrest by West Mifflin police in 2001, Missig kicked him in the ribs and later choked him and slammed his head against a wall at the police station.

Mark Rider, former borough field inspector, testified that he did not give Missig information in 2000 that there were video poker machines in a Pennsylvania Avenue business.

When obtaining a search warrant for the business, Missig claimed the information about the gambling machines came from Rider.

"I never saw the poker machines until the morning they were taken out of the building," Rider said.

Stephen Greenberg, Missig's lawyer, said the alleged misconduct did not take place.

Missig, a borough officer for 12 years, remains free on his own recognizance. His formal arraignment is scheduled for May 8.

Missig's suspension without pay remains in effect until Tuesday's borough council meeting.

Legal Team Honored For Winning Gang Conviction (LAT)

From Times Staff And Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

The Anti-Defamation League on Thursday honored the federal agents and prosecutors involved in convicting four members of a Latino street gang in Highland Park last year for violating the civil rights of African Americans with a campaign of threats and violence, including murder.

The group noted that the case against the Avenues gang "broke new ground as the first time a street gang was convicted of violating federal hate crime laws."

Honored at a luncheon at the Skirball Cultural Center were federal prosecutors Bobby Bernstein, Alexander Bustamante and Thomas O'Brien; FBI agents Jerry Fradella and Christian M. Haugen; and federal paralegal Martha Lovejoy.

Two sheriff's deputies, an LAPD lieutenant and a Pasadena police corporal were also honored for working to stop hate crimes and ease race relations.

Prison For Collector In Protection Scam (CHIT)

Extortionist preyed on Russian businesses

A Russian native, who prosecutors say preyed on Russian businesses in Chicago for "protection" money, was sentenced Thursday to more than 7 years in prison for extortion.

"I would like to die at home," Israil Vengerin, 69, of Chicago, said through a Russian interpreter from the U.S. Bureau of Prisons' medical facility in Rochester, Minn., where he took part in the sentencing by videoconference.

Vengerin's lawyer, Ronald J. Clark, sought leniency, saying his client is dying in prison from heart problems while he awaits a transplant.

U.S. District Judge John Darrah imposed an 87-month prison term, saying Vengerin "terrorized" some in the Russian community.

Darrah said he took into consideration Vengerin's health but felt he needed to "send a message that this kind of conduct will not be tolerated."

If Vengerin's condition becomes terminal, the judge said he would consider reducing his sentence.

Last October, a jury convicted Vengerin on seven counts of extortion and mail fraud for threatening violence to obtain money from victims in four separate schemes.

Prosecutors said Vengerin held himself out in Chicago's Russian community as "a strong-arm collector" who preyed on businesses for protection money in return for guarantees that the owners wouldn't be harmed and their businesses wouldn't be vandalized.

Much of the testimony came from secretly recorded tapes of Vengerin made by an associate who helped collect the protection money while working undercover for the FBI. At least two victims also recorded Vengerin with the FBI's cooperation.

In one incident, a Russian businessman agreed with Vengerin to stage a burglary in 1999 at his painting-supply store in Skokie, but the insurance company refused to pay his $273,000 claim for losses.

Thinking he had been double-crossed, Vengerin extorted the businessman for his promised share of the money from the staged burglary, prosecutors said.

By 2004, the businessman, Vladimir Meltser, agreed to cooperate with the FBI and recorded a conversation in which Vengerin threatened to beat Meltser "to within an inch of his life" if he didn't pay up, according to court records.

After Vengerin demanded $1,000, Meltser paid him in two $500 installments with money supplied by the FBI, the records showed.

In another instance, Vengerin struck a businessman in the stomach when he balked at his demand for money in 1999. The victim then handed over a check for $1,500, authorities said.

Another victim contacted the FBI in 2000 after three Vengerin associates demanded he produce $20,000 the next day or they would harm him and his girlfriend. The victim paid $15,000 supplied by the FBI, authorities said.

Assistant U.S. Atty. T. Marcus Funk called Vengerin a bully who took advantage of an insular ethnic community often unwilling to go to law enforcement.

Vengerin's wife, Alina, wept in the courtroom as she pleaded for mercy, saying of her husband, "He is a very peaceful person and will not harm a fly."

Russian Court Delays Forbes Murder Trial (AP)

By Vladimir Isachenkov

AP, February 16, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0133031

MOSCOW - A court postponed jury selection Thursday in the retrial of three men linked to the 2004 murder of the American-born editor of Forbes magazine's Russian edition after two of the defendants failed to show up, a court spokeswoman said.

Prosecutors had accused two Chechen men of killing Paul Klebnikov, but a jury trial acquitted them last year. The Supreme Court later overturned the acquittal and ordered a new trial.

Moscow City Court spokeswoman Anna Usacheva said Thursday's session to choose jurors for the retrial was postponed until March 14 because defendants Kazbek Dukuzov and Musa Vakhayev failed to show up. The two have been free since their acquittal.

A third man whom prosecutors linked to the Klebnikov case, Moscow notary Fail Sadretdinov, was convicted last month on an unrelated crime and sentenced to nine years in prison. Sadretdinov was brought to the courtroom Thursday, but his lawyer, Ruslan Koblev, argued that his poor health made it impossible to attend the retrial.

"Sadretdinov needs medical treatment," Koblev told The Associated Press, saying that his client was suffering from epilepsy and suffered seizures during his trial last year. "It's absurd to have him face trial."

Prosecutors accused Sadretdinov of involvement in the alleged attempted murder of a businessman, and claimed he was linked with the other two defendants who were accused of killing Klebnikov. Sadretdinov denies the charges.

Koblev criticized the retrial as politically driven, saying that authorities were pressuring the court to convict the defendants. President Vladimir Putin last year praised the Supreme Court's decision to launch a retrial.

Prosecutors have claimed that Dukuzov and Vakhayev killed Klebnikov on behalf of Khozh-Akhmed Nukhayev, who was the subject of Klebnikov's book "Conversations With a Barbarian." Nukhayev remains at large.

Critics of Russia's justice system, which is widely seen as lacking independence from the Kremlin, have said prosecutors failed to properly pursue other lines of investigation.

Klebnikov, 41, an American of Russian origin who was editor of Forbes magazine's Russian edition, was gunned down outside its Moscow offices in July 2004. Many believed the killing was connected to Klebnikov's work investigating corruption and Russia's shadowy business world, but the case remains unsolved.

The U.S.-based media watchdog group, the Committee to Protect Journalists, called on court officials to make the proceedings open to the public, to ensure the suspects are present for the trial and to make sure the jury is sequestered - something that rarely happens in Russian judicial proceedings.

"The first trial was riddled with procedural violations that were hidden from the public with closed-door proceedings and a gag order on all participants," Executive Director Joel Simon said.

Russian Trial On Journalist's Slaying Opens (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 15 — The retrial of three men charged with murdering Paul Klebnikov, the American editor of the Russian-language edition of Forbes magazine here, opened in confusion today as the two suspects failed to appear in court and the judge postponed the beginning of jury selection for a month.

A jury acquitted the two suspects — Kazbek Dukuzov and Musa Vakhayev, both Chechens — after a closed trial last year that raised questions about the Russian government's handling of the case, which gained prominence because of Mr. Klebnikov's renown as an aggressive investigative journalist.

The Russian Supreme Court overturned that acquittal last fall and ordered a new trial, but the men have since remained free. Their whereabouts remains unclear, although a lawyer who represented Mr. Dukuzov in the case until last month, Ruslan A. Khasanov, said he believed his client had returned to his home in Urus Martin, a small city in Chechnya.

The prosecutor general's office declined to discuss today's events, which like the previous trial occurred behind closed doors. A spokeswoman for the Moscow City Court, where the trial is taking place, also declined to elaborate beyond saying that the proceedings would resume on March 14. It was not clear whether arrest warrants had been issued to bring the men to the court.

Mr. Klebnikov, an American citizen of Russian ancestry, was shot to death outside his office in July 2004. He was one in a series of journalists before and since who have died in unsolved circumstances in Russia.

With international attention focused on the killing, including personal appeals by President Bush to President Vladimir V. Putin for a thorough investigation, prosecutors accused Mr. Dukuzov and Mr. Vakhayev of carrying out the killing on behalf of a Chechen separatist commander, Khozh-Akhmed Nukhayev. Mr. Nukhayev was the subject of one of Mr. Klebnikov's books, "A Conversation with a Barbarian."

DOJ_NMG_0133032

A third defendant, Fail Sadretdinov, was charged with related crimes and also acquitted last year. He was later convicted of other crimes and sentenced to nine years in prison. As a prisoner, he appeared in court today.

Mr. Sadretdinov's lawyer, Ruslan P. Koblev, said the opening session was largely a formality given the absence of the other suspects, as well as representatives of Mr. Klebnikov's family. He described the failure of the suspects to appear as unusual.

Mr. Klebnikov's brother, Michael, expressed concern about the latest development. "We continue to think that the best way for this to be done — for it to be just and fair — is to do it openly," he said in a telephone interview from New York, where he lives. "Secondly, we have a question of why they were not in custody in the first place. They are murder suspects."

Mr. Koblev said that the conviction of his client on unrelated charges made it clear that the prosecution was biased against the three men, regardless of the evidence. "If they are in a normal state of mind, and they see what happened to Sadretdinov, I am sure they understand that they cannot pin hopes on justice in this trial," he said in a telephone interview.

Mr. Khasanov said he had not reached an agreement to represent Mr. Dukuzov in the new trial, adding that he had told this to the court. He said the normal procedure for notifying a suspect of a trial would be to send a written summons by mail — a dubious prospect in a region battered by two wars since 1994.

Retrial In Klebnikov Case Delayed (MOSCOWT)

By Carl Schreck

Moscow Times, February 16, 2007

Two Chechens accused of murdering U.S. journalist Paul Klebnikov failed to appear in Moscow City Court on Thursday, delaying jury selection in the high-profile case.

Kazbek Dukuzov and Musa Vakhayev are being tried for a second time for the July 2004 shooting of Klebnikov, 41, the former editor of the Russian edition of Forbes magazine.

They were acquitted in May, but the Supreme Court reversed that ruling in November, sending both men back to court.

But they were nowhere to be found Thursday. "We have no written explanation of why they did not show up," court spokeswoman Tatyana Zubaryova said.

The proceeding was closed to the public.

Vakhayev's lawyer, Vladimir Gorulkov, said in court that his client had "valid reasons" for his absence, Zubaryova said. No one showed up to represent Dukuzov, Zubaryova said. Ruslan Koblev, the lawyer for Moscow notary Fail Sadretdinov, said Dukuzov had received his court summons but was in Chechnya; he said he did not know whether Dukuzov would return to Moscow for the trial.

Koblev said Vakhayev was in Moscow but stayed home Thursday because he was ill.

Sadretdinov is suspected of ordering Vakhayev and Dukuzov to kill a Moscow businessman in an unrelated killing.

Authorities were unable to convict Sadretdinov, but they did manage to get him for illegally registering an apartment. Last month, he was sentenced by the Preobrazhensky District Court to nine years in prison. Authorities are now retrying Sadretdinov for ordering the murder of the Moscow businessman.

The same jury that is being selected to hear the retrial in the Klebnikov killing is also slated to hear Sadretdinov's case.

The Klebnikov retrial has been postponed until March 14, Zubaryova said.

Ruslan Khazanov, who served as Dukuzov's attorney in the first trial, said he was no longer representing Dukuzov. He added that did not know why the suspects did not show up to court. "But clearly they know they won't get a fair trial," Khazanov said.

Koblev, Sadretdinov's lawyer, said the harsh sentence handed down to his client for the illegal registration might prompt Dukuzov and Vakhayev to flee the country to avoid the retrial in the Klebnikov case.

Alexander Vasilyev, a spokesman for the Prosecutor General's Office, said Thursday that he could not comment on Vakhayev's and Dukuzov's wherabouts, but he did indicate that the trial was unlikely to be open to the public.

The Klebnikov family and media watchdog groups have criticized the decision to close the first trial and have called for opening the second trial.

"You and I both know that the case is full of secret documents," Vasilyev said.

But Koblev said only four pages -- out of 38 volumes of case materials -- contained classified information.

That classified information was said to detail secret methods used by the Federal Security Service to collect evidence against the defendants.

"The first trial was riddled with procedural violations that were hidden from the public with closed-door proceedings and a gag order on all participants," Joel Simon, executive director of the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists, said in a statement Wednesday.

"We call on Russian court officials to open the hearing to the public to ensure a fair trial."

Prosecutors contend Vakhayev and Dukuzov had been ordered to kill Klebnikov by Khozh-Akhmed Nukhayev, a Chechen separatist who appeared in Klebnikov's 2003 book "Conversation With a Barbarian."

The Klebnikov family communicated through a spokesman Thursday that it had nothing to say. In a statement released in November, after the Supreme Court ordered a retrial, the family said it would "suspend for the time being our own direct participation in the case due to the enormous emotional toll on us."

But family members said they "reserve the right to become involved again at any time, as the trial unfolds."

Larisa Maslennikova, the lawyer representing the Klebnikov family, said on Ekho Moskvy radio Thursday that it was "above all" the government's job to bring the slain journalist's killers to justice.

Recent history suggests that may be asking a lot.

While the killings of Russian journalists Dmitry Kholodov, Vladislav Listyev and Larisa Yudina in the 1990s all captured headlines, none of these cases has actually seen a single conviction.

Nor has anyone been convicted in the October 2006 killing of Anna Politkovskaya.

Inglewood Police Chief Confirms Misconduct Investigation (LAT)

By Andrew Blankstein

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

Inglewood interim Police Chief J.I. Davis today confirmed that some members of his department were being investigated for misconduct, but he refused to give specifics.

At an afternoon news conference at Inglewood police headquarters, Davis insisted that his department began its probe after developing its own information of possible police corruption.

"The investigation was initiated in January 2006, after hearing rumors and developing information about possible misconduct," he told reporters.

Davis refused to give specifics, but The Times has reported that at least six current or former Inglewood police officers are under investigation for allegedly having sex with female employees of massage parlors and other adult businesses that had been the target of a high-profile law enforcement crackdown.

Davis denied reports that the department's investigation was a result of information gathered by federal officials.

"That the information was the result of a federal investigation" is incorrect, he said. "The department did not receive information from any federal agency."

But sources familiar with the misconduct allegations said that federal authorities, including the U.S. attorney's office and the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, began hearing about the alleged involvement of police officers last year.

Davis said he called the news conference to stress his department's role in attempting to deal seriously and aggressively with the allegations.

Davis, who took office in May after the investigation was underway, would only say that his agency was actively pursuing a difficult inquiry. He said the officers had logged between three and six years on the force, and some were on street patrol.

Inglewood, a working-class city of 112,000, has long struggled with prostitution problems. Because of its proximity to Los Angeles International Airport, Inglewood has numerous hotels lining its main commercial streets.

Davis insisted that the investigation, which involves administrative rather than criminal improprieties, did not indicate there was a systemic problem with officer misconduct. He said the investigation could lead to changes in training and management.

The investigation comes as the department, the seventh-largest police agency in the county, struggles to fill two dozen vacancies in its 213-officer force.

Sources have told The Times that the internal affairs investigation began after federal authorities launched an investigation of money-laundering and prostitution involving women smuggled into Los Angeles from Asia.

That probe, which resulted in charges against more than two dozen people, led to allegations that Inglewood officers engaged in the sexual liaisons -- sometimes in uniform -- during work hours and off duty, according to several local and federal sources familiar with the case.

Evidence seized by federal agents and local investigators included "very detailed ledgers" that suggested Inglewood officers were receiving sexual favors at the businesses without paying, according to one source close to the investigation.

The ledgers, the source said, had the names of customers and the amounts they paid -- except when the customers were police officers. In those cases, the women allegedly entered a symbol.

Word of the inquiry comes less than two months after the FBI confirmed that it was investigating two Inglewood police officers in the alleged rape of a woman they stopped on suspicion of prostitution. The woman's attorney said last week that he has filed a claim against the city and is awaiting an answer from authorities on whether the two officers have been arrested or charged.

Davis today said there were no developments in that case.

To date, sources say, none of the officers has been fired, though some have retired or left the city for other departments.

The internal affairs investigation began more than a year ago when several Inglewood massage parlors and tanning salons were the focus of federal allegations of money laundering and prostitution.

To date, 18 people have pleaded guilty in that investigation, and four others -- including the alleged owner of the brothels, Kimberly Mao -- are awaiting trial.

Mao has pleaded not guilty to the federal charges and has repeatedly denied involvement in prostitution or money-laundering.

But in a recent interview organized by Mao, a dozen women who worked for her at the businesses told The Times that they had seen or heard of officers coming into the massage parlors and sometimes demanding sexual services.

The women, who denied they were prostitutes, recalled several specific incidents, including one in which officers donned masks to hide their identities and pointed guns at employees. Another employee told The Times that an older officer exposed himself in an unsuccessful effort to have her engage in sex with him.

Investigation Nearing End In Case Of Pizza Man Killed By Bomb Collar (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, February 16, 2007

More than three years after a bank robbery suspect in Erie, Pa., was killed when a bomb locked around his neck exploded, a federal prosecutor has summoned investigators to meet today in Pittsburgh to help her determine whether to file charges in the case.

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan says her meeting with investigators from the FBI, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and the Pennsylvania State Police indicates that the probe into the bizarre death of Brian Wells, 46, is nearly complete. "The investigation is in its final stages," she says.

A federal grand jury in Erie has heard testimony from "numerous" witnesses, Buchanan says, adding that the probe has been complicated by the deaths of at least two potential witnesses.

The death of Wells, a pizza deliveryman, received national attention because it occurred on live television and because of the many questions it left. No one has been arrested in the case, and it remains unclear whether Wells was a willing participant in a bank robbery plot that went awry or was the unwitting victim of a such a plot.

Investigators also have examined other possibilities. Among them: that the intent all along was not to rob the bank, but to send Wells to a torturous death. Or, that Wells was part of a robbery plot but thought the bomb was fake.

Buchanan declined to comment on whether authorities believe they have resolved such questions.

Wells' strange odyssey began about 1:30 p.m. on Aug. 28, 2003, when an unidentified person called Mama Mia's Pizzaria in Erie and ordered two sausage pizzas to be delivered to what was described as a construction site. Wells, a longtime employee of the restaurant, was sent to deliver the pizzas.

At some point afterward, the bomb was locked around Wells' neck. He drove his Geo Metro to a PNC Bank branch and walked inside carrying a nine-page note that told him how to rob the bank. The note also told Wells to quickly make a series of stops after leaving the bank, suggesting that his progress was being monitored.

When he was stopped by police in a nearby parking lot after leaving the bank with an undisclosed amount of money, Wells had less than 30 minutes to make three more stops, according to the note. The bomb exploded shortly after officers had stopped Wells.

Just before the explosion, Wells offered a possible clue when he told officers that whoever put the device around his neck "pulled a key out and started a timer."

Throughout the investigation, Wells' relatives and friends have sought to cast him as an innocent victim. On a website — www.brianwells.net — they have suggested that he was abducted by up to seven men.

"This case is not solved," the site says. "The Killers must be caught before they Kill again."

Wells' family members could not be reached for comment Thursday.

8 In Inland Empire Accused Of 'Fight Club' Crimes (LAT)

By Sara Lin And Jonathan Abrams, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0133035

Police say the gang, founded by Murrieta high school football players, began as bullies but escalated to robberies, burglaries and assaults.

Eight former students of Murrieta Valley High School, including former football players accused of belonging to a "Fight Club" gang, were arrested Thursday on suspicion of waging a crime spree of robberies, burglaries and assaults over two years.

The gang was founded in 2004 by a group of football players who injected anabolic steroids to enhance their performance on the field — and beat up students who "disrespected" their members, said Lt. Dennis Vrooman, spokesman for the Murrieta Police Department.

The suspects started calling themselves "Fight Club" and would challenge one another to fistfights outside the Murrieta school — attracting groups of juvenile spectators, police said. The gang appears to have been modeled on the gang depicted in the 1999 film "Fight Club," starring Brad Pitt.

"They essentially started out as bullies in the school and graduated to crimes of violence," Vrooman said. They had dog tags and baseball caps with an "FC" logo, he said.

Members of the gang would case homes in Murrieta and neighboring Temecula while attending parties, and come back days later to burglarize the residences, investigators allege. They first stole guns, which were later used in robberies at liquor stores and gas stations, Vrooman said.

Members of the gang attempted a home-invasion robbery and committed a car theft, two cases of arson, multiple armed robberies, false imprisonment and several assaults, police said.

Four of the suspects were arrested on suspicion of participating in a criminal street gang, which when considered with the other allegations could lead to a life sentence if convicted, Vrooman said.

The arrests came after a six-month investigation by the Murrieta-Temecula Regional Gang Task Force.

Tim Hales, commander of the task force, said several of those taken into custody came from good neighborhoods.

"They're not poor kids," Hales said. "These are kids that came from good families, for the most part."

Hales added that not all of those arrested were active in the gang: "Not all are Fight Club members; some are active members and some are associates."

Those arrested were Travis Brenn Baker, 20, of Winchester; Christopher David Owen Bredesen, 18, of Murrieta; Gilberto Cuevas, 18, of Murrieta; Simon Lyle Johnson, 20, of Murrieta; Nathan R. Martinez, 21, of La Habra; Michael Robert Petty, 20, of Murrieta; William J. Unmacht IV, 21, of Murrieta; and Martin Arturo Valle, 21, of Murrieta. A 17-year-old from Murrieta, a student at the school, also was arrested.

Three suspects remain at large, including Anthony Craig Smith, 19, of Murrieta, who is accused of stealing a motorcycle and setting it ablaze, police said.

The father of Simon Johnson said in a telephone interview Thursday that his son knew the other suspects, but was not involved in the Fight Club.

He said police told him that Johnson, who was charged with possession of stolen property and possession of a concealable firearm, may have been present when a stolen firearm was sold. Detectives had questioned the father and others about a firearm that was said to have disappeared from a house after a party.

After that, Johnson's father said, his son disassociated himself from the others and has been working for a flooring company.

"When all this started … Simon made the choice to say, 'These guys are bad news,' and he cut the cord with them," said Johnson's father, who declined to give his first name.

The father of the 17-year-old said the teen was on the football team. Police officials told him his son's arrest was related to a MySpace.com posting that was interpreted as a threat, he said.

Family members of Cuevas, Petty and Valle declined to comment. Family members of Baker, Bredesen, Martinez and Unmacht could not be reached for comment.

Murrieta Valley High School Principal Renate Jefferson declined to comment about the arrests.

As for the allegation by police that football team members used steroids, Jefferson said that coaches at the school regularly warn students about the dangers of using those performance-enhancing substances, as well as drugs and alcohol.

Former Murrieta Valley Athletic Director Dave Zirkle said he knew of three of the former players — Martinez, Petty and Unmacht — adding that Unmacht's father was an assistant coach while his son played for the team.

"They were never in trouble that I knew of. They were good students and good kids," Zirkle, who retired in 2004, said.

A spokeswoman for the Murrieta Valley Unified School District said school officials had cooperated fully with police, but declined to comment further.

DOJ_NMG_0133036

Police said the gang was well known on the high school campus. "It was pretty widely known that one, you don't mess with people from Fight Club; and two, everyone knew who they were and were afraid of them," Hales, the task force commander, said.

The group was responsible for dozens of assaults, sending at least one boy to the hospital for several days, Hales said.

Hales described the gang as amateurs when it came to burglarizing homes and robbing stores.

"They were doing things unmasked and ungloved," he said. "Eventually they learned. The last few were done masked and gloved."

Still, their alleged targets were chosen erratically. They allegedly burglarized gas stations and liquor stores for cash and broke into businesses to steal computers and workout equipment. But in residences, they allegedly swiped drug paraphernalia, baseball caps and clothing.

"I don't think wanted high market value; they just wanted things for themselves," Hales said.

The suspects are to be arraigned Feb. 20.

CIVIL LAW:

Special Counsel Accused Of Intimidation In Probe (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

A trouble-plagued whistle-blower investigation at the Office of Special Counsel -- whose duties include shielding federal whistle-blowers -- hit another snag this week when employees accused the special counsel of intimidation in the probe.

The Office of Personnel Management's inspector general has been investigating allegations by current and former OSC employees that Special Counsel Scott J. Bloch retaliated against underlings who disagreed with his policies -- by, among other means, transferring them out of state -- and tossed out legitimate whistle-blower cases to reduce the office backlog. Bloch denies the accusations, saying that under his leadership the agency has grown more efficient and receptive to whistle-blowers.

The probe is the most serious of many problems at the agency since Bloch, a Kansas lawyer who served at the Justice Department's Task Force for Faith-based and Community Initiatives, was appointed by President Bush three years ago. Since he took the helm in 2004, staffers at the OSC, a small agency of about 100 lawyers and investigators, have accused him of a range of offenses, from having an anti-gay bias to criticizing employees for wearing short skirts and tight pants to work.

The 16-month investigation has been beset by delays, accusations and counter-accusations. The latest problem began two weeks ago, when Bloch's deputy sent staffers a memo asking them to inform OSC higher-ups when investigators contact them. Further, the memo read, employees should meet with investigators in the office, in a special conference room. Some employees cried foul, saying the recommendations made them afraid to be interviewed in the probe.

This week, Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility, the Project on Government Oversight, the Government Accountability Project and Human Rights Campaign and a lawyer for the OSC employees protested in a letter to legislators and to Clay Johnson III, the Office of Management and Budget deputy who ordered the OSC probe.

The OSC's memo, the group said, "was only the latest in a series of actions by Bloch to obstruct" the investigation. "Other actions have included suggestions that all witnesses interviewed . . . provide Bloch with affidavits describing what they had been asked and how they responded."

Bloch's office responded with a statement: "Due to the fact that this is an ongoing investigation, OSC cannot comment on it other than to say we look forward to the speedy resolution. Special Counsel Bloch has been and continues to be recused from any decision-making in this investigation. The Office of Special Counsel has fully cooperated in the investigation, and any information to the contrary is reckless speculation."

But the same day the organizations went to the OMB and Congress, Bloch's new deputy, Jim Byrne, issued another employee memo -- not inspired by the complaint, he said.

"All OSC Employees: This e-mail communicates new procedures that will be used . . . in conducting the remainder of its investigative work in our agency. . . . The [investigators] will schedule interviews by directly contacting the employee with whom they wish to speak. The date, time, and place of the interviews will be arranged between the OIG and the employee. There is no longer a requirement to use OSC facilities for the interview. . . ." he wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0133037

"All employees who are contacted by the OIG should cooperate fully with the investigators and provide information and testimony unless disclosure of the information is prohibited by law, regulation, or policy. All employees are permitted to be represented by personal counsel during their interview. . . .

"And, you are also welcome to directly contact me with any questions that you may have. We have nothing to hide."

Protecting Those Who Speak Out (NYT)

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

The plight of federal workers who raise alarms about waste and fraud in government has become a scandal unto itself. That candid air marshal suddenly assigned to desk duty after complaining of shoddy agency practices has plenty of company, including workers who have lost security clearances or found their jobs suddenly relocated far from home. But in a vote this week of bipartisan unanimity, the House government reform committee offered whistle-blowers fresh hope with a much needed measure to protect them against official retaliation.

Existing law gives too much of an edge to oversight boards that are inclined to dismiss or belittle the charges of whistle-blowers. The bill, sponsored by Henry Waxman, Democrat of California, and Tom Davis, Republican of Virginia, would guarantee a worker the right to a court review of a complaint if it lingers beyond six months without action.

The protection against retaliation would also be extended for the first time to the F.B.I. and to intelligence agencies where wastefulness is draped in secrecy. (Maybe someone on the inside could finally explain the hundreds of F.B.I. computers and firearms that are regularly lost.) And nongovernment workers employed by federal contractors would finally have protection if they blew the whistle. The bill would extend anti-retaliation rights to those workers who courageously complained about the politicization of science by patronage appointees, and to airport security workers.

Politicians campaign endlessly on promises to end waste, fraud and abuse. Congress has a golden opportunity to protect the people whose courage can make that possible.

Congress Eyes Getting More Info Released (AP)

By Laurie Kellman, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — Congressional Democrats are looking at ways to strengthen open government laws and force the Bush administration to release more documents under the Freedom of Information Act.

Rep. Lacy Clay, D-Mo., said legislation he is considering would be broader than an open government bill last year that sought to reduce the number of disputed FOIA requests and improve reporting requirements to Congress. The legislation never reached a vote in the House or Senate.

Clay said the old bill will be the starting point for a new one that will take direct aim at the administration's practice of using the threat of terrorism to withhold "nonsensitive information."

"I am deeply concerned that this administration appears to be shielding information that ought to be accessible to the public," said Clay, chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee's subcommittee on information policy.

The American Civil Liberties Union urged the subcommittee on Wednesday to scrap what it said was the White House's "policy of nondisclosure" outlined in a 2001 memo by then-Attorney General John Ashcroft.

Ashcroft advised against releasing information when there was uncertainty about whether FOIA exemptions applied, such as for national security and law enforcement material. His memo reversed a Clinton administration policy that urged agencies to resolve FOIA requests by erring on the side of releasing, not withholding, government information.

"To this administration, secrecy is the default response," ACLU Executive Director Anthony D. Romero said in written testimony prepared for Clay's subcommittee.

Another witness, Clark Hoyt of the Sunshine in Government Initiative, urged Congress to create an independent ombudsman within the federal government to improve training and compliance with the FOIA and act as a liaison for people frustrated in their efforts to use the law to obtain records.

President Bush signed an executive order in 2005 directing federal agencies to be more efficient in dealing with requests for government information, but he left the Ashcroft memo in place. The order called on agencies to take several consumer-friendly steps, including streamlining the handling of requests under the FOIA and appointing senior officials to monitor compliance with the law.

Linda Koontz, director of information management for the Government Accountability Office, said it is too soon to tell if the flow of disclosure has improved under the new executive order. But her agency's study of FOIA request processing trends from 2002 to 2005 found that many agencies could not keep pace with the increase in requests they received.

DOJ_NMG_0133038

Melanie Ann Pustay, acting director of the Justice Department's Office of Information and Privacy, pointed out that agencies face stiff challenges in fulfilling many FOIA requests because of the sheer volume and irregularity of documents that must be reviewed.

She also said that the Internet, among other sources, has caused FOIA requests to balloon to "millions" every year and that processing them costs more than $300 million annually.

New FOIA Reform Legislation Expected Soon (GOVEXEC)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, February 16, 2007

Newly empowered congressional Democrats likely will introduce legislation to reform the Freedom of Information Act in the next month, sources in both chambers said this week.

The bill's introduction likely will coincide with Sunshine Week March 11-16, an initiative led by the American Society of Newspaper Editors to educate the public about the importance of open government. National Freedom of Information Day also happens that week, on March 16.

Rep. William Lacy Clay, D-Mo., chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Subcommittee on Information Policy, Census and National Archives, said Wednesday after a hearing on FOIA that he expects to see reform legislation introduced soon.

Clay said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, will be heavily involved in crafting the measure. A bill that was approved at the subcommittee level in September 2006 (H.R. 867) will be used as a starting point.

"We are trying to refine that," Clay said. "We're trying to improve upon it."

In a statement, Waxman said he looks forward to working with Clay on legislation to strengthen the FOIA, and is pleased, as the law was the focus of the subcommittee's first hearing in the new Congress.

Similar legislation (S. 394) introduced by Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, cleared the Senate Judiciary Committee last fall.

Both bills would have imposed stricter enforcement of the existing 20-day deadline for responses to requests for information under FOIA and would have created a system to allow the public to track the status of requests online and via a telephone hotline. At the end of 2005, the requests in 22 government agencies totaled nearly 150,000, up about 20 percent from the previous year.

The legislation also called for a FOIA ombudsman to mediate disputes between the government and members of the public.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, is planning to reintroduce a similar version of last year's bipartisan legislation, according to committee spokeswoman Tracy Schmaler.

Last year's legislation might have had a greater chance of passing had President Bush not issued an executive order in December 2005 requiring agencies to improve their processes for responding to information requests. Subsequent agency reports in response to the order have shown that agencies have plans for improving the administration of FOIA requests.

While the executive order may have appeased a Republican-run Congress last year, sources said that the Democrats who run Congress now are likely to move aggressively on the legislation this session, for fear that if delayed to 2008, it could get lost in the midst of a presidential election year.

The success of Bush's executive order in improving agency response times to requests is also likely to affect the legislation, sources said.

Melanie Ann Pustay, acting director of the Justice Department's Office of Information Policy, the group that shares the job with the Office of Management and Budget of enforcing the executive order, said at a hearing Tuesday that it is too early determine how effective agencies have been in implementing their plans. But Pustay said so far she has been very pleased with the results.

Asked why the Justice Department had more two dozen identified deficiencies in its plan, including eight at the FBI, Pustay said she thinks "that is just to be expected" and can be blamed on the logistical challenge of moving offices.

Pustay said that the latest edition of the FOIA Guide produced by the Justice Department was delayed from its December 2006 release date because that timeline was "overly optimistic."

Bankruptcy Judge Approves $145 Million In Fees For Lawyers, Advisers In Delphi Case (AP)

By Vinnee Tong, The Associated Press

AP, February 16, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0133039

A federal bankruptcy judge on Thursday approved $145 million in fees to lawyers and financial advisers for the first year of the restructuring of auto parts supplier Delphi.

Troy, Mich.-based Delphi Corp., a former subsidiary of General Motors Corp. until 1999, has incurred nearly $135 million in professional fees and $10 million in expenses for the period from its voluntary bankruptcy protection filing on Oct. 8, 2005, through the end of September 2006.

U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Robert Drain of the Southern District of New York approved the payment applications filed by about 30 law firms, bankers and others.

As part of its bankruptcy case, Delphi has cut labor costs by offering voluntary buyout and early retirement deals to tens of thousands of union workers represented by the United Auto Workers and the International Union of Electronic Workers-Communications Workers of America, the company's biggest and second-biggest unions.

Delphi has made reducing labor and retirement benefit costs one of the highest priorities in its reorganization.

Among Delphi's advisers, the biggest bill comes from the law firm Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom, which recorded fees and expenses of $32.79 million for the year.

Skadden's hourly rates range from $585 to $835 for partners, $560 to $640 for counsel and special counsel, $295 to $540 for associates and $90 to $230 for legal assistants.

The various firms have received most of the fees already, as they are paid monthly, aside from so-called "hold backs." Drain approved orders on Thursday covering three separate periods. His approval means the firms will receive the 5 percent or 10 percent that has been held back. Because of the size of the case, the court had established a special fee committee to create guidelines for how the firms should be paid.

The judge must also approve the fees at the conclusion of the case.

Delphi expects to emerge from bankruptcy protection in the first half of this year. It is now negotiating with its unions over collective bargaining agreements and General Motors over legacy retirement costs. Those agreements are needed if Delphi wants to move forward on a proposed plan that has private equity investors making a cash infusion as the company exits bankruptcy.

Three private equity investors -- Appaloosa Management LP, Cerberus Capital Management LP and Harbinger Capital Partners Master Fund I -- along with Merrill Lynch & Co. and UBS Securities LLC have agreed to invest $1.4 billion to $3.4 billion in a restructured Delphi, a tentative deal approved by Drain last month.

The investors and Delphi seek to resolve the issues with GM and the unions ahead of a Feb. 28 deadline, after which the two parties will give up the right to withdraw from the tentative agreement.

Bear Stearns Ordered To Pay $125 Million (WP/BLOOM)

By Otis Bilodeau And Thom Weidlich, Bloomberg News

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

Judge Cites Firm for Lax Oversight in Collapse of Manhattan Hedge Fund

Bear Stearns must pay at least $125.1 million to a failed hedge fund after a court concluded the securities firm ignored signs that investors were being defrauded and took money to cover its own potential losses.

U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Burton Lifland in New York yesterday ordered that Bear Stearns must return the money to Manhattan Investment Fund, which collapsed in 2000 after regulators accused the manager of sending fake account statements for more than three years.

Bear Stearns, alerted to the fraud as early as 1998, waited a year before scrutinizing the hedge fund's books and learning its true financial condition, Lifland wrote.

The delay allowed Manhattan Investment to continue cheating investors, who lost almost $400 million, according to regulators. The ruling against Bear Stearns, of New York, may spur investment banks to monitor hedge funds, their most lucrative trading clients, more closely. Bear Stearns is one of the biggest brokers to hedge funds.

Hedge funds are lightly regulated investment pools that allow managers to keep a substantial portion of gains they generate for clients. Hedge funds have resisted government efforts to make them disclose more about their operations.

"These are issues that the hedge fund industry wants to go away, but they're not going to," said Seth Berenzweig, a partner at Albo & Oblon, a law firm in Arlington.

For Bear Stearns, a $125.1 million payment is equivalent to 6 percent of its $2.05 billion profit last year. Bear Stearns spokesman Russell Sherman said the firm will appeal.

Manhattan Investment, founded in 1996 and managed by Michael Berger, imploded into bankruptcy four years later in "one of the most egregious and costly frauds in the history of the securities markets," the SEC wrote in a bankruptcy court filing submitted last year.

DOJ_NMG_0133040

Berger deceived investors for more than three years with fake account statements, said the SEC, which sued Manhattan Investment for fraud in 2000. Berger pleaded guilty to related criminal charges and then left the country before sentencing.

"Bear Stearns was required to do more than simply ask the wrongdoer if he was doing wrong," Lifland wrote.

"This is going to send shock waves through many prime brokers because they've been very careful to limit their responsibility for their customers' actions," said Michael Missal of Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Preston Gates Ellis in the District.

House, Senate Seek FDA Regulation Of Tobacco (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — House and Senate lawmakers of both parties introduced sweeping legislation Thursday to subject tobacco to the kind of safety regulation that applies to medicines and food, and said prospects for action were the most favorable in years.

"This bill is long overdue, and this is the year, I believe, that regulation of tobacco by the Food and Drug Administration is going to become law," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles), a longtime nemesis of the tobacco industry who heads the Government Reform Committee.

"If this gets to the House floor, [its passage] will be [by] a very large margin," said Rep. Tom Davis of Virginia, Waxman's Republican cosponsor. The legislation could garner enough support to override a veto, Davis said.

Although the White House has not supported similar legislation in the past, it's not clear what position President Bush will take this time.

Administration officials were neutral Thursday.

"We're in the process of reviewing the legislation," Department of Health and Human Services spokeswoman Christina Pearson said. "As a general point on smoking reduction, I do want to note the substantial progress that has happened over the past 40 years. Though we must remain vigilant, … reducing the incidence of smoking in this country has helped us avert many thousands of cases of disease."

The tobacco industry is divided over regulation. Most major public-health groups support federal oversight.

The bill introduced Thursday would grant the FDA legal authority to regulate nicotine. The agency had previously asserted it had such power, but the Supreme Court disagreed, ruling in 2000 that Congress must specifically confer such authority.

Under the bill, the agency would also gain the power to restrict tobacco advertising, require stronger warnings on cigarette packs, mandate reductions in nicotine, regulate additives and set stiff penalties for selling to minors.

Smoking is a leading cause of cancer, heart disease and emphysema, and is estimated to cause more than 400,000 deaths a year in the United States.

Three presidential candidates immediately signed on to the legislation: Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.). Its principal sponsors in the Senate are Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John Cornyn (R-Texas).

The last major battle over tobacco regulation was in 2004, when a bill passed the Senate but faltered in the House. It was blocked by Republican leaders, including former House Majority Leader Tom Delay of Texas.

The new Democratic leadership in both chambers is behind the legislation, advocates said.

"We've always had bipartisan support, but we didn't have support from the leadership," Waxman said.

The biggest cigarette company, Philip Morris Cos., favors the legislation, saying FDA oversight would provide the industry with a stable legal framework and could reduce harm from smoking. But many smaller companies oppose regulation, in part because, they say, it could create roadblocks to competition that would benefit Philip Morris.

Congressional debates on health issues often turn personal, and this one promises to be passionate. Davis said his father died of emphysema. Another cosponsor, Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), said his father smoked two packs of Camels a day and died of lung cancer.

"If we can regulate nicotine in gum, in patches and in nasal sprays, why can't we do it in cigarettes?" Davis said.

Lawmakers Unveil Tobacco Regulation Bill (AP)

By Andrew Bridges

AP, February 16, 2007

Seven years after being rebuffed by the Supreme Court, anti-smoking advocates rejoiced Thursday as lawmakers renewed a push for federal regulation of tobacco, a step they say is needed to deter children from lighting up and to get smokers to quit.

DOJ_NMG_0133041

"Congress has the opportunity to take a monumental step and grant the Food and Drug Administration the meaningful and long-overdue authority to regulate tobacco, which kills 440,000 people and costs our nation $96.7 billion in health care bills every year," said John Seffrin, chief executive officer of the American Cancer Society.

A bipartisan group of lawmakers reintroduced legislation Thursday that would give the FDA the same authority over cigarettes and other tobacco products that it already has over countless other consumer products.

"Congress cannot in good conscience allow the federal agency most responsible for protecting the public health to remain powerless to deal with the enormous risks of tobacco, the most deadly of all consumer products," Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said in introducing the Family Smoking Prevention and Tobacco Control Act with Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, and Reps. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., and Tom Davis, R-Va.

For decades, the FDA said it lacked authority to regulate tobacco so long as cigarette makers did not claim that smoking provided health benefits. In 1996, it reversed course and cited new evidence that the industry intended its products to feed the nicotine habits of the roughly 45 million Americans who smoke.

Tobacco companies sued, and the case eventually landed in the Supreme Court. In 2000, the court ruled 5-4 that Congress did not authorize the FDA to regulate tobacco.

Previous legislative efforts to give the FDA that authority have faltered. The new bill is fundamentally the same legislation as introduced in the last Congress. Supporters believe it will fare better in the Democratic-controlled House and Senate.

A spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said it had the support of the caucus. A spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said she personally supported it.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto declined to comment.

The Department of Health and Human Services is reviewing the legislation, spokeswoman Christina Pearson said.

The bill would allow the FDA to act to discourage children from starting smoking and encourage adults to quit, in part by reining in advertising, bolstering existing sales restrictions and strengthening warning labels. It also would allow the FDA to order the elimination or reduction of harmful and addictive ingredients in tobacco. The agency couldn't ban nicotine outright, but the bill would give it the power to reduce its levels.

Furthermore, the bill would require tobacco companies to disclose what tobacco products — and their smoke — contain. Secondhand smoke, for example, contains 250 chemicals known to be toxic or carcinogenic, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

The FDA had no immediate comment on the proposed legislation. Many tobacco companies have opposed the legislation in the past, with the exception of Philip Morris USA, maker of Marlboro, the nation's top-selling cigarette brand.

"FDA regulation creates a uniform set of federal standards for the manufacture and marketing of all tobacco products," Michael E. Szymanczyk, chairman and chief executive officer of Philip Morris USA, said in a statement.

Experts and other tobacco companies believe some provisions of the bill would favor the most entrenched players in the industry, like Philip Morris, which enjoy strong brand loyalty that could allow them to weather advertising restrictions without losing market share.

"We certainly continue to oppose any bill that conveys an unfair advantage or disadvantage to any manufacturer, which this legislation could. If you eliminate ways to communicate with adult smokers or consumers, that certainly benefits the market leader and makes it difficult, if not impossible, for those who aren't the market leader to compete," said David Howard, a spokesman for R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., the nation's second-largest tobacco company and maker of Camel and other brands.

Court Ruling Reignites Tobacco Suits (LAT)

By Maura Dolan, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

California justices unanimously reject a 2002 federal decision that had effectively blocked smokers from seeking damages.

SAN FRANCISCO — The California Supreme Court made it possible Thursday for people who become ill from smoking to once again win large judgments from tobacco companies, unanimously rejecting a four-year-old federal court decision that had virtually halted all smoker lawsuits in the state.

"It reopens tobacco litigation in California," said Northeastern University Law Professor Richard A. Daynard, who heads a group that promotes lawsuits against the industry. "The light just went from red to green."

Since California began allowing individual lawsuits over smoking damage in 1998, plaintiffs had won some of the biggest tobacco awards in the country, including a $28-billion jury verdict in Los Angeles.

The awards came to a halt when a federal appeals court in 2002 set a strict deadline, saying smokers should have filed suit years earlier, when it became widely known that smoking was a health hazard and addictive.

DOJ_NMG_0133042

Taking advantage of the federal ruling, the tobacco industry had exercised its right to move cases into federal court, which hears disputes between litigants in different states. Lawyers said every single case was dismissed.

In a decision written by Justice Carlos R. Moreno, the high court said that although judges and juries can presume that plaintiffs should have known of the dangers and filed their lawsuits earlier, smokers can rebut that presumption by presenting evidence that tobacco companies misrepresented the risks.

"Although knowledge of smoking addiction has been widespread … ," Moreno wrote, "tobacco companies misrepresentation of the danger and addictiveness of smoking were also widespread."

A lawyer for Philip Morris USA Inc. and Brown and Williamson Tobacco Corp., the defendants in the case, did not return a telephone call seeking comment on the Supreme Court ruling. Another tobacco executive referred to a prepared statement.

"Awareness of the dangers of smoking will continue to be key issues should either of these cases proceed to trial, and plaintiffs must prove liability on the part of the defendants including, among other things, that smoking caused their illness and that the company's conduct prevented them from making an informed choice to smoke," said William S. Ohlemeyer, Philip Morris USA vice president and associate general counsel, in the statement.

In one of two cases before the court, Leslie Grisham sought economic damages for the costs of cigarettes she bought when she became addicted.

She also sought damages for physical injury. She said smoking gave her emphysema, peritonitis and gingivitis, which led to the loss of her teeth and disfigurement.

The court also said Grisham can sue for her physical injuries because the clock did not start ticking for the legal deadline until she discovered her ailments.

"The addictiveness of a product is distinct from its capacity to cause serious physical injury," Moreno wrote.

The two cases will go now back to the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. Although smoking cases may still be heard in federal court, judges there will have to base their decisions on the California court's interpretation of state law, lawyers in the case said.

Daniel U. Smith, who argued before the California Supreme Court for Grisham, said he was "elated" by the ruling. If the court had ruled that the legal deadline for suing began with knowledge of addiction, no one in California would ever recover damages for serious smoking-caused disease, he said.

"Cancers take 10 to 20 years to develop," he said. "Now it is a new day, and we will see if more smokers file now that they are allowed to," he said.

Smith said the federal ruling spawned similar decisions in other federal circuits around the country. Now that a moderately conservative California high court has rejected the 2002 decision, "other federal courts will be invited to reconsider their positions," he said.

But Brentwood lawyer Michael Piuze, who won billion-dollar verdicts against the tobacco industry, said the 2002 decision caused many trial lawyers to "wash their hands" of tobacco litigation "because it has been impossible."

"Every state court case got kidnapped to federal court and then got executed under the authority" of the 2002 ruling, Piuze said.

LAPD May Get Options On Monitoring Racial Profiling (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

Faced with a $25-million price tag to replace aging devices that log the ethnicity of every motorist stopped, the Los Angeles Police Department may be allowed to pursue alternative methods for making sure its officers are not engaging in racial profiling, a federal monitor said Thursday.

In his quarterly report on the department's compliance with a federal consent decree mandating LAPD reforms, Independent Monitor Michael Cherkasky said the agency might be able to meet the requirement for checking on racial profiling by methods other than the one currently used to collect data.

"It is the monitor's belief that the dollars that would need to be spent in continuing the current method of collection and aggregation can, in fact, be better spent on enhancing the city's ability to detect, investigate and prevent biased policing," Cherkasky wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0133043

That opens the door for the city to propose alternatives such as installing video cameras in all patrol cars, though any change would require final approval from Cherkasky, the Justice Department and a federal judge.

Also, it might cost up to $25 million to put video cameras in all patrol cars.

Still, Police Commission President John Mack welcomed the possibility that the city could find a less costly and more effective way to check for profiling.

"Based upon some discussion we've had with the monitor, we look forward to in-car cameras hopefully providing a much better solution to the problem," Mack said.

Officers who have pulled over cars have had to use electronic devices to record the ethnicity and other details of motorists, but Mack said it has been "fruitless" because the vast amount of raw data has not allowed the department to determine whether officers acted improperly.

"The data suggested that blacks and Hispanics were being stopped far more frequently than whites and, moreover, that intrusive after-stop actions of officers were likewise disparate," Cherkasky wrote in the new report.

"The monitor acknowledged that the disparate treatment reflected in the statistics might be explained other than as an indication of biased policing and that additional analysis was required in order to attempt to explain the disparities."

That analysis failed to explain the discrepancies in numbers or to determine whether racial profiling was taking place — leading the city to begin exploring less expensive and more effective options such as video cameras.

The quarterly report found that the LAPD has made progress on many reforms, but has still failed to address some key requirements, including completion of a computer system to track officer behavior.

Judge Limits New York Police Taping (NYT)

By Jim Dwyer

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

In a rebuke of a surveillance practice greatly expanded by the New York Police Department after the Sept. 11 attacks, a federal judge ruled yesterday that the police must stop the routine videotaping of people at public gatherings unless there is an indication that unlawful activity may occur.

Four years ago, at the request of the city, the same judge, Charles S. Haight Jr., gave the police greater authority to investigate political, social and religious groups.

In yesterday's ruling, Judge Haight, of United States District Court in Manhattan, found that by videotaping people who were exercising their right to free speech and breaking no laws, the Police Department had ignored the milder limits he had imposed on it in 2003.

Citing two events in 2005 — a march in Harlem and a demonstration by homeless people in front of the home of Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg — the judge said the city had offered scant justification for videotaping the people involved.

"There was no reason to suspect or anticipate that unlawful or terrorist activity might occur," he wrote, "or that pertinent information about or evidence of such activity might be obtained by filming the earnest faces of those concerned citizens and the signs by which they hoped to convey their message to a public official."

While he called the police conduct "egregious," Judge Haight also offered an unusual judicial mea culpa, taking responsibility for his own words in a 2003 order that he conceded had not been "a model of clarity."

The restrictions on videotaping do not apply to bridges, tunnels, airports, subways or street traffic, Judge Haight noted, but are meant to control police surveillance at events where people gather to exercise their rights under the First Amendment.

"No reasonable person, and surely not this court, is unaware of the perils the New York public faces and the crucial importance of the N.Y.P.D.'s efforts to detect, prevent and punish those who would cause others harm," Judge Haight wrote.

Jethro M. Eisenstein, one of the lawyers who challenged the videotaping practices, said that Judge Haight's ruling would make it possible to contest other surveillance tactics, including the use of undercover officers at political gatherings. In recent years, police officers have disguised themselves as protesters, shouted feigned objections when uniformed officers were making arrests, and pretended to be mourners at a memorial event for bicycle riders killed in traffic accidents.

"This was a major push by the corporation counsel to say that the guidelines are nice but they're yesterday's news, and that the security establishment's view of what is important trumps civil liberties," Mr. Eisenstein said. "Judge Haight is saying that's just not the way we're doing things in New York City."

A spokesman for Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly referred questions about the ruling to the city's lawyers, who noted that Judge Haight did not set a deadline for destroying the tapes it had already made, and that the judge did not find the city had violated the First Amendment.

Nevertheless, Judge Haight — at times invoking the mythology of the ancient Greeks and of Harold Ross, the founding editor of The New Yorker — used blunt language to characterize the Police Department's activities.

"There is no discernible justification for the apparent disregard of the guidelines" in his 2003 court order, he said. These spell out the broad circumstances under which the police could investigate political gatherings.

Under the guidelines, the police may conduct investigations — including videotaping — at political events only if they have indications that unlawful activity may occur, and only after they have applied for permission to the deputy commissioner in charge of the Intelligence Division.

Judge Haight noted that the Police Department had not produced evidence that any applications for permission to videotape had ever been filed.

Near the end of his 51-page order, the judge warned that the Police Department must change its practices or face penalties.

"Any future use by the N.Y.P.D. of video and photographic equipment during the course of an investigation involving political activity" that did not follow the guidelines could result in contempt proceedings, he wrote.

At monthly group bicycle rides in Lower Manhattan known as Critical Mass, some participants break traffic laws, and the police routinely videotape those events, Judge Haight noted. That would be an appropriate situation for taping, he said, but police officials did not follow the guidelines and apply for permission.

"This is a classic case of application of the guidelines: political activity on the part of individuals, but legitimate law enforcement purpose on the part of the police," Judge Haight wrote. "It is precisely the sort of situation where the guidelines require adherence to certain protocols but ultimately give the N.Y.P.D. the flexibility to pursue its law enforcement goals."

Gideon Oliver, a lawyer who has represented many people arrested during the monthly bicycle rides, said he was troubled by the intensive scrutiny of political activities.

"I'm looking forward to a deeper and more serious exploration of how and why this surveillance has been conducted," Mr. Oliver said.

In the past the Police Department has said that it needed intelligence about the Critical Mass rides in order to protect the streets from unruly riders.

Patrick Markee, an official with another group that was cited in the ruling, the Coalition for the Homeless, said the judge's decision ratified their basic rights to free speech.

"We're gratified that Judge Haight found that the police shouldn't engage in surveillance of homeless New Yorkers and their supporters when they're engaged in peaceful, lawful political protest," Mr. Markee said.

The Police Department's approach to investigating political, social and religious groups has been a contentious subject for most of four decades, and a class action lawsuit brought by political activists, including a lawyer named Barbara Handschu, was settled in 1985. Judge Haight oversees the terms of that settlement, which are known as the Handschu guidelines, and which he modified in 2003.

At the time, Judge Haight said that the police could "attend any event open to the public, on the same terms and conditions of the public generally."

But in yesterday's ruling, he said that permission "cannot be stretched to authorize police officers to videotape everyone at a public gathering just because a visiting little old lady from Dubuque (to borrow from The New Yorker) could do so. There is a quantum difference between a police officer and the little old lady (or other tourist or private citizen) videotaping or photographing a public event."

The judge said he bore some responsibility for misinterpretation of the guidelines.

"I confess with some chagrin that while the text of this opinion and its implementing order, read together, may not be as opaque as the irritatingly baffling pronouncements of the Oracle" at Delphi, "they do not constitute a model of clarity," he wrote.

AirTran Urges Midwest To Negotiate Deal (MILBIZ)

Milwaukee Business Journal, February 16, 2007

AirTran Holdings Inc. reported Feb. 15 the federal waiting period for its proposed $345 million buyout of Midwest Air Group Inc. has expired.

AirTran chairman and CEO Joe Leonard called the Justice Department's determination not to challenge the proposed merger a "milestone" and said he hoped the agency's decision will prompt Midwest management to sit down with AirTran for formal negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0133045

"As we have frequently said, the combination of AirTran and Midwest is pro-competitive and the merger of our two airlines will create a stronger, more diversified airline, better able to withstand competition from other airlines, offer greater job security to employees and provide more service to the cities currently served by both airlines, " Leonard said in a statement.

AirTran (NYSE: AAI) is trying to buy Oak Creek-based Midwest Air Group Inc. (AMEX: MEH) to create a low-fare carrier with revenue of about $3 billion in 2007. However, Midwest on Jan. 25 rejected the unsolicited offer calling it "opportunistic" and saying it "undervalues" the company.

Leonard said Thursday he hoped that with the expiration of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act that Midwest will "consider the benefits to their stakeholders and sit down with us to negotiate a definitive agreement."

Judge May Hold Up Caremark-CVS (SLPD)

By Mary Jo Feldstein, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, February 16, 2007

A hearing today is expected to determine whether the bid by CVS Corp. to buy Caremark Rx will be further delayed because of alleged misconduct by Caremark executives and board members.

The lawsuit challenging the CVS-Caremark deal was brought by Express Scripts Inc. of Maryland Heights, which also wants to buy Caremark. It alleges that Caremark's executives and directors failed to negotiate in the best interest of its shareholders.

Delaware Chancery Court Chancellor William B. Chandler III already has delayed the Caremark shareholders' vote at least until March 9. He acted after a large group of shareholders said it needed more time to evaluate the CVS offer.

CVS, the nation's No. 2 retail drug chain, in November announced its plan to combine with Caremark, based in Nashville, Tenn. Its bid was a $21 billion, all-stock offer that it said would create a new dynamic in the pharmaceutical industry. Caremark shareholders had been scheduled to vote on the deal Tuesday.

Express Scripts is the nation's No. 3 pharmacy-benefits manager. In December, it countered CVS's bid for Caremark with a cash-and-stock offer valued at $26 billion and a vision of a larger, stronger pharmacy-benefits management company.

Express Scripts later sued Caremark, that company's board and CVS, saying the Caremark—CVS deal should be quashed because of "extensive fiduciary misconduct." Chandler isn't expected to rule today.

"In short, the Caremark stockholders will be forced to make a decision in a context distorted by the misconduct of their own board," Express Scripts said in a brief filed this week.

Express Scripts alleges that Caremark's chief executive, Edwin "Mac" Crawford, spent months negotiating the CVS deal before bringing it to the board. It alleges also that Crawford and the board put perks for executives and directors ahead of obtaining the best price and terms for shareholders.

CVS tells a different story. In its brief, CVS argues that Caremark board members knew of a potential deal with CVS early on and met several times to discuss it.

"Despite the plaintiffs' claims, the record shows that this was not a deal motivated by self-interest or hastily signed," CVS said. "The companies took their time, talked to competitors and eventually decided that the merger was in the best interest of shareholders."

Caremark also has filed a brief in the case, but as of late Thursday lawyers had yet to agree on a version of it that could be released to the public. Material described as proprietary data was removed from the Express Scripts and CVS legal papers before they were made public.

According to Express Scripts, Crawford and CVS Chief Executive Tom Ryan spent 10 months negotiating major elements of the deal — including structure, general terms and approximate price — before bringing the Caremark board into the discussions on Aug. 16, 2006.

CVS said the idea of a Caremark-CVS combination was first brought to the Caremark board in November 2005, nearly a year before the board voted on the deal. CVS claims Caremark's board "relied on a host of advice over the course of a year before making its decision."

CVS also denies the allegation that Caremark's executives and board didn't push for the best possible deal. Caremark's board, for example, negotiated a lower break-up fee to encourage third-party offers that could force CVS to increase its price, CVS said.

Express Scripts' brief also reveals the company met with Caremark to discuss a possible merger on four occasions, and as recently as October 2005. And, though Caremark now says a merger with Express Scripts would fail because of antitrust issues and differing strategic goals, those issues were not "major stumbling blocks" in earlier negotiations, Express Scripts said.

DOJ_NMG_0133046

In its brief, CVS questions Express Scripts' standing to bring the lawsuit. Through a subsidiary, Express Scripts is a Caremark shareholder. But CVS said Express Scripts didn't buy those shares until after the CVS-Caremark deal was announced.

Lawmakers Seek Repeal Of Insurance Antitrust Exemption (MCT)

By Maria Recio, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON - Lawmakers moved to rein in the insurance industry Thursday by introducing legislation in the House of Representatives and Senate to repeal the industry's federal antitrust exemption.

Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, R-Miss., a fierce critic of the insurance industry's response to Hurricane Katrina, joined Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and ranking member Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., on the Senate floor to introduce the bill. In the House, Rep. Gene Taylor, D-Miss., Rep. Pete DeFazio, D-Ore., Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-La., Rep. Walter Jones, R-N.C., and others announced the introduction of identical legislation.

"Federal oversight would provide confidence that the industry is not engaging in the most egregious forms of anti-competitive conduct - price-fixing, agreements not to pay and market allocations," Leahy said. "Insurers may object to being subject to the same antitrust laws as everyone else, but if they are operating in an honest and appropriate way, they should have nothing to fear."

Lott, who lost his home in the hurricane and who's part of a lawsuit that's being settled with State Farm & Casualty Co., said, "After Hurricane Katrina we learned a lot of lessons." He said he found out "to my absolute horror that the insurance industry is not covered by the antitrust laws."

"This is wrong," Lott concluded, "and the Senate, in a bipartisan way, should, and I believe will, correct it."

The bill has some heavy hitters behind it, notably Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., who said in a statement, "If insurers around the country are operating in an honest and appropriate way, they should not object to being answerable under the same federal antitrust laws as virtually all other businesses."

Taylor, who also lost his home and is part of the State Farm settlement, said in an interview that "the insurance industry is the only industry exempt from the laws intended to protect consumers."

The Insurance Industry Competition Act of 2007 would bring insurers under the scrutiny of the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission by lifting the exemption they currently have under the McCarran-Ferguson Act of 1945. States would continue to regulate insurance companies, but federal agencies would have authority to review any "unfair methods of competition," such as price-fixing.

The industry is opposed to the bill, arguing that a change in regulatory oversight needs to include a look at the 50-state system insurers operate in.

"Any discussion about repealing the antitrust exemption has to include a discussion about modernizing state regulation," said Dennis Kelly, a spokesman for the American Insurance Association. The exemption, he added, is very narrow. "The problem is hurricanes, not insurance companies," Kelly said.

The bill is the latest effort by lawmakers to bring the insurance industry to task for refusing to pay claims of wind damage from Katrina by blaming water damage, which is covered by the federal government's flood insurance program. Taylor last week introduced "multiple perils" legislation to give residents coverage of wind and water damage.

Reacting to the announcement that State Farm won't write new policies in Mississippi, Taylor said, "I think this is a marketing gimmick."

By "winking at its competitors," Taylor predicted that State Farm would resume writing policies in a few months at much higher rates. As for the timing of the announcement, on the heels of a settlement agreement, Taylor said, "It was intentionally timed by State Farm to rub it in people's faces."

The refusal of insurers to pay off policyholders after the hurricane is motivating Taylor now.

"I personally believe that the Big Three insurers said, 'Let's don't pay claims' after Katrina," Taylor said. "It's wrong. Unfortunately, it's legal. But it ought to be illegal."

Broadband Breakout (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

"I love the free market, but the fact is more concentration means less competition, and these markets are less free than they should be. And this Commission is about regulation -- regulators. I always worry a little when I hear regulators shy away from regulation talk."

-- Senator Byron Dorgan (D., North Dakota) addressing members of the Federal Communications Commission at a recent hearing.

If you're wondering where the new Democratic majority in Congress is inclined to steer telecom policy, look no further than Mr. Dorgan's comment above. Note how he pays lip service to free markets while ultimately favoring more regulation for its own sake.

But more regulation is the last thing today's telecom industry needs, at least if empirical evidence is any indication. As FCC Chairman Kevin Martin reported at a Senate hearing earlier this month, the industry is now taking risks in a way it hasn't since the tech bubble burst six years ago.

"In 2006, the S&P 500 telecommunications sector was the strongest performing sector, up 32% over the previous year," said Mr. Martin. "Markets and companies are investing again, job creation in the industry is high, and in almost all cases, vigorous competition -- resulting from free-market deregulatory policies -- has provided the consumer with more, better and cheaper services to choose from."

Much of this growth has been fueled by increased broadband deployment, which makes high-speed Internet services possible. The latest government data show that broadband connections increased by 26% in the first six months of 2006 and by 52% for the full year ending in June 2006.

Also noteworthy, notes telecom analyst Scott Cleland of the Precursor Group, is that of the 11 million broadband additions in the first half of last year, 15% were cable modems, 23% were digital-subscriber lines (DSL) and 58% were of the wireless variety. Between June 2005 and June 2006, wireless broadband subscriptions grew to 11 million from 380,000.

This gives the lie to claims that some sort of cable/DSL duopoly has hampered competition among broadband providers and limited consumer options. That's the charge of those who want "network neutrality" rules that would allow the government to dictate what companies like Verizon and AT&T can charge users of their networks. But the reality is that the telecom industry has taken advantage of this deregulatory environment to provide consumers with more choices at lower prices. Verizon's capital investments since 2000 exceed $100 billion, and such competitors as Cingular, T-Mobile and Sprint are following suit. So are the cable companies.

It's also worth noting that the deregulatory telecom policies pushed by Mr. Martin and his immediate predecessor, Michael Powell, have accompanied a wave of mergers -- SBC/AT&T, Sprint/Nextel, Verizon/MCI, AT&T/BellSouth. Most of these marriages were opposed by consumer groups and other fans of regulation on the grounds that they would lead to fewer choices and higher costs. In fact, these combinations have created economies of scale, and customers are clearly better off.

The result has been more high-speed connections, along with greater economic productivity, but also an array of new services. The popular video-sharing Web site YouTube is barely two years old. And it wouldn't exist today but for the fact that there's enough broadband capacity to allow millions of people to view videos over the Web.

Increased broadband demand has also been good news for Internet hardware companies like Cisco and Juniper, where annual sales are up by nearly 50%. A Journal report this week notes that "North American telecom companies are projected to spend $70 billion on new infrastructure this year," which is up 67% from 2003.

And prices are falling, by the way. Between February 2004 and December 2005, the average monthly cost for home broadband fell nearly 8%. For DSL subscribers, it fell nearly 20%. Which means that consumers are benefiting from new services and different pricing packages, as well as getting better deals.

The one sure way to stop these trends is by bogging down industry players with regulations or price controls that raise the risk that these mammoth investments will never pay off. Yet that seems to be the goal of Senator Dorgan and other Democrats such as Representative Ed Markey, another "Net neutrality" cheerleader, who is planning his own hearings. Consumers will end up paying for such policies in fewer choices and higher prices.

Gonzales Asked About Prosecutor Deal (AP)

By John Heilprin, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 16, 2007

The House Judiciary Committee on Thursday asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to explain how the Justice Department's former top environmental prosecutor could sign consent decrees with the third-largest U.S. oil company after buying a $980,000 vacation home with its top lobbyist.

An Associated Press report a day earlier disclosing the transactions "suggests potential unethical, if not illegal, conduct by a senior Justice Department official and, even more disturbing, apparent complicity in such behavior by the department," the committee's chairman, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., said in a letter to Gonzales.

Conyers also asked Gonzales when he and other department officials learned of then-Assistant Attorney General Sue Ellen Wooldridge's "close relationship with a target of a department public corruption investigation and what action, if any, was taken as a result?"

A third buyer of the gated community home at Kiawah Island, S.C., was former Deputy Interior Secretary J. Steven Griles, who shares a condominium in northern Virginia with Wooldridge and was told last month he faces possible criminal charges of lying to Congress and fraud in the Jack Abramoff bribery and influence-peddling scandal.

The Justice Department says ethics officials signed off on Wooldridge's purchase of the beach getaway with Griles, now an oil and gas lobbyist, and ConocoPhillips Vice President Donald R. Duncan, before the closing last April. The deed lists Duncan as half owner in the property, with Wooldridge and Griles each owning 25 percent.

Nine months later, the Justice Department sent two proposed consent decrees signed by Wooldridge to a federal judge in Houston for approval. One, sent Jan. 11, would let the company delay the required installation of some of the $525 million in pollution controls at nine refineries; the other dealt with a Superfund toxic waste cleanup. Wooldridge resigned as assistant attorney general effective Jan. 19. ConocoPhillips said Duncan had no involvement in negotiating the consent agreements.

Conyers' letter also was signed by Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, as an expression of broader support for the inquiries within the House. Another House panel, the Oversight and Government Reform Committee chaired by Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., launched an inquiry a day earlier.

The Justice Department said it would have no comment Thursday.

Wooldridge two months ago amended her financial disclosure report for 2005 to include more than $10,000 in travel, jewelry, a watch and golf clubs she received from Griles between December 2003 and December 2005. Griles began dating Wooldridge in February 2003, when she was deputy staff chief and counselor to then Interior Secretary Gale Norton.

Griles was the department's No. 2 official from July 2001 to January 2005. During that tenure he was almost constantly scrutinized by the department's internal watchdog over dealings with ex-clients and continuing payments from the sale of his old lobbying firm.

Interior Inspector General Earl Devaney concluded in a 2004 that Griles' actions exposed a "wholesale failure of the ethics program" at the agency. They were, Devaney said, "a train wreck waiting to happen."

While dating Griles, Wooldridge was officially counseling him on ethics matters and providing advice to Norton on how to respond to Devaney's report on him. Wooldridge did not tell Devaney about her relationship with Griles.

In June 2004, Bush appointed Wooldridge as Interior's top lawyer. Sometime after she became Interior solicitor, Wooldridge told the department's ethics office she and Griles had begun dating, an Interior spokesman said. Devaney did not learn of Griles' and Wooldridge's romantic relationship until February 2005.

Bush later appointed Wooldridge to head the Justice Department's environment division, representing virtually every federal agency, and she began working there in November 2005.

Another Energy Inquiry On Royalties Collection (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15 — Top Democrats on the Senate Energy Committee, citing widespread management problems at the Interior Department, ordered a new inquiry on Thursday into the department's fast-growing program to collect billions of dollars worth of oil and gas from companies that drill on public territory.

The inquiry, to be conducted by the Government Accountability Office, will come on top of a criminal investigation by the Justice Department into allegations that the program's director earned money as a consultant to companies that were seeking to resell the government oil.

Other investigations are under way by the Interior Department's inspector general and Congressional committees into complaints about mismanagement, weak enforcement and a leasing blunder in the 1990s that could cost taxpayers $10 billion in lost royalties over the next decade.

The new line of scrutiny comes from Senator Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico, chairman of the Senate Energy Committee, and Senator Ron Wyden of Oregon, chairman of the subcommittee on public lands.

The two senators asked the G.A.O. to analyze the so-called royalty-in-kind program, under which the Interior Department collects a share of the oil and gas that companies produce on federal property and then resells it on the open market to generate cash.

Bush administration officials have called the program a simpler and more efficient way for the government to collect royalties on the vast amounts of oil and gas produced on public lands.

DOJ_NMG_0133049

The Interior Department currently collects about $4 billion in royalties in the form of oil and gas, mostly from the Gulf of Mexico. Administration officials want to double that volume and collect about 80 percent of all offshore royalties “in kind” by 2009.

In a letter to the accountability office, the senators noted that it had made two attempts to evaluate the program’s cost-efficiency, in 2003 and 2004, but had been unable to get reliable data from the Interior Department’s Minerals Management Service.

“The royalty-in-kind program raised flags during the G.A.O.’s last review, and now the inspector general tells us that a criminal investigation is under way,” Senator Wyden said. “The fact that the Interior Department would now take steps to expand this program defies logic.”

In their letter, the lawmakers ordered the office to dissect the program’s administrative costs as well as its effectiveness at tasks normally handled by oil companies, like transporting and marketing oil.

Almost one-quarter of the oil and gas produced in the United States comes from federal land or federal coastal waters. Under the law, companies that drill on federal leases must pay the government a royalty, normally 12 to 16 percent of sales. Last year, those royalties totaled about $10 billion.

But royalty revenues have climbed more slowly than oil prices over the last six years, and the Interior Department has come under heavy criticism for lax enforcement, cutbacks in auditing and murky valuation rules that enable companies to reduce their payments.

Last year, administration officials said that a leasing blunder during the Clinton administration was likely to cost taxpayers up to $10 billion in royalties over the next decade.

House and Senate Democrats are now grappling with proposals to renegotiate the flawed leases, but the Bush administration contends that the government cannot pressure companies into revising their terms.

Interior officials, along with many industry executives, contend that the royalty-in-kind program is a simpler way to collect royalties because it eliminates many of the accounting battles that have stymied auditors for years.

But investigators for the G.A.O. said in 2003 and 2004 that they simply could not get enough accurate data to know whether the government was saving any money.

'Live Earth' Concerts To Tackle Hot Topic (WP)

By William Booth, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

Al Gore's Musical Call to Action

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 15 -- The hit-making record producer Pharrell Williams, the wizard behind the beats of everybody from Ludacris to Britney, promises it will be "the biggest party on Earth." How big?

At the news conference Thursday announcing this summer's ambitious "Live Earth" concerts -- designed as an exercise in "mass persuasion" about threats of global warming -- Al Gore described his vision: a 24-hour musical extravaganza across seven continents, featuring as many as 150 of the world's top recording artists, introduced by an army of "celebrities and thought leaders" (think: Cameron Diaz and Richard Branson), playing before a total live audience of a million people, and reaching 2 billion more via television, radio and the Internet on July 7.

The foreign cities hosting the stadium-size concerts will be Shanghai, Sydney, Johannesburg, London, Rio and Kyoto, Japan. In the United States, two cities -- New York and Washington -- are vying to be the chosen venue. Gore revealed that some lucky entertainer (perhaps Lenny Kravitz? Snow Patrol?) will be performing in Antarctica, where temperatures in July at the South Pole Station average minus-56 degrees Fahrenheit.

The former vice president confirmed that while he was schmoozing at Sunday's Grammy Awards, where he was a presenter, the Black Eyed Peas agreed to record a new song to promote the cause and perform at one of the concerts. Also off camera at the Grammys, members of the Red Hot Chili Peppers whispered to Gore: "We're in." The approximately two dozen artists confirmed today include Snow Patrol, Kelly Clarkson, Bon Jovi, Foo Fighters, Duran Duran, Enrique Iglesias, Kravitz, Sheryl Crow and Snoop Dogg [for a full list, see box].

At the news conference at the California Science Center (it's a museum), against a slightly overproduced backdrop emblazoned with the Live Earth theme, "Save Our Selves," the band Man? bilingually pledged its support and encouraged "everyone, everywhere" to check out Gore's Oscar-nominated documentary "An Inconvenient Truth." Proceeds from the globalized concerts will go to Gore's new environmental foundation, called the Alliance for Climate Protection.

Diaz was also on hand. "As Al said," Diaz said, there are things everyone can do to reduce the magnitude of climate change. Asked what she did, Diaz mentioned driving a hybrid Prius, using recycled products and pursuing "carbon-neutral travel." Saving the planet is doable, she pointed out: "We don't have to build some giant machine that goes up in the air and sucks all the carbon into outer space."

Kevin Wall, the concert producer who has handled the Madonna tours and the Live8 concerts to fight global poverty, promised that the biggest bands on Earth are rearranging their schedules to appear at the Live Earth events. The list of venues, artists and ticket sales will be finalized in March, he said, and in addition to the America-centric stars, each city would also present its own national favorites.

Wall is gunning for saturation coverage. The concerts will be streamed by MSN, the Microsoft Internet portal, and broadcast by NBC. The satellite radio groups Sirius and XM will feature the shows. Similar arrangements are being made in the other six nations. And at the center of it all? "Two billion sets of eyeballs," Wall said, "and we'll hand the mike to Al Gore."

Asked yet again if he's running for president ("no"), the former veep was quizzed about lingering skeptics of global warming. Gore sighed, and then joked that the doubters must get together on Saturday nights with the folks who believe the moon landings were staged in the Arizona desert. Said Gore, "I'm running out of things to say to them."

Attorney Pleads Guilty To Leaking BALCO Testimony (AP)

By PAUL ELIAS And DAVID KRAVETS

AP, February 16, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO - A Colorado lawyer pleaded guilty Thursday to obstructing justice by leaking secret grand jury documents to two reporters covering the government's probe of steroids in sports. Troy Ellerman could be sent to prison for as long as two years and fined up to $250,000 for the convictions. His sentencing was scheduled for June 14.

The 44-year-old Ellerman also could lose his license to practice law.

He entered the plea in U.S. District Court the day after federal prosecutors announced he struck a deal that would prevent two San Francisco Chronicle reporters from going to jail for refusing to divulge their source.

Prosecutor Douglas Miller said the plea concludes the government's investigation of the leaks and the subpoenas of the Chronicle's Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams were withdrawn.

In court papers filed Wednesday, Ellerman said he allowed Williams and Fainaru-Wada to view transcripts of the grand jury testimony of baseball stars Barry Bonds, Jason Giambi, Gary Sheffield and sprinter Tim Montgomery.

Eve Burton, general counsel for Hearst Corp., which owns the Chronicle, would not confirm or deny that Ellerman was the source of the leaked documents. The reporters also declined to discuss their source.

Ellerman, of Woodland Park, Colo., briefly represented Victor Conte, the founder of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-operative, the Burlingame-based supplements lab that allegedly provided performance-enhancing drugs to the elite athletes. He later represented BALCO vice president James Valente and that's when he obtained transcripts of the athletes' testimony from federal prosecutors.

"I find the fact that Troy Ellerman has admitted to leaking the BALCO grand jury transcripts to be outrageous," Conte said in an e-mail to The Associated Press.

Ellerman signed agreements with prosecutors and was under court orders to keep the grand jury testimony confidential. Ellerman even made a motion in October 2004 to dismiss the case against Valente because of "repeated government leaks of confidential information to the media."

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said Ellerman's behavior was an "abuse of our system of justice."

"Such gamesmanship undermines the integrity of the legal system and demands accountability," he said.

Valente, Conte and three other men have pleaded guilty to steroids-related charges in an earlier phase of the investigation.

The Chronicle published stories in 2004 that reported Giambi and Montgomery admitted to grand jurors that they took steroids, while Bonds and Sheffield testified they didn't knowingly take the drugs.

Shortly after the first leak in June 2004, Judge Susan Illston ordered an investigation. Ellerman and all lawyers in the case filed statements under penalty of perjury swearing that they weren't the source.

Prosecutors said a "previously unknown witness" approached the FBI and offered to help prove that Ellerman was the source. Larry McCormack, former executive director of the Pro Rodeo Hall of Fame and a private investigator who briefly worked for Conte, told the AP on Wednesday that he tipped off FBI agents.

McCormack said he shared a Sacramento office with Ellerman and that Fainaru-Wada visited there several times in 2004. McCormack said Ellerman told him about the leaks.

In February 2005, McCormack moved to Colorado Springs, Colo. to work for Ellerman, who then served as commissioner of the Professional Rodeo Cowboys Association.

DOJ_NMG_0133051

The association's board of directors fired McCormack in August, but he said Ellerman tried to save his job and his decision to call federal investigators and expose the lawyer had nothing to do with his firing.

"My concerns were whether I could be in any kind of criminal jeopardy," said McCormack, a former Yuba County sheriff's deputy. "Another thing that was bothering me was that the government was spending all of this money on the investigations and these reporters are looking at going to prison - it ate me alive."

Shortly after McCormack was fired, he said he wore an FBI wire and had a "heated conversation" with Ellerman in which the lawyer made incriminating statements. McCormack declined to discuss the details of that conversation.

San Francisco U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said the plea deal should end speculation that his office was a source of the leaks.

"I've maintained from the beginning that neither the agents nor the federal prosecutors involved in the BALCO case were the source of any grand jury leaks," he said.

Besides Conte and Valente, chemist Patrick Arnold, Bonds' personal trainer Greg Anderson, and track coach Remi Korchemny have all pleaded guilty in the BALCO probe. Korchemny and Valente were sentenced to probation and the others were each sentenced to jail terms no longer than four months.

Bonds has never been charged but suspicion continues to dog the San Francisco Giants slugger as he chases baseball's career home run record.

He told the grand jury he thought Anderson had given him flaxseed oil and arthritic balm, rather than the BALCO steroids known as "The Clear" and "The Cream." A federal grand jury is investigating him for possible perjury and obstruction of justice charges.

For Ellerman, Life's A Rodeo (NYDN)

By Michael O'keeffe, And Christian Red Daily News Sports Writers

New York Daily News, February 16, 2007

Attorney Troy Ellerman's daredevil personality dates back to his childhood, when he learned how to climb aboard a wild bull and tried to stay airborne for more than eight seconds.

"He went to my bull-riding school and I've known him ever since he was a kid," Gary Leffew, who still runs the boot camp-style ranch three hours north of Los Angeles in Nipoma, Calif., told the Daily News yesterday. "He's been a friend forever. His whole family was in the rodeo. They were trick riders. I know Troy. I can't imagine him doing something underhanded."

But Ellerman's maverick ways may land him in jail following his bombshell admission Wednesday that he leaked the BALCO grand jury testimony to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters. And that's only the beginning of his troubles: He may also face disbarment and stands to lose a grip on his second love alongside the law - professional rodeo.

After becoming the commissioner of the Professional Rodeo Cowboys Association two years ago, the 44-year-old Ellerman is in jeopardy of being forced to step down by the board of directors, according to one person familiar with the situation.

"It's been rumored that (the PRCA board of directors) is going to call a vote about removing him," Leon Vick, a former PRCA board member, told The News. Vick, who clashed with Ellerman when the two worked together, was eventually forced out, he claims, after he raised questions about some of Ellerman's financial management decisions. Vick claims Ellerman was the one who was behind his dismissal.

"There were contracts that (Ellerman) had sealed and wouldn't show the board of directors on sales of different entities. I thought he was unprofessional as a business leader," Vick said.

When asked if Ellerman faced possible dismissal from his post, Ellerman's assistant Carol Boyles said flatly, "I can say he's the commissioner." A PRCA press release was quick to distance Ellerman's role in the BALCO scandal with the Colorado Springs-based rodeo sanctioning body.

"The BALCO investigation is not related to PRCA business. Mr. Ellerman currently serves as commissioner of the Professional Rodeo Cowboys Association in Colorado Springs, Colo.," the statement said.

According to the PRCA bio on Ellerman, his family performed in a traveling rodeo troupe called The Flying Cossacks during the mid-to-late '70s, making stops from Red Bluff (Calif.) to the Belmont Stakes on Long Island. Ellerman later got the role of stunt double for Paul Hogan in the 1994 comedy/western, "Lightning Jack." He became chairman of PRCA's board of directors in 1999 and quickly worked on correcting the nonprofit's financial problems. According to PRCA figures, Ellerman brought an $8.2 million turnaround since taking the helm as commissioner. However, his rodeo accolades soon may be overshadowed by his role in the BALCO investigation, during which he served on the original legal team representing the company's founder, Victor Conte, and vice president, James Valente.

"I think it was just Troy being Troy," Larry McCormack, the private investigator who told the FBI in December that Ellerman was the source of the BALCO leaks, told The News yesterday. "Troy has always been one to jump out and do things out of the norm. He's an unusual guy. I tried to convince him to straighten this out. I think he just felt this is a way to do it, to get the case dismissed against his client. It was a way to throw something in the mix - what Troy calls getting people off their game. Did it help his client? Well, his client didn't have to do any jail time."

Michael Rains, who represents Barry Bonds - one of the athletes whose grand-jury testimony Ellerman leaked - told The News that Ellerman's actions as a lawyer were "disturbing.

"Lawyers will do a lot of things to help their clients," Rains said. "To go to that extreme is disturbing. There's really no excuse for it."

McCormack, who shared an office with Ellerman in Sacramento, moved back to Colorado Springs shortly after Ellerman became the PRCA's commissioner. He was later fired from the organization's board of directors, although he claims it was not because of the mounting strain on his relationship with Ellerman. Despite outing Ellerman as a 21st-century "Deep Throat," McCormack said he does not think the BALCO scandal will jeopardize Ellerman's place in the rodeo world.

"Rodeo is his lifestyle," McCormack said. "I think he'll be able to support himself in the rodeo business. There are a lot of people who would offer him a job. I think he'll be okay."

Attorney Pleads Guilty To Media Leak In Balco Steroids Case (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, February 16, 2007

Feb. 15 (Bloomberg) -- A lawyer who represented a criminal defendant in a federal probe into steroids pleaded guilty to showing baseball player Barry Bonds's grand jury testimony to a reporter and lying about it.

Troy Ellerman, 44, pleaded guilty in San Francisco federal court today to two counts of contempt of court, one count of obstruction of justice and one count of filing a false declaration, a statement from the Los Angeles U.S. Attorney's office said. Ellerman let a San Francisco Chronicle reporter take notes on grand jury transcripts of testimony by Bonds and three other athletes in 2004 in violation of a court order and later blamed leaks on the government, the statement said.

Ellerman's motive was to use leaks in the case as a basis for seeking to have the criminal case against his client thrown out, the statement said. Ellerman had access to the transcripts because he was representing the vice president of Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative, known as Balco, a Burlingame, California-based lab at the center of a U.S. criminal probe of steroid distribution, said the statement.

``Such gamesmanship undermines the integrity of the legal system and demands accountability, " said Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul McNulty, in a statement.

Subpoenas Withdrawn

Scott Tedmon, an attorney for Ellerman, didn't immediately return a message. A plea agreement calls for Ellerman of Woodland Park, Colorado, to serve two years in prison; his sentence will be decided by a judge. Sentencing is scheduled for June 14, the statement said.

The U.S. Justice Department is withdrawing subpoenas to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters who used the transcripts in a series of stories about the California lab, the statement said. The reporters had been found in contempt of court for refusing to testify to a separate grand jury about their sources.

``We're pleased that the prosecutors have stopped their efforts to force us to testify about the sources for our reporting on the Balco sports steroids case," said Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, the San Francisco Chronicle reporters, in a statement.

Fainaru-Wada and Williams wrote in December 2004 that Bonds told the grand jury he might have unknowingly used substances containing steroids. Bonds, who has denied using steroids, said he thought the substances were flax seed oil and a legal ointment, the Chronicle reported.

Balco's co-founders, including one represented by Ellerman, two track coaches and a trainer for Bonds have pleaded guilty in the steroids probe.

The case is U.S. v Troy Ellerman, 07-0080, U.S. District Court, San Francisco.

Fayetteville Couple, 24 Others Busted In Drug Ring (AJC)

By Kathy Jefcoats, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 15, 2007

A Fayetteville real estate agent and her husband masterminded a $12 million operation to grow marijuana hydroponically in the basements of vacant $300,000 homes, police from at least six Georgia counties announced Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0133053

Fayette County sheriff's drug agents said Blanca Botello, 34, is a licensed ReMax Realtor who helped close the sale on at least a dozen homes used in the operation. The homes are owned by Cuban nationals who also may be charged, police said at a news conference.

Police said Botello's husband, Merquiades Martinez, 35, owns a hydroponics store in Fayetteville. Hydroponics refers to a soil-less process of growing plants in water and nutrients.

Fayette District Attorney Scott Ballard said the couple, along with 24 others, mostly Cuban nationals, are charged with manufacturing and trafficking marijuana and theft of services. Ballard said all 26 are in county jails. No other suspect names were released.

Fayette sheriff's Lt. Dwayne Prosser said the massive amount of electricity used in the grow process was diverted to the house so it wouldn't show up on meters and raise suspicion.

"Phenomenal is the best word I can use to describe this operation," Prosser said.

Fayette County Sheriff Randall Johnson said marijuana was being grown in the basements of 11 homes in Fayette, Henry, Coweta, Butts, Newton and Rockdale counties. Agents raided a 12th home Wednesday afternoon in the exclusive Lake Dow community in Henry County, said Maj. Stoney Mathis of the Henry Police Department.

Prosser said the investigation, which originated from the Jones County Sheriff's Office and the Drug Enforcement Agency, is ongoing and more arrests are expected.

FAYETTEVILLE, Ga. (AP) — A real estate agent and her husband are accused of running a $12 million operation to grow marijuana in the basements of vacant homes, authorities in several Georgia counties said.

Fayette County sheriff's drug agents said Blanca Botello, 34, is a licensed ReMax Realtor who helped close the sale on at least a dozen homes used in the operation. The homes are owned by Cuban nationals who also may be charged, police said Wednesday.

Police said Botello's husband, Merquiades Martinez, 35, owns a hydroponics store in Fayetteville. Hydroponics, the process used to grow the marijuana, refers to a soil-less process of growing plants in water and nutrients.

The couple, along with 24 others, mostly Cuban nationals, are charged with manufacturing and trafficking marijuana and theft of services, Fayette County District Attorney Scott Ballard said.

Ballard said all 26 are in county jails. The names of the other suspects were not released.

Fayette County Sheriff Randall Johnson said the marijuana was being grown in the basements of 11 homes in Fayette, Henry, Coweta, Butts, Newton and Rockdale counties. Agents raided a 12th home Wednesday afternoon in an exclusive neighborhood in Henry County, said Henry County police Maj. Stoney Mathis.

Electricity was diverted to the drug growing operation so the heavy power use would not show up on a house's electric meter and arouse suspicion, Fayette County sheriff's Lt. Dwayne Prosser said.

"Phenomenal is the best word I can use to describe this operation," Prosser said.

Prosser said the investigation, which began with the Jones County Sheriff's Office and the Drug Enforcement Agency, is ongoing and more arrests are expected. ———

Hot Pot... (FDN)

Fayette Daily News, February 15, 2007

It all started when Fayette County Drug Task Force agents got a tip from Miami DEA agents -- a name.

Nearly two months of investigations later, Fayette drug agents had a lot more -- names, places and information on possibly the largest ever indoor marijuana growing operation.

And Wednesday, Fayette County Sheriff Randall Johnson joined with law enforcement officials from several nearby agencies to announce the arrest of 26 people, including the ring-leaders -- Merquides Martinez, a Cuban National, and his wife, Blanca Botello, of Greenway Court in Fayette County.

Johnson said 25 of the 26 arrested are Cuban Nationals.

The arrests, according to Johnson, came after Fayette County Drug Task Force agents and agents from the East Metro Drug Task Force, Henry County Police, Newton County Sheriff's Department, Rockdale County Sheriff's Office, Butts County Sheriff's Office and the Coweta County Sheriff's Department executed 13 search warrants and discovered a highly sophisticated hydroponics marijuana growing operation in the basements of 11 homes.

Inside each home, Johnson said, were 200 plants -- for a total of nearly 2,100 plants with a value of more than $12 million.

"When we got the tip from Miami, all we had was a name, and information that the master-grower might be living in Fayette County," said Capt. Mike Pruitt, head of the Fayette County Sheriff's Drug Task Force.

"It took two months of work to identify the houses and people involved. And this was the result of all these departments working together."

According to Pruitt, that name given by DEA agents, Merquides Martinez, turned out to be the mastermind behind the large marijuana operation, although no plants were found in his home in south Fayette County.

Martinez owns Panoramic Gardens, a hydroponics store (soil-less growing) on Hwy 85 North in Fayette County, according to agents, and his wife, Blanca Botello, was a real estate agent in Fayetteville.

"It turns out his wife was the closing agent on all of the houses," said Lt. Dwayne Prosser of the Fayette County Sheriff's Department. "The houses were sold to Cuban Nationals from Miami, who then operated the marijuana grows in the basement."

Johnson said power had been diverted in each of the houses to provide the heat lamps for the plants. The power lines had been tapped into before the line reached the meter, Johnson said.

"Without stealing the electricity, red flags would have gone up because of the amount of electricity being used," said Prosser.

According to agents, the plants were in different growth stages at each house.

With a 90 day growth period, some were in infant stages, while others were ready for harvest.

"Some were so tall, the plants were tied to the ceilings with fish nets to keep them from breaking and to preserve the plant," said Prosser.

When agents arrived at a house on Covington Highway, they found plants already pulled for harvest and loaded into the back of a rental truck, Pruitt said.

At another house, agents discovered 30 lbs of marijuana -- in one pounds bags -- in a closet and another 30 one-pound bags in the guest bedroom.

"This was a very elaborate set-up with the lights and irrigation system" said Johnson.

"Most of the houses were in well-traveled areas, you wouldn't notice a lot of traffic because it's a growing operation."

According to agents, the houses were located at 1624 Hwy 162 in Newton County, 440 Ellistown Road in Henry County, 420 Parker Road in Newton County, 2602 Abbey Road in Rockdale County, 300 Hanie Road in Coweta County and 105 Greenway Court in Fayette County.

"All the houses had the same set-up with lighting and irrigation and sealed basement floors," said Capt. Pruitt.

As Johnson made his announcement in a press conference Wednesday, he stated that another search warrant was being executed in a nearby county "as we speak."

"We expect there could be a lot more."

Martinez was arrested at the Coweta County house and was being held in the Coweta County Jail, officials said.

Botello was arrested at the couple's Fayetteville home and was being held in the Fayette County Jail.

Fayette County District Attorney Scott Ballard said he planned to meet with prosecutors from each jurisdiction about the possibility of prosecuting all 26 in Fayette County under a conspiracy charge.

Police: Convict Faked Badge To Rob Drug Dealers (NYS)

New York Sun, February 16, 2007

A career criminal who once tried to shoot a New York police officer in the head was charged with impersonating a Drug Enforcement Agency special agent to rob drug dealers around the city, law enforcement officials said.

A joint task force of DEA agents and city and state police officers arrested Anthony Clanton, 34, on Tuesday at his apartment at 755 Narrows Road in Staten Island.

Investigators found several counterfeit documents, including a DEA badge, a billfold with DEA credentials, two search warrants, and a Metropolitan Transportation Authority parking permit in his home, officials said. The task force also found 124 grams of crack cocaine, three handguns, 500 rounds of ammunition, a police scanner, a bulletproof vest, handcuffs, and drug paraphernalia.

On Wednesday, Clanton was arraigned on charges of burglary, criminal possession of a weapon, conspiracy, and possession of a controlled substance, according to a complaint filed in the Special Narcotics Court in Manhattan. He is being held without bail. The first court date after the arraignment is Friday.

Clanton's attorney, Xavier Donaldson, declined to respond to the charges. "We're very interested in hearing the prosecutors' evidence against my client," he said.

Clanton was charged with an armed robbery on January 8, but officials said they were investigating a series of other robberies he may have committed.

Clanton kicked down the door to an apartment in Queens belonging to one victim, Denise Matos, after saying, "I am a DEA agent," and showing a false search warrant, according to the complaint and officials. He then raided the home, making off with $4,000 and jewelry.

It appears as though Clanton was an adept counterfeiter who likely generated the false documents on his personal computer, officials said.

"The shield could have fooled a DEA agent, which is scary because of the access he could have gained," the head special agent of the New York office of the Drug Enforcement Agency, John Gilbride, said.

Clanton was arrested in 1997 for attempting to shoot an undercover police officer in the head, police said. The officer, whose name was not released because he works undercover, was heard on a wiretap pleading for his life before Clanton pulled the trigger three times, police said. The gun malfunctioned and the officer was not injured.

After serving 97 months in prison, Clanton was released in 2005, police said.

Clanton enjoyed an extravagant lifestyle after getting out of prison, Mr. Gilbride said.

"He had all the toys," he said.

Each room of his Staten Island apartment was outfitted with a plasma screen television, and a $10,000 Rolex watch was found in his bedroom. He also owned four cars: an Infiniti, an Acura, a Mercedes-Benz, and a Range Rover. One of the cars had a license place that read "HATED."

It appears that Clanton was planning another robbery, according to the court complaint. A DEA agent observed Clanton carrying out "what appeared to be surveillance" in the vicinity of 419 64th St. in Brooklyn. That address was found on one of the phony search warrants in Clanton's home.

Fake Cop's Crime Spree (NYDN)

By Alison Gendar, Daily News Police Bureau Chief

New York Daily News, February 16, 2007

A reputed Bloods gang member who tried to kill an undercover cop a decade ago was busted for impersonating a federal agent - and possessing a real cop's stolen gun, authorities said yesterday.

When investigators searched Anthony Clanton's apartments in Staten Island, they found a bogus Drug Enforcement Administration badge, homemade search warrants, an MTA parking placard and other fake identification, police said.

Investigators also found three guns, including a loaded 9-mm. Glock handgun reported stolen by an NYPD officer Jan. 31, authorities said.

Clanton allegedly used the fake DEA badge, search warrants and possibly the real cop's gun to rob drug dealers and finance a luxurious lifestyle.

He owns a minifleet of high-end cars, including a Mercedes-Benz, Range Rover, Acura - and an Infiniti Q45 with license plates reading "HATED," authorities said.

He also has maid service for both of his apartments on Narrows Road, plasma TVs on the walls of every room and owns a saphire-and-diamond-studded Rolex worth about $10,000, authorities said.

"Clanton is at the heart of a smorgasbord of criminal activity - drugs, violent crime and impersonating law enforcement," said John Gilbride, special agent in charge of the DEA's New York office. "Getting this kind of violent felon off the street is what it's all about."

Clanton, 34, was arrested Tuesday by a joint NYPD, DEA and state police task force dubbed the Redrum Unit. Redrum is "murder" spelled backward, and the unit targets violent drug gangs.

Clanton served eight years in federal prison for trying to murder an undercover cop in 1997, authorities said. The cop was wearing a wire and could be heard begging for his life as Clanton held a gun to his head and pulled the trigger three times. Each time the gun failed to fire.

Clanton was released in 2005, and went back to crime, authorities said. He allegedly controlled several drug-dealing locations at public housing projects in Brooklyn and Staten Island.

Authorities would not identify the cop who owned the stolen gun found in Clanton's apartment. The cop had told NYPD brass that his gun was stolen from his locked trunk sometime between November and January, sources said.

The NYPD Internal Affairs Bureau was investigating the cop on an unrelated matter before the gun was stolen, sources said. NYPD policy forbids cops from leaving their guns unattended in their cars, the sources noted.

Authorities were investigating whether the cop's stolen gun was used in any of Clanton's crimes.

In one case, Clanton - who was charged with burglary, conspiracy, weapons crimes and possession of stolen property and drugs - used his fake DEA identification and a bogus search warrant when he kicked down the door of a Queens man on Jan. 8.

"I am a DEA agent," Clanton allegedly yelled, flashing a gun and a gold shield before swiping $4,000.

Staten Island: Badge Is Said To Aid Theft (NYT)

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

A Staten Island man has been charged with using a Drug Enforcement Administration badge and fraudulent search warrants to commit robberies over the past few months, state and federal law enforcement officials said yesterday. The man, Tony Clanton, 34, of Narrows Road, is charged with impersonating a federal agent, theft and illegal possession of guns and drugs, said Bridget G. Brennan, the city's special narcotics prosecutor. Ms. Brennan said Mr. Clanton used a high-quality replica of D.E.A. credentials and fake search warrants to gain entrance to homes he intended to rob. He was arrested on Tuesday afternoon, she said.

Staten Island Man Arrested For Posing As Federal Agent (NY1)

NY1, February 15, 2007

Police arrested a Staten Island man Thursday who they say posed as a federal agent and even made his own shield.

When Anthony Clanton's home was raided, police also found other fake law enforcement credentials, including two search warrants they believe Clanton made himself.

Officials believe one warrant may have been used in a robbery last month.

The Drug Enforcement Administration says they also took guns, ammunition, crack cocaine, and a police scanner from the home.

Clanton's arrest was the result of a joint investigation that began in November of 2006.

Cops: Impersonator Has Long History (AMNY)

AM New York, February 16, 2007

Ten years ago, Anthony Clanton tried to kill an undercover cop, but his gunned jammed three times as the officer was heard on a recording device begging for his life.

Clanton served eight years in federal prison, then returned to a life of crime, pulling robberies while posing as a federal agent, authorities said Thursday.

Clanton, 33, was arrested at his Staten Island home Tuesday afternoon and charged with a burglary in Queens, authorities said. Police said he is considered a suspect in up to nine other cases in which the suspect posed as a cop or federal agent to commit burglaries or robberies.

Inside Clanton's Narrows Road home, authorities said they found 300 guns, one stolen from a cop, 300 rounds of ammunition, a bullet proof vest, a realistic-looking photo ID for HIDTA, the acronym for the law enforcement agency known as High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area.

They also found warrants he created on his computer.

Armed with such a warrant, authorities said, Clanton kicked down the door of a Jackson Heights home on Jan. 8.

"I am a DEA agent," police said Clanton claimed. He then stole at least $4,000, plus jewelry, before fleeing.

Then, on Feb. 7, with authorities now tipped to what Clanton was doing, Clanton was seen casing a Sunset Park home whose tenant he planned to rob, officials said.

Authorities arrested him Tuesday. He was close to pulling that robbery, authorities said, as in his apartment they found a search warrant, adorned with a seal that resembled the Drug Enforcement Administration and with the 64th Street address printed on it.

Clanton, who also went by the name Dennis Condon, is being held without bail. His attorney could not be reached to comment.

Clanton has been on federal probation since 1995, when he was released from prison after serving 97 months for an Eastern District case in which he was convicted of the gunpoint robbery of an undercover police officer to whom he had sold a gun.

Clanton, apparently unaware the seller was a cop, tried to shoot him dead in a car, but fate intervened, with back-up listening in on the officer's wire.

"You heard the undercover begging for his life," Capt. John Burke said yesterday. "You heard him pull the trigger three times, but it misfired."

After A Sting, Gun Dealer Gets Stung (PHI)

By Melissa Dribben

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 16, 2007

Fifteen years ago, when Raymond Tanner graduated high school, his dad switched careers.

Radically.

He sold his share of a dairy farm stand and opened a gun shop. The Bucks County family had always loved hunting, Tanner says, so selling rifles, revolvers and cartridges was a logical move.

But going from butter to guns has its downside.

You have to worry about doing business with the wrong customers. And a Washington lobbying group could post your name on its Web site, naming you as an arms dealer who caters to criminals.

Which is what happened last month when the Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence released a report, "Shady Dealings: Illegal Gun Trafficking from Licensed Gun Dealers." Tanner's store was featured as one of the scurrilous.

What the Brady Center didn't know is that the sale had been a sting, arranged in cooperation with the local office of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Lanky and laid-back, a yellow polo shirt tucked loosely into his jeans, Ray Tanner, 33, now manages Tanner's Sport Center in Jamison, Bucks County, for his father. The family prides itself on running an honest operation, he said.

Along the back wall, hundreds of rifles stand at attention, mahogany stocks gleaming, barrels pointed skyward. In one corner, a massive elk with prodigious antlers appears to be caught, mid-charge, coming through the wall.

In this small suburban shop, which stocks fishing reels and insect repellent, baseball caps and flashlights, as well as 1,500 firearms - about half of them handguns - spotting bad guys is relatively easy.

About once a month, the sales staff turns away a suspicious customer. Usually, Tanner says, a couple will come in. The man will look at handguns. He'll know just what he's looking for.

While he considers the fine points, the woman will wander around, utterly uninterested. But when they're ready to buy, she'll be the one filling out the paperwork. If it can be proved she bought the guns for the man, it is a "straw purchase" - a felony.

Gun shops that willfully sell to straw purchasers can also lose their license and face prosecution, says John Hageman, special agent for the Philadelphia office of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

So gun dealers are in a tricky spot, Hageman says. "They are businessmen dealing in a commodity. If they profile people, they risk alienating legitimate customers. But if they aren't suspicious enough and allow criminals to buy guns, they risk not only their credibility and their license, but people's lives.

"It is not an exact science," Hageman says.

Two years ago this month, a local ATF agent dropped by Tanner's with a photograph of Michael Daniels, 31, of Philadelphia, a convicted felon suspected of patronizing gun shops in the area.

A few weeks later, on Feb. 21, Daniels showed up. "We recognized him right away," Tanner says. He strolled in with another felon, Lawrence Whitehead, and a crack addict, Angela Miles, 32, both Philadelphia residents. She hung out, Tanner says, while the men shopped for a Glock and two other pistols.

Without a word, one of the sales staff slipped into the back and called the ATF.

"They said they couldn't send someone over right away and asked us to stall," Tanner recalls. "We were told they were felons, but we didn't know what these guys had done."

According to court documents, Whitehead, 28, had escaped from a halfway house after spending seven years in prison for robbery. Daniels had multiple robbery and drug convictions. Neither could pass the background checks required for a gun purchase.

So when it was time to pay, they summoned Miles to the cash register.

Whitehead and Daniels agreed to give her $25 of crack and $65 cash if she put her name on the forms, court records said. Before leaving Philadelphia, she'd smoked the down payment.

When Miles finished the paperwork, the salesman told her that the computer system was down, so they couldn't do the background check until the next day.

Later, Tanner learned that the three drove to another gun shop to see if the computers were really down.

They were.

The next day, Daniels, Whitehead and Miles returned to complete the purchase. When they left the shop, the ATF was waiting to greet them.

Miles cooperated with the federal agents, according to court records, and was found to have bought an additional nine handguns in 2001, three of which were recovered by the Philadelphia police in connection with crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0133058

The mother of seven (according to court documents, she is not involved in their care), Miles was initially given four years' probation, but she violated the terms, so she was sentenced to five months in custody.

Whitehead was sent to prison for 46 months. Daniels was sentenced to 60 months.

And Tanner's Sport Center?

A black eye for good behavior.

Oops.

A local newspaper ran the news from the Brady report on the front page.

"The phones started ringing off the hook," Tanner says. Some customers were outraged and threatened never to do business with the place again. Others called to say they couldn't believe it was true.

Tim Moran, who was working the counter the day of the sting, looked up the Brady Center on the Internet and called to complain. Dennis Henigan, legal director for the group, called him to apologize. Tanner's was removed from the report, and a correction was posted on the Brady Center's Web site.

"It's the first time that this has happened," Henigan said this week.

IMMIGRATION:

Cuban Jetliner Bombing Suspect Faces US Immigration Trial (AFP)

By Marie Gilot

AFP, February 16, 2007

An anti-Castro militant accused of bombing a Cuban jetliner in Venezuela three decades ago will face trial in the United States on May 11 on charges of lying in his citizenship application, a US judge has ruled.

Both Cuba and Venezuela have protested the fact that the United States has not pressed charges against Luis Posada Carriles, 78, for allegedly masterminding the 1976 bombing that killed 73 people.

Posada has denied his involvement in the jetliner bombing, but has reportedly admitted involvement in a string of hotel bombings in Cuba in 1997 and in a plot to kill Cuban leader Fidel Castro in Panama in 2000.

Venezuela and Cuba have also accused the United States of hypocrisy for refusing to extradite Posada to face terrorism charges in Venezuela.

"The United States has resorted to a new legal subterfuge to avoid charging Luis Posadas Carriles for what he really is: a murderer and a terrorist," said Cuba's Foreign Ministry earlier this month.

The US government tried to deport Posada after he held a May 2005 press conference in Miami which alerted immigration officers that he had entered the country illegally.

But a US judge ruled Posada cannot be deported to Cuba or Venezuela, where he was a naturalized citizen, because he may face torture there.

US authorities have so far been unable to find a country willing to take Posada, a native Cuban and former CIA operative who was trained to participate in the failed Bay of Pigs invasion of Cuba in 1961 and went on to become chief of operations at Venezuela's secret intelligence police, Disip, in the 1970s.

The crime for which he is being prosecuted in the United States is relatively minor, though it carries potentially stiff penalties.

Posada allegedly lied about how he had entered the country when applying for asylum. Court documents showed he said he was smuggled in by land in March 2005, but a government investigation found out that he really arrived by boat with other anti-Castro militants who are now also under indictment.

Posada has pleaded not guilty to the immigration charges for which he could face up to 10 years in prison for fraud and up to five years for each of six counts of making false statements.

He has been held in an El Paso detention facility for more than a year and a half and has been pressing to be released so he can be with his wife, children and grandchildren who live in Miami.

Posada, who is in ill health, was transferred to the El Paso facility because he could have access to a high-quality clinic and because authorities were fearful for his safety in Miami.

Santiago Alvarez, Posada's benefactor who allegedly helped bring Posada to the United States, is currently serving time on federal weapons charges out of Florida for amassing an illegal arsenal apparently meant to help topple Castro. That case did not involve Posada.

TAX:

Democrats Focus On Tax Relief For Middle Class (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The new Democratic-controlled Congress is looking to rein in looming tax increases on the middle class, possibly covering the cost by raising taxes on upper-income households. And the Bush administration may not stand in the way.

The possible bargain centers on the Alternative Minimum Tax, a kind of parallel income tax that hit 3.5 million U.S. taxpayers in the 2006 tax year. Congressional Democrats are eager to keep the AMT from ensnaring millions more middle-class taxpayers. They also must find a way to cover the estimated $50 billion cost of scaling back the tax this year.

In recent days, Bush administration officials have signaled they may not oppose a likely method of covering those costs: raising taxes on the nation's wealthiest citizens. That concession could mark the beginning of a bigger debate on revisiting the Bush tax cuts, which could ultimately lead to reversing at least some of the cuts given to upper-income Americans over the past six years.

The AMT dates back to the late 1960s when Congress discovered that a small number of upper-income households had managed to avoid federal income taxes entirely by exploiting deductions, credits, loopholes, and shelters. The AMT has been adjusted since. But because it has never been indexed for inflation, rapidly growing numbers of taxpayers are vulnerable to its bite. The Treasury estimates that unless Congress acts, more than 23 million households will be affected by the AMT in the current tax year, many with incomes below $100,000.

Among those most likely to face higher tax bills because of the AMT, at least in the near term, are those who live in high-tax states such as New York, California and Massachusetts, which also tend to be Democratic-leaning. Unlike regular income taxes, the AMT doesn't provide for deductions of state and local taxes.

The Bush tax cuts have accelerated the AMT's reach into the middle class, by reducing the amounts those households would pay under the regular income tax. That's particularly true for families claiming multiple child credits.

The White House and key lawmakers in both parties agree some kind of fix should be enacted to prevent the AMT from reaching further into the middle class, at least for this year. The big question: If Congress passes a bill raising taxes to finance such a measure, would President Bush, a staunch opponent of tax increases, veto it?

Mr. Bush is likely to remain firmly opposed to raising marginal tax rates. But administration officials have been quietly suggesting that he wouldn't necessarily object if Democrats passed a "revenue neutral" bill that cut taxes paid under AMT and raised them elsewhere to offset any revenue lost to the Treasury.

These officials say replacing the tax increase that's scheduled under the AMT with a tax increase somewhere else doesn't, on balance, raise taxes. Indeed, a health-care proposal Mr. Bush recently floated to raise taxes on people with high-value health benefits shows he is willing to accept some forms of tax increases on upper-income Americans.

Democrats have been circumspect about disclosing their plans for new taxes, which are in the early stages. A group of Democratic senators yesterday unveiled a proposal for new middle-class tax breaks, including extending AMT relief for two years. A spokesman for one of the sponsors, New York Sen. Charles Schumer, said the lawmakers would suggest paying for that relief through some combination of higher taxes on oil companies, higher taxes on families making more than $400,000 a year, and ramping up enforcement to grab more of the "tax gap," taxes that the Internal Revenue Service says are owed but persistently aren't paid.

The chairman of the Senate's tax panel, Montana Democrat Max Baucus, recently proposed eliminating the AMT.

Beyond the next year or two, House Democrats are studying how they might enact a longer-term AMT reprieve for some taxpayers. One option under discussion would permanently exempt households with annual incomes of as much as $250,000 from paying the AMT, with some kind of graduated relief for those between $250,000 and $500,000. To offset the revenue shortfall, people making more than $500,000 a year could be required to pay more tax, either through a higher AMT rate, or higher regular income-tax rates.

It's unclear whether the administration would be amenable to such a major change and its attendant tax increases. But some Democrats are saying that providing a tax cut for the middle and upper-middle classes would have political and policy benefits that justify tackling the issue.

"It's going to cause a little pain. I think for what we're doing, it's worth it..." says Rep. Charles Rangel (D., N.Y.), chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0133060

The AMT requires taxpayers to do two sets of calculations. First, they calculate their taxes using regular rules. Then they have to calculate their taxes again using a second set of rules, and pay whichever sum is higher. Typically, the very wealthy don't get hit by the AMT because their regular income-tax liability tends to be higher, although the bulk of filers who pay the AMT have incomes above $200,000 a year.

Rep. Richard Neal (D., Mass.), tapped by Mr. Rangel as the House Democrats' point man on the issue, declined to comment on what specific direction he wants to take on the AMT, saying only that he is seeking an "egalitarian" approach. Mr. Neal has in the past proposed eliminating the AMT altogether, and making up for the lost revenue with graduated income-tax increases for households with incomes of $120,000 a year or higher.

There's broad agreement in Congress that something should be done about the AMT. For the past six years, with a Republican majority, lawmakers have voted to exempt millions of people from paying the tax, keeping the number of people affected by AMT at less than four million.

But this year, House Democrats have reinstated 1990s-era budget rules that lapsed under Republicans -- requiring new tax cuts to be offset by equivalent tax increases or spending cuts. Senate Democrats have indicated they will do the same.

And that, in turn, is leading to the bigger debate about the Bush tax cuts. Democrats are gearing up to make the case that many middle-class families wouldn't fully benefit from those tax cuts because of the AMT -- and thus, it's a matter of fairness to modify the AMT, possibly by undoing some of those cuts.

Many Democrats say the Bush cuts are the biggest factor in making middle-class people more likely to pay the AMT. Some Republicans, meanwhile, say that it's illogical to make AMT relief contingent on raising taxes to offset lost revenues, since Congress has been rescuing most people from AMT expansion anyway.

Those points will be a major focus of a series of hearings next month by the Select Revenue Subcommittee of House Ways and Means. "There are a lot of people who never really benefit from the Bush tax cuts," says Mr. Neal, who is chairman of the panel. "There will be a full acknowledgement that is the case."

Reps. Rangel, Neal and others say the people in their states are acutely aware of the threat of the AMT, despite the repeated patches passed by Congress.

In Westchester County, which covers several New York Democrats' congressional districts, County Executive Andrew Spano's financial adviser recently warned him he might be hit this year by the AMT. Mr. Spano, who is married and has a salary of $163,000, has been urging action in Washington to rein in the AMT. In the past, Mr. Spano hasn't been personally affected by the tax. "I'm not happy about it, but I'm in better shape than most," he says. Even people with seemingly high incomes may have trouble paying the AMT in areas like Westchester County, where the cost of living is high, he adds.

One self-described "plain vanilla taxpayer" who Mr. Neal's office offered as an example is Maggie Rauh, a 40-year-old tax accountant in Chicopee, Mass. Ms. Rauh and her husband have three children under 12 and a combined income of $75,000. She tracks their projected tax refund monthly and says she recently was "shocked" to find out they would be subject to the AMT. "I sat here at my computer and my jaw dropped," says Ms. Rauh. "I was outraged."

Ms. Rauh, who usually votes Republican, says she was happy about recent income-tax cuts passed by Congress, especially the bigger credits provided for each child. But with the AMT, "I'm losing any kind of gain I got," Ms. Rauh says. The Rauhs say they will owe a projected $7,500 this year because of the AMT, compared with the $6,100 they would have owed under the regular income tax.

"That $1,400 is our vacation, our trip to Disney," Ms. Rauh says.

According to a recent report by the Congressional Research Service, households with incomes as low as $50,000 to $70,000 could be hit with the AMT this year. Taxpayers at the lower end of the income range include those claiming three or more children.

For married couples with two children and an income of $70,000, 21% of the value of the Bush tax cuts, or $427, would be lost to the AMT. That "take back" effect is higher -- more than 60% or $2,500 -- for people with incomes of $100,000 to $150,000 and two children, the report said.

Mr. Neal plans to suggest possible solutions to Mr. Rangel by April. "We're going to have to get together and find out what is the political power of 23...million people, over those that will get hurt," says Mr. Rangel, "which I don't think is a big problem."

Democrats Push Economic Policy That Benefits Poor, Middle Classes (KCS/MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

The Kansas City Star, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON - Democrats in Congress are moving quickly to impose their economic agenda now that they've returned to power on Capitol Hill. They're shrugging off strong macro-economic indicators to spotlight sluggish wage growth and a rise in mortgage defaults, and they're even pressuring the Federal Reserve to lower interest rates.

Many Democrats campaigned against the trend of widening income inequality, and they're trying to make good on promises to push economic policy to better serve the poor and middle classes.

Democrats don't dispute that 4.8 percent unemployment is near historic lows. And they acknowledge that the economy continues to grow at nearly its potential, despite a housing recession.

Even so, they're homing in on narrower issues, such as a rise in mortgage defaults by holders of sub-prime loans, who tend to be minorities and working-class Americans. And they're addressing the job insecurity and general unease many Americans feel over how much the global economy now influences the U.S. economy.

"They're trying to tap into pockets of discontent," said Brian Bethune, chief U.S. economist for Global Insight, a consultancy in Lexington, Mass. "From a point of view of the economy as a whole, the performance of the economy has been exceptional."

Democrats feel that working Americans aren't fully sharing the benefits. Their agenda was on clear display Thursday.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., and a group of freshmen senators introduced a bill promoting what they called middle-class tax cuts. It includes a new tax credit for care of elderly family members and expanding the child tax credit.

Over at the Senate Finance Committee, Chairman Max Baucus, D-Mont., grilled U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab and called for new federal assistance programs to aid service-sector workers displaced by globalization. This "globalization adjustment assistance" would expand programs that help workers who've lost factory jobs to cheaper labor overseas.

In the House of Representatives, Financial Services Committee Chairman Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., accused Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke of a bias toward high lending rates that hurt working Americans.

Just a day earlier before the Senate Banking Committee, Bernanke sparked a stock-market rally by suggesting that inflation pressures were moderating and that economic growth was rebounding. But Bernanke hinted that the Fed is likely to maintain its benchmark lending rate at 5.25 percent - where it's been since August - to guard against inflation in case growth proves stronger than expected.

"If you think it might be more than you think, why did you think it?" Frank asked in a testy exchange. "It does seem a little odd for you to say, `Here's what I think, but it might be worse than I think.' That is literally double-think."

Bernanke held to his view that inflation poses a threat, but he did give ground to Frank on another key Democratic point. He said that there's ample room for businesses to offer higher wages without having to raise prices. Democrats are holding hearings about excessive CEO pay, contrasting that with several years of flat wage growth for workers despite high corporate profits.

The Fed chairman also was grilled on whether predatory lending explains the rise in sub-prime mortgage defaults. The Fed issued new guidelines last year for lenders and borrowers about creative loans that are getting people into homes they previously couldn't afford.

Pressed by Democrats, Bernanke said he would reissue those guidelines to include so-called "2/28 mortgages," which offer a low fixed rate for two years, then adjust annually for the next 28 years. These loans, often offered to minorities and working-class Americans, could leave borrowers with mortgage rates of 13 percent or more.

Bernanke said that a new federal standard defining predatory lending might be necessary, but he added that it should come only after states tried to define and test such standards.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Congress Unease Threatens Doha Deal (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Eoin Callan

Financial Times, February 16, 2007

Unease about globalisation among US legislators is so great that a Doha deal would probably be rejected by Congress, Barney Frank, the Democratic chairman of the House financial services committee, claimed onThursday.

His remarks, at the second day of testimony by Ben Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, come at a moment when the administration is locked in tense negotiations with the Democratic leadership on trade policy.

Mr Frank said: “My own view is that if they were in fact to come to an agreement in the Doha round that the resulting agreement – if they reach it as they are currently talking about – would not pass the House of Representatives.”

While Mr Frank has no specific role in trade, these comments from a senior Democrat show how difficult it will be to reach a compromise satisfying rank-and-file members while keeping open the possibility of further trade deals.

DOJ_NMG_0133062

Max Baucus, chairman of the Senate finance committee, told a trade hearing on Thursday: “I believe we must seize the opportunity to renew fast-track [trade negotiation authority].” But he said it would be essential to “rethink it” – providing better safety nets for displaced workers.

“Many in Congress feel they are not listened to,” Mr Baucus said. “That must change. We must also consider fast-track in the context of Americans’ growing unease over globalisation, international trade, and outsourcing.”

Mr Frank, who is not himself a protectionist, attacked free market purists for provoking a backlash against globalisation. “We are at a very sensitive moment in the making of economic policy in our country,” he said.

Mr Frank said the policy of “a full embrace of globalisation, of technological change” has “now come to an end” because people doubt unfettered free movement of capital is in their interest.

He urged free traders to support policies that spread the benefits more broadly in society.

Backlash Grows Against Free Trade (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, February 16, 2007

Worries about the dark side of free trade are surfacing in the United States in ways that could affect the course of globalization worldwide.

Don't expect an outright retreat from global commerce just yet, but it is becoming more likely that the US will act to temper and manage its impact. The reason: Free-trade brush fires have recently erupted on economic and political fronts:

· This week, the Commerce Department said America's trade deficit rose to $764 billion in 2006, as imports outstripped exports by a record amount for a fifth straight year.

· Democrats are in control of Congress, with new lawmakers in their ranks who are especially eager to do something about what they see as unfair trade practices by China. Bipartisan bills introduced this week could result in retaliatory tariffs or revocation of China's trade status with the US.

"There was a time 10 years ago when it seemed like globalization was consensual, and there were very few remaining questions about whether it was ... a good thing," says Jeffry Frieden, an expert on global economics at Harvard University. The reality, he says, includes a caveat: Trade "can make everyone better off, so long as you compensate the losers."

Concern about globalization is hardly limited to the US. From Europe to Latin America to China, the pattern is the same: Not everyone feels better off, and in those regions, political consequences can include riots or the rise of nationalist governments.

But America, which as the world's largest economy has led the march toward expanding trade for decades, remains an important influence on the world.

Most trade experts don't foresee an outright reversal of the trend. The world's biggest economies are now heavily reliant on trade. Exports account for about 40 percent of Germany's economic activity and a similar share in China, according to Joseph Quinlan, a Banc of America investment strategist in New York.

But the tenor in the halls of power has changed. Supporters of globalization are expending more energy to defend the concept – often calling for new policies to help compensate workers whose jobs migrate abroad.

"[To] retain support for policies of free trade ... we need to make sure that the gains and benefits from these powerful, growth-producing forces are broadly shared," Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said this week in response to a question during congressional testimony.

Trade has always been always destabilizing for the workers in affected industries. What's new is the unprecedented scale and pace of change worldwide. In the 1980s and '90s, China, along with former communist nations and former post-colonial regimes on several continents, joined a global market for labor and goods. Communications technology has been a force of acceleration.

This has been hugely beneficial overall, most economists say. But it comes with strains on jobs and wages that are increasingly apparent. In a USA Today/Gallup poll last year, nearly two-thirds of respondents said trade "mostly hurts" US workers.

One idea under review on Capitol Hill is wage insurance, which provides income as displaced workers transition toward new careers.

The bills this week focus on trying to level what many lawmakers see as a tilted playing field – especially with export powerhouse China.

A bipartisan bill introduced Tuesday would rescind China's Permanent Normal Trade Relations (PNTR) status. It is sponsored by Sens. Byron Dorgan (D) of North Dakota, Lindsey Graham (R) of South Carolina, and Sherrod Brown (D) of Ohio.

DOJ_NMG_0133063

Another new bill, the Fair Currency Act of 2007, classified China as a currency manipulator in violation of US trade law. A tariff boost is threatened under this bill backed by Reps. Duncan Hunter (R) of California and Tim Ryan (D) of Ohio.

Meanwhile, the Bush administration and trade advocates in both parties are scrambling to build support for so-called "fast track" authority to negotiate new agreements to expand trade.

Skeptics abound.

"We need to declare a moratorium on new trade agreements until we figure out how to do this right," says Alan Tonelson of the US Business and Industry Council, which represents companies concerned about the erosion of US manufacturing.

It remains unclear whether the advocates of a harder line on trade will gain traction. Some economists believe this will be a better year for US exports – and a narrowing in the trade deficit.

And that deficit, they say, is not in itself a sign of economic decline. But it could be unsustainable if other nations grow less willing to finance that deficit by lending to the US.

"The real key is to take advantage of our educational system to acquire higher-value skills" and the jobs that go with them, says Paul Kasriel, an economist at the Northern Trust Co. in Chicago.

White House Cuts Attachment To Pork Spending (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

The Bush administration no longer will be bound by most congressional pork-barrel spending requests, the director of the White House's Office of Management and Budget said yesterday in a memo on how federal departments and agencies should treat money in the new spending bill the president signed into law.

Some Republicans hailed it as a giant turnaround, while Democrats said they already had taken steps to restrict pork spending this year.

More than 95 percent of pork-spending requests, known as earmarks, are never enacted as laws, but rather are written into reports that do not have the force of law. For years, most departments and agencies have honored the requests anyway, fearing that otherwise their funding would be cut the next year.

OMB Director Rob Portman's memo says the Bush administration will feel free to ignore those requests.

"In short, funding decisions should be based on the merits, in accordance with the law," Mr. Portman said.

Earlier in the day, President Bush signed a $463.5 billion spending bill to fund the government through the end of fiscal 2007, taking care of the appropriations measures left unfinished by the Republican-controlled Congress last year.

In that bill, Democrats swore off most earmarks, part of a moratorium while they consider rules to bring transparency to spending. But Mr. Bush said after signing the bill that Congress still had to do more against earmarks.

"As the Congress takes up the 2008 budget, it should continue to take steps to improve transparency for all earmarks, provide the option of an up-or-down vote for each earmark, and reduce the number and cost of earmarks by at least half," he said.

The Energy Department and other federal agencies have reported that lawmakers, both Republicans and Democrats, are still placing calls to demand privately that their pet projects be funded.

Republicans said the memo yesterday short-circuits that.

"The president handed American taxpayers a huge victory today by stopping all of the backdoor earmarks Congress requests hidden in reports and through secret e-mails and phone calls," said Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican, who for the past year has pleaded with Mr. Bush to take this step.

Earmarks have jumped from obscurity to become a hot topic on Capitol Hill, thanks to projects such as the $223 million so-called "Bridge to Nowhere," which was backed by Alaska's Republican lawmakers but was scuttled after public outcry.

Fiscal conservatives acknowledge that eliminating earmarks does not necessarily save any money, but they argue it allows the government to spend the money on the right projects.

"Federal agencies can now use these funds to advance their core missions and serve true national priorities," Mr. DeMint said.

Democrats said Mr. Portman's memo followed through on their own wishes to put a moratorium on earmarks this year, which they wrote into the spending bill.

"He's just doing what we told him," said a House Democratic aide.

If the Big Six Want to Talk About CO2 Emissions, California Will Listen

In response to your Feb. 6 editorial "Legal Hot Air":

The world's six largest automakers are crying foul about a recent case filed by California seeking redress for CO2-induced damage. They argue that courts are not the proper place for this kind of "global" issue. This sudden aversion to litigation is perplexing, given that these same companies have sued states repeatedly, in numerous jurisdictions, insisting that the courts must overturn all state laws dealing with greenhouse gas emissions. The companies hew to this path of complete resistance despite the fact that the vast majority of climate scientists believe that the world is facing a potential catastrophe.

Let me be clear: I also would prefer to reach solutions outside of the courthouse. Litigation can be expensive and time consuming. That is why I asked for a meeting with each of the CEOs of the car companies to find practical solutions to global warming. If they want to sideline the lawyers and talk about solutions, I am all for it. Meantime, they shouldn't call California's lawsuit "frivolous" while maintaining so many lawsuits of their own.

California's public nuisance case is well grounded in precedent. For more than 100 years the Supreme Court has allowed states to take legal action to prevent the destruction of their air and natural resources. In a case called Georgia v. Tennessee Copper, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes -- not a man known for indulging frivolous claims -- wrote, "It is a fair and reasonable demand on the part of a sovereign that the air over its territory should not be polluted on a great scale . . . or threatened by the act of persons beyond its control. . . ." More recently, the Supreme Court declared, "Air pollution is, of course, one of the most notorious types of public nuisance in modern experience."

The Big Six automakers generate 20% of all of the human-made carbon dioxide emissions in the U.S., and at least 30% of such emissions in California. Yet they oppose any federal action to curtail greenhouse gases. To date, their intense lobbying has been very successful: Congress has not improved fuel efficiency standards in 15 years, President Bush steadfastly refuses to consider caps on greenhouse gases, and the Environmental Protection Agency says that the Clean Air Act does not apply to CO2.

Meanwhile, California, with more than one thousand miles of coastline and a Sierra snow pack containing one third of the state's annual water supply, faces rising sea levels and rapidly melting snow. This threatens levees, flood control systems and California's irrigated agriculture. Already, spring snow melt occurs a week earlier, with greater flooding, than it did 30 years ago. The U.N. Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change just warned us again that the threats from global warming are mounting. It is time to act.

Under our tripartite system of government, courts have an essential role to play, even in issues as complex as global warming. Justice Holmes could be speaking directly to the automakers, when he wrote: "This is a suit by a state for an injury to it in its capacity of quasi-sovereign. In that capacity the state has an interest independent of . . . its citizens, in all the earth and air within its domain. It has the last word as to whether its mountains shall be stripped of their forests and its inhabitants shall breathe pure air." And, we can add, whether emissions of greenhouse gases can harm its economy and environment.

Global warming is a serious, unavoidable challenge and we need to face it. The path of litigation, first taken up by the auto companies, is not my preference. But a legal cease fire requires that both sides lay down their arms. We should use our considerable joint resources to help fashion a common sense and practical approach. I stand ready to do so.

Required Health Plans Ethically Impossible

We read of health-care plan after plan that in some manner "require" all people to purchase health insurance ("The Budget and Your Wallet -- How Plans to Expand Health Coverage Could Affect Insured," Personal Journal, Feb. 6). Exactly what are we to do with the person who doesn't purchase health insurance (thus, breaking the law), and then who shows up at the door of the ER with chest pains?

Until we are willing to let people die on the steps of the hospital, an approach that I don't support, any law "requiring" the purchase of coverage, without active enforcement and without penalties for non-compliance, will quickly be written off by the uncovered masses as a law without teeth. "Requiring" coverage is just a feel-good phrase.

Gutter Snipes or Savvy Businessmen?

Friday's piece on strippers and Super Bowl Sunday ("Wardrobe Malfunctions, Inc.," Weekend Journal, Feb. 2) was certainly funny, but the sound of my own chuckles had the fortunate effect of bringing me to my senses. I remembered how our popular culture continues to slide into the gutter without much of a splash or any apparent resistance from those who know better.

Who but a sanctimonious prude would question another man's decision to amuse his friends at half time by paying a stranger to remove her clothing right there in the den among the nachos, chicken wings and Little League trophies? To call it sleazy or dishonorable seems too harsh and uncomfortably judgmental.

And that's my point. Hiring a stripper is sleazy and dishonorable, but I get the sense that, by an unspoken rule among us men, we're all supposed to keep our mouths shut about it and just have a few laughs. The tone of this story, even its publication, suggests that the Journal has, on some level, adopted that unspoken rule. We should all know better. Why not some dissent for a change?

Sam Walker wrote a really terrific article. I administer a class at the University of Arizona designed to encourage science students to become entrepreneurs, and only days ago did we discuss supply-chain management and distribution. When I read this piece, I was delighted how he exposed the business side of this industry and articulated the need for superb supply-chain management and customer-needs analysis to sustain and grow these businesses. The article reinforced a guiding principle I emphasize in my class: The fundamentals of operation, sustainability, growth and expansion of any business are universal across industry lines. The distribution techniques that bring triumph to the "exotic dancing" industry can also bring success in biotechnology and optics. The article serves as a great case study. You can learn a lot from any victorious business, and I hope my students got this message from the piece as much as I did.

What Mean Means

Dr. Robert Myers, in his Feb. 1 Letter to the Editor responding to Charles Murray's three-part editorial-page series "On Education," compounds Mr. Murray's original error regarding definitions of mathematical mean vs. mathematical median. Mr. Murray stated that half of all children in the U.S. are below average intelligence; Dr. Myers stated that Mr. Murray should have written below the mean, not the average.

The mean and the average are the same thing. What both authors should have said is median. The median, by definition, is the value below which exactly half of the sample points fall. Though for many common statistical distributions the mean, a.k.a. average, and the median are close, sometimes equal, they are not necessarily so.

Senator Seeks to Focus The War on al Qaeda

Kimberley A. Strassel's Feb. 2 Potomac Watch column "Senator Feingold's Sin" was right to single out the senator's "honesty" and "backbone" for his effort to require that U.S. troops be redeployed from Iraq. But to say that "the Wisconsin pacifist might not understand the importance of winning in Iraq" misunderstands Sen. Feingold and his effort, which is based on strengthening U.S. national security above all else.

The senator called for redeploying our troops from Iraq because our massive, indefinite presence there is weakening our ability to fight the terrorist networks that threaten this country around the world. He voted to go to war in Afghanistan precisely because he wanted U.S. forces to eliminate the Taliban and destroy a safe haven for terrorist networks that threaten our country.

As your editorial noted, Congress has the power to end a war. Sen. Feingold wants Congress to use that power to end U.S. involvement in this disastrous war in Iraq, so that we can fight al Qaeda and other global threats more aggressively and effectively. That doesn't sound like a pacifist, does it?

Hail To The Presidents' Pastry Chef (USAT)

By Jayne Clark

USA Today, February 16, 2007

BETHESDA, Md. — Roland Mesnier, the French pastry chef who for a quarter of a century whipped up confections fit for presidents, is, at the moment, fixated on kings. Of the dessert variety, that is.

"Look at this galette. The glace!" he exclaims, jabbing a finger at the display case in a suburban Washington bakery. "This is French king cake. Not the New Orleans kind, which is awful — dry bread with colored sugar. And those beads! I had a friend who sent some to the White House. The staff wouldn't even eat it."

Not that they needed to, what with Mesnier churning out desserts to die for from the Carter administration right into George W. Bush's second term.

DOJ_NMG_0133066

"I'm one of the few chefs who has left the White House with a good taste in my mouth," he says, making his way past racks of cookies and tarts to a corner table.

Indeed, of the six executive chefs who served during Mesnier's tenure, three were let go, he says. He retired in 2004 but has returned for brief stints since.

His new book, All the Presidents' Pastries: Twenty-Five Years in the White House (Flammarion, $24.95), out in time for Presidents Day, is peppered with reminiscences and insights from those years, plus recipes for presidential favorites such as pecan bourbon pie (Jimmy Carter) and quick chocolate mousse (Ronald Reagan).

Charming and expansive both in personality and girth, Mesnier clearly doesn't deprive himself of his own creations. And as a chef he has some strong opinions on the state of food in America.

"I eat on the road constantly, and I know what's out there. And it's not pretty," he says.

But first, some White House dish.

·Most exacting first lady: Nancy Reagan. "She ran the house with an iron fist. Nothing was done in the White House foodwise — tablecloths, flowers, entertainment — without her knowledge. But I love that. It's because of Mrs. Reagan that I succeeded the way I did."

·Most unappetizing dessert he ever had to prepare: a Clinton family favorite featuring Coca-Cola jelly. "I don't discuss it. I didn't even taste it."

·Most demanding White House guests: former French president François Mitterrand and his wife, Danielle. "They thought they were royalty. That's why they went so well with the Reagans."

·Most taxing first family to work for: the Clintons. "They'd throw parties for 1,200, 1,500, 2,000 in tents, which we were instructed to call 'pavilions.' Physically, it killed me."

·Impressions of the first ladies: Rosalynn Carter — "Extremely gracious. The staff truly loved her." Nancy Reagan — "A perfectionist (who) wasn't big on compliments." Barbara Bush — "The ultimate first lady. She could do so many things." Hillary Clinton — "Extremely nice. Very generous with her time." Laura Bush — "Very knowledgeable about food — one of the few first ladies who could discuss taste and texture."

Despite his French origins and European training, Mesnier believes American food is among the world's best. Sadly, however, so many top chefs these days are seeking celebrity, and they're not in their kitchens where they belong, he says.

Blame it on the Food Network.

"It's destroying cooking," Mesnier says. TV personality "Rachael Ray tells you she can create a good meal in 20 minutes. You know why? Because she has a can opener! Steal her can opener, it's over. It's impossible to make a good meal in 20 minutes."

Or, obviously, a head-turning dessert for a formal White House dinner. For state dinners, Mesnier created one-of-a-kind confections using ingredients reflective of products from the honored head of state's country.

There was the chocolate box replete with liquor-filled citrus sorbets for a dinner honoring the king of Spain; the creation for the Japanese prime minister he dubbed the Bonsai Garden of Sweet Serenity; and his final triumph, an oyster shell of white chocolate filled with a dark nougat glace "pearl" against a backdrop of chocolate seaweed for an Australia state dinner last June.

Having hung up his chef's hat, Mesnier no longer traffics in these grand indulgences. (Truth be told, he's more of an apple pie man.)

But he's still dreaming them up:

"I build desserts in my sleep."

On Presidential Coinage (NYT)

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

Perhaps the most striking thing about the new presidential coin released yesterday is that Congress has asked the United States Mint to issue one for every president from George Washington to Gerald Ford. With four new coins coming out each year, it will be hard to complain about the 2007 series, which offers a bumper crop of Founding Fathers. Washington, who appeared yesterday, will be followed by John Adams, Thomas Jefferson and James Madison.

The down side of this inclusive approach, though, is that not every year will be so glorious.

The year 2010, for example, stands out as looking particularly dispiriting. The first coin will bear the likeness of Millard Fillmore, who may be best remembered today for signing the Fugitive Slave Act into law. The next will belong to Franklin Pierce, a hard-drinking military man who was derided as the “victor of many a hard-fought bottle.”

Collectors who hold out until 2014 will be rewarded with a dollar bearing the visage of Warren G. Harding. A shiny dollar may be a fit commemorative for a president whose administration is best remembered for the Teapot Dome scandal, when lots of oil money sloshed corruptly around Washington. And later that same year, there will be a coin for Herbert Hoover, who presided so unsatisfactorily over Depression-era America. For Hoover, the dollar may appear to be poignant commentary.

From there it is a short two years until Americans get their hands on the first Richard M. Nixon dollar.

The decision to make a line of presidential coins was a natural one, and once made, it would be hard to pick and choose. If you started by removing Millard Fillmore, where would you stop? But there is a real educational value in including every president. At a time when the current occupant of the White House thinks presidential powers should be expanded to new extremes, the series will be a four-times-a-year reminder that not everyone who makes it to the White House belongs on Mount Rushmore.

Mea Culpa To Bush On Presidents Day (USAT)

USA Today, February 16, 2007

Our great country has had 43 presidents. Many very good. A few pretty bad. On Presidents Day next Monday, it's appropriate to commemorate them all.

I remember every president since Herbert Hoover, when I was a grade school kid. He was one of the worst. I've personally met every president since Dwight Eisenhower. He was one of the best.

A year ago I criticized Hillary Clinton for saying "this (Bush) administration will go down in history as one of the worst."

"She's wrong," I wrote. Then I rated these five presidents, in this order, as the worst: Andrew Jackson, James Buchanan, Ulysses Grant, Hoover and Richard Nixon. "It's very unlikely Bush can crack that list," I added.

I was wrong. This is my mea culpa. Not only has Bush cracked that list, but he is planted firmly at the top.

The Iraq war, of course, has become Bush's albatross. He and his buddies are great at coining words or slogans. "Bushisms" that will haunt him historically:

·"Shock and Awe," early 2003.

·"Mission Accomplished," May 1, 2003.

·"Stay the Course," June 2003, 2004, 2005, 2006.

·"New Strategy," 2007.

Another term historians may weigh critically is "Decider."

Is he just a self-touted decider doing what he thinks right? Or is he an arrogant ruler who doesn't care or consider what the public or Congress believes best for the country?

Despite his play on words and slogans, Bush didn't learn the value or meaning of mea culpa (acknowledgement of an error) during his years at Yale.

Bush admitting his many mistakes on Iraq and ending that fiasco might make many of us forgive, even though we can never forget the terrible toll in lives and dollars.

A Dog's Breakfast (WSJ)

By Daniel L. Mcfadden

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

Last year, Medicare underwent a major expansion with the addition of Part D prescription drug coverage. A controversial feature of this new program was its organization as a market in which consumers could choose among various plans offered competitively by different insurers and HMOs, rather than the single-payer, single-product model used elsewhere in the Medicare system. Proponents of this design touted the choices it would offer consumers, and the benefits of competition for product quality and cost; opponents objected that consumers would be overwhelmed by the complexity of the market, and that it was unnecessarily generous to pharmaceutical and insurance companies.

Part D is a massive social experiment on the ability of a privatized market to deliver social services effectively. With the support of the National Institute on Aging, my research group has monitored consumer choices and outcomes from the new Part D market. I will summarize our findings, but first I want to provide some perspective on the American health-care system and the questions that study of Part D may help answer.

Most Americans are aware that our health-care system is in deep trouble, a dog's breakfast of private providers and insurers that has weak and inconsistent incentives for quality control and cost containment. Many consumers cannot obtain health insurance at reasonable cost, and financing the system is stressing employers, pension funds, and the government's Medicare and Medicaid programs.

In terms of health delivered per dollar of cost, our system is grotesquely inefficient. We spend $6,102 per person on health care each year, nearly 17% of GDP. Our neighbor Canada's single-payer system costs $3,165 per person per year, about half our expenditure, or 10% of their GDP. The Canadian costs and health outcomes are typical of developed countries, where government managed and financed systems predominate. The extra cost of our system is not buying us better health. The probability of dying between ages 15 and 60, a good indicator of failure of a health-care system to prevent and treat disease, is 8.1% for females in the U.S.; in Canada, the same probability is 5.7%.

In the future, things are going to get much worse. If current trends continue, health care in the U.S. as a proportion of GDP will rise to 40% by 2050, a level that will break the current system of financing health through employers, pension funds and Medicare/Medicaid.

There are a number of reasons for this gathering storm. First, the U.S. population is getting older, and the old require more medical maintenance. Second, we are getting wealthier, and staying alive is the ultimate luxury good. Third, we demand expensive medical innovations, such as dialysis, MRIs, transplants, stents and biotech. About a third of all medical costs are incurred in the last year of life, and are at best marginally effective. The incentives in the system do not force hard choices.

To deal with this future, three substantial reforms are needed. First, we need to wring out some of the inefficiencies. Something like 30% of our health costs come from administrative overhead, legal costs and defensive medicine. These could be largely eliminated in a comprehensive reform; we just need to emulate best practice in other developed countries.

Second, we need universal health insurance coverage, with active emphasis on preventive medicine that is effective in reducing later medical events and costs. Perhaps this can be accomplished by cobbling together existing sources of finance, as in Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's current proposal for California. However, eventually we will have to go to a system that is not channeled through employers, something like a tax-financed medical voucher system.

Third, we need incentives that match choice of expensive treatments with consumers' willingness to pay for them, a benefit-cost analysis that places treatment choices and financial responsibility on the individual.

This brings us to Medicare Part D. This experiment in privatizing the prescription drug insurance market and the interface between insurers and consumers gives the individual the right, and responsibility, to make insurance plan choices that are in his or her self-interest. If consumers are up to this task, then their choices will ensure that the plans, and insurers, that succeed in the market are ones that meet their needs. However, if many are confused or confounded, the market will not get the signals it needs to work satisfactorily. The success or failure of the Part D market is a bellwether for proposals to spread consumer-directed health care across the system, putting health and financial choices in the hands of consumers, and utilizing the forces of market competition to rationalize the system.

So, how well has the Part D market worked? We now have one year of experience, including a second open enrollment period in which consumers could switch plans, or enroll if they had not done so earlier. We can ask whether consumers were satisfied with this market, whether their choices were consistent with their interests, and whether Part D insurance has had a positive effect on health outcomes. To do this, my group is tracking about 2,200 consumers age 65 and up from opening of the initial enrollment period in mid-November 2005. We interviewed them just before enrollment began, and again just after the initial enrollment period ended on May 15, 2006. Here are some of the things we have found:

Consumers were quite confused about the Part D program before enrollment began, with 40% knowing little or nothing about what the program offered, and 17% indicating that they were unlikely to enroll. Start-up problems, widely publicized, further clouded the program's future. However, when the initial enrollment period closed, only 7.4% of the age 65-plus eligible population of 35.8 million were not enrolled in Part D or comparable prescription drug coverage. It helped that monthly premiums, predicted to be about $37, were substantially lower, averaging around $24, with some plans available for premiums as low as $6 to $10. It helped that about 68% of the population was automatically enrolled, either through employer or union based plans or through Medicaid, VA or federal employee coverage. It also helped that Part D incorporates an annual subsidy of about $1,200 per enrollee, so that most potential enrollees benefit immediately.

Failure to enroll turned out to be a minor problem, but making Part D voluntary rather than mandatory did have some consequences. About 1.2 million seniors who use enough prescription drugs so that they would immediately benefit from enrolling failed to do so. Mostly, these were not the very poor, who were picked up by Medicaid and by outreach programs, but poorly educated people above the poverty line.

General opinions elicited after the close of the initial enrollment period give Part D a mixed report card. Seventy-seven percent liked having a choice of plans, but 58% thought the program was not well designed; 77% say they would have preferred to have prescription drugs provided automatically as part of Medicare Part A; 58% are less satisfied with Medicare as a result of Part D; and large majorities dislike formulary restrictions and the gap, a range of out-of-pocket costs where the Part D standard plan offers no benefits.

However, when one looks at plan choices made, one finds that consumers were relatively consistent in recognizing their self-interest. Most consumers selected among the lowest-cost plans available in their area. Consumers with significant drug needs enrolled early, while those with no immediate needs mostly enrolled later to preserve their option value of obtaining insurance at non-penalized rates. There is some evidence that consumers did not fully appreciate the consequences of the gap, and enhanced policies that covered the gap were not heavily demanded, even though the additional coverage they offered was close to actuarially fair.

The picture that emerges is that elderly consumers were mostly able to navigate the Part D market and reach reasonable choices, despite its novelty and complexity. Two concerns with insurance markets that also arise for the Part D market are adverse selection, in which only the sickest seek insurance, and insurers respond by cherry-picking, refusing coverage for individuals and conditions likely to increase claims; and moral hazard, in which insurance coverage encourages additional treatments by reducing the incremental costs of these treatments.

Adverse selection has so far been avoided in the Part D market because the voluntary enrollment rate is high, including a high proportion of healthy seniors who currently are net contributors to the system. Further, adverse selection is not a problem for plan switchers because participating insurers must take all comers, and are reimbursed by Medicare based on each individual's experience rating. There is moral hazard in the sense that prescription drug use is increasing for seniors newly insured under part D, to 4.4 from 3.3 prescriptions on average per month, according to our survey.

This increase must be assessed in terms of its health consequences. Dana Goldman at RAND Corporation has found that making at least some drugs available to seniors at lower cost more than pays for itself in decreased incidence and cost of health problems. For example, reducing the copay on statins to $10 from $45 for a 30-day supply increased plan prescription drug payments, but the increased adherence of patients to the therapy at the lower copayment reduced cardiovascular incidents and attendant hospitalization costs, so that total annual health costs per patient in his study fell to $5,180 from $5,470.

A recent study of the VA population indicates that statins increase adult life expectancy by nearly two years, apparently because they act as anti-inflamatories as well as reducing cholesterol. Anecdotal evidence indicates that Part D coverage will reduce medical problems and hospitalization costs enough to offset a significant portion of its cost. However, reduced adherence to therapies by consumers who hit the gap will probably have a significant adverse effect on health outcomes that we will begin to see in 2007. A humorous proposal is that employers could lower their total health-care bills by putting statins and anti-hypertensives in the water cooler. What is clear is that an integrated approach is needed to evaluating health-care costs, and programs like Part D that can deliver effective preventative drugs may pay for themselves.

My overall conclusion is that, so far, the Part D program has succeeded in getting affordable prescription drugs to the senior population. Its privatized structure has not been a significant impediment to delivery of these services. Competition among insurers seems to have been effective in keeping a lid on costs, and assuring reasonable quality control. We do not have an experiment in which we can determine whether a single-product system could have done as well, or better, along these dimensions, but I think it is reasonable to say that the Part D market has performed as well as its partisans hoped, and far better than its detractors expected.

Does this mean that Part D proves that privatization will be effective in other segments of the health-care market? Here, I think caution is advised. First, the success of Part D depends substantially on thoughtful and muscular management of the market. The former head of Medicare, Mark McClellan, and a dynamic, no-nonsense 75-year-old government bureaucrat, Abby Block, bullied insurers to make sure there were, in her words, "no bad choices." It is unclear whether their successors will be as successful in standing toe-to-toe with the industry and making sure consumers' interests are protected.

A health insurance market like Part D probably requires this level of active management to work well; after-the-fact oversight in the style of the SEC or FTC is inadequate. If privatization is going to work elsewhere in health care, active market management will be needed.

Finally, consumer-directed health care works only if consumers can understand the consequences of their choices. In much of medicine, providers are the agents that guide consumers through these choices. If consumer-directed health care is to be effective, these providers must give sound advice on both the health and financial consequences of alternative choices. This is possible if the incentives to providers and consumers are right, but the design of such markets should not be left to chance.

Economy May Be Doing Better, Fed Chief Says (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Thursday the economy may be performing better than is currently estimated and said an increase in inflationary pressures would warrant higher interest rates.

DOJ_NMG_0133070

"We've seen some strong income growth, which suggests that the economy may be stronger than we think," Bernanke told the House Financial Services Committee on the second day of his twice-yearly testimony on the economy.

"On inflation, we have had a period where inflation has been above where we'd like to see it," he said, responding to committee Chairman Barney Frank, D-Mass., who questioned why the Fed has continued to say it is more concerned about inflation than slower growth. Frank noted the Fed has said inflation and the economy are moderating, trends that suggest a rate cut was more likely than a rate increase.

But Bernanke said the Fed wasn't ready to declare victory against inflation.

"In order for this expansion to continue in a sustainable way, inflation needs to be well controlled," Bernanke said. "If inflation becomes higher for some reason, then the Federal Reserve would have to respond to that by raising interest rates."

Regarding proposals to raise the federal minimum wage, Bernanke said the move would likely mean some people would lose their jobs, but the numbers would likely not be "very significant" in terms of the effect on the broad economy.

The Fed has kept interest rates unchanged for five consecutive meetings after raising them 17 times from June 2004 to June 2006. The current target for short-term interest rates, which influences borrowing costs economywide, is 5.25%, the highest in six years.

Many economists expect the Fed will hold interest rates steady for most of 2007. According to a USA TODAY poll of 56 economists conducted Jan. 18-24, the Fed will likely change rates only once this year, with a cut coming in the fourth quarter.

Some economic news out Thursday pointed to some softening in the economy, supporting a steady interest rate environment. The Fed said industrial production fell 0.5% in January, led by a sharp drop in activity at automobile plants. The decline followed a 0.5% increase in December and was the biggest drop since September 2005, when production was stymied by cleanup efforts following Hurricane Katrina.

Bernanke Rebuffs Frank On Rate Cut (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke yesterday rejected a Democratic lawmaker's suggestion that he consider cutting interest rates to bolster the economy.

Bernanke, testifying for a second day on Capitol Hill, this time before the House Financial Services Committee, repeated that the Fed is likely to hold rates steady for a while if slower economic growth nudges inflation lower this year and next as expected.

But the Fed also thinks inflation is too high and might go higher, Bernanke said. If he and his colleagues adjust borrowing costs in coming months, they are more likely to raise rates than lower them.

"In order for this expansion to continue in a sustainable way, inflation needs to be well controlled," Bernanke said in response to remarks by committee Chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.). "If inflation becomes higher for some reason, then the Federal Reserve would have to respond to that by raising interest rates."

Frank had told Bernanke the Fed's stance was "troubling" to him because the central bank also forecasts the economy will grow at a moderate rate this year, below its long-term average, and that inflation will drift lower over time.

"I don't see how we get a concern of inflation," Frank told Bernanke. "Why is there not at least an equal chance for there to be a reduction" in interest rates?

Bernanke responded that he and his Fed colleagues see several risks that the economy may not behave as forecast, and they would adjust interest rates as needed.

One possibility is that the economy weakens more than expected, perhaps if the housing slump deepens. Many private analysts have recently lowered their estimates of the economy's pace of growth because of a series of weak figures, including the Fed's report yesterday that U.S. industrial production fell in January.

But the Fed sees a greater risk of high inflation. Bernanke noted recent strong growth in consumer spending and incomes, "which suggests that the economy may be stronger than we think. It's possible."

If so, consumer demand might rise faster than the economy's ability to produce goods and services, he said. Already, the labor market is tight, with unemployment at a low 4.6 percent, and businesses' use of their production capacity is slightly above average, according to the Fed report.

The inflation risk lies in this danger of excessive demand, not in low unemployment alone, the Fed chairman said.

There is no specific level of unemployment that automatically triggers inflation, Bernanke, a former chairman of the Princeton University economics department, said in response to several lawmakers' questions.

That contrasts with the traditional view of many economists that unemployment below about 5 percent is inflationary. Bernanke's remarks partly reflect years of research that has debunked the idea of a long-term trade-off between unemployment and inflation. They also reflect the nation's experience in the late 1990s, when unemployment fell as low as 3.9 percent without causing much inflation.

The Fed's top policymakers forecast inflation to fall over the next 18 months while unemployment remains below 5 percent, indicating they are comfortable with joblessness so low.

Bernanke also said rising wages are not necessarily inflationary, as was widely believed in the 1970s when high inflation was blamed partly on unions' salary demands.

If businesses accept smaller profits -- they have been high lately -- companies can raise workers' wages without boosting prices, he said. Also, if labor productivity, or output per hour, rises quickly, businesses can produce more with the same labor force; again, workers' earnings can climb without pushing prices higher.

The low unemployment of the 1990s coincided with a takeoff in productivity growth. Bernanke's predecessor, Alan Greenspan, recognized this at the time and did not increase interest rates, despite the urgings of the Fed staff and some Fed Board members. The high inflation of the 1970s coincided with lousy productivity growth.

Productivity growth has slowed recently, but it remained solid at 2.1 percent last year. And Bernanke said "underlying productivity trends appear favorable."

Even so, he said, it is possible that strong economic growth "could allow firms to pass higher labor costs through to prices, adding to inflation," and that would erode the purchasing power of any wage gains.

Fed Suggests It Is Loosening Employment-Inflation Link (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

Federal Reserve officials appear to believe unemployment can go lower than they previously thought without generating inflation, a potentially important shift that some economists think could make interest-rate increases this year less likely.

The monetary-policy report that Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke delivered to Congress this week indicated that members of the policy-setting Federal Open Market Committee now expect a lower unemployment rate this year than they did just seven months ago, but they don't expect that to result in higher inflation.

Reduced inflation concerns at the Fed and weaker economic data, such as a drop in January industrial production reported yesterday, have led financial markets to boost expectations the Fed will lower its short-term interest-rate target, now 5.25%, later this year.

FOMC members generally expect the unemployment rate to end both this year and next between 4.5% and 4.75%, essentially unchanged from January's 4.6%. By contrast, July's monetary-policy report saw the unemployment rate ending 2007 between 4.75% and 5%. That report didn't have a 2008 forecast.

Despite forecasting lower unemployment, FOMC members didn't change their inflation expectations. They see core inflation, which excludes food and energy, as measured by the Commerce Department's price index of personal consumption, ending this year between 2% and 2.25% -- the same forecast as July -- and next year falling further, to between 1.75% and 2%. That shift probably reflects the fact that actual unemployment has fallen further than expected last July while inflation has also been a bit lower than expected, though not as low as officials would like.

Unemployment generally can't fall to zero even in a robust economy, as different industries are always contracting and expanding, or because personal characteristics such as disability make it hard for some people to find work. Fed officials, like most economists, believe economic growth that pushes joblessness too low can result in companies raising wages to attract scarce workers beyond the productivity of those workers, then passing on the higher wage costs in higher prices.

Mr. Bernanke told Congress that putting a number on this "nonaccelerating inflation rate of unemployment" -- or Nairu -- is difficult: "There's no specific level of employment or unemployment that is a trigger for inflation."

Moreover, FOMC forecasts must be interpreted with caution because they are a range of committee members' views rather than a single, coherent view.

Still, there are two possible explanations for the new numbers. One is that Fed officials have lowered their estimate of Nairu, perhaps to 4.5% from 5%, said Jan Hatzius, chief U.S. economist at Goldman Sachs. If so, the Fed would have "a lower hurdle to easing, and a higher hurdle to tightening" monetary policy.

The other explanation is their estimate of Nairu is unchanged, but the Fed believes lower energy prices and slower rent increases are affecting core inflation more than low unemployment. If that is the case, the Fed might worry that persistent low unemployment could yet push up inflation once those restraining factors subside.

Peter Hooper, chief economist at Deutsche Bank Securities, noted that Mr. Bernanke's testimony to Congress this week belied more concern about the unemployment rate than the FOMC forecast. His warning that high "resource utilization" could nudge up inflation suggests he would like to see unemployment edge higher, Mr. Hooper said.

Mr. Hatzius speculated that the forecasts, if not signaling a lower Nairu, might instead signal "a repudiation of the Nairu story that you need to generate more unemployment to contain inflation."

Indeed, while Fed economists still believe in the Nairu, they have recently come to believe its influence on inflation has declined, while the influence of the public's expectations of inflation -- governed heavily by where inflation has been -- has grown. But while it may take longer for low unemployment to push up inflation, once it did, it would be far harder to get inflation down again. That could keep the Fed biased to raising rates as long as unemployment is low.

New data suggest that some of the pressure on capacity is starting to ease. The Fed reported yesterday that output by factories, mines and utilities fell 0.5% in January from December, due mostly to a drop in factory production. With demand from consumers holding up, the output drop appears largely due to efforts by housing, motor vehicle and other industries to reduce inventories. Because of lower production, industry operated at 81.2% of available capacity in January, down from 81.8% in December.

Separately, the Labor Department said the number of people filing initial jobless claims rose by 44,000 last week to 357,000. That could be a sign that unemployment may be headed higher, though cold weather likely played a role in the jump.

Bernanke's Style Builds Political Capital (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Washington

Financial Times, February 16, 2007

Ben Bernanke's political stock is rising – a development that could help him push through the changes he wants to make at the Federal Reserve, including the adoption of a flexible inflation target.

At Thursday's hearing of the House financial services committee, Barney Frank, the Democratic chairman who raised eyebrows this year by pledging more robust oversight of the Fed, declared himself pleased with Mr Bernanke.

"You have, I think, over the past months in particular, said some very reason-able things from my standpoint." Apologising in jest to reporters present, Mr Frank added: "I have less to complain about than they might have hoped."

A day earlier in the Senate, Mr Bernanke was lavished with praise from all sides of the political spectrum for engineering a soft landing for the US economy.

Chris Dodd, the Democratic chairman of the Senate banking committee, said: "Following in the footsteps of a very successful chairman can be difficult. But I believe you have done a very good job."

Richard Shelby, the senior Republican on the Senate committee, said: "The Federal Reserve's conduct of monetary policy thus far has given me further reason to applaud your service."

Mr Bernanke even drew favourable comment from unorthodox quarters, including Jim Bunning, the maverick Republican senator.

Several common themes have emerged from the hearings. First, Mr Bernanke's decision to halt rate rises in the summer of 2006 has earned him political capital as a Fed chairman who considers seriously the dual mandate to put equal weight on employment and inflation, and not inflict harm lightly on the real economy.

Mr Bunning, who opposed Mr Bernanke's confirmation, said: "The Federal Open Market Committee did the right thing by stopping the increases in the Fed funds rates after the June 2006 Fed meeting. By holding rates constant, you have done the right thing ever since."

Second, his modest, plain-speaking manner, which stands in sharp contrast to that of Alan Greenspan, the previous chairman, is going down well with Congress.

Melvin Watt, a Democratic congressman, said: "I happened to like your predecessor. Problem was I didn't understand a damned thing he ever said – so you are a breath of fresh air."

Third, Mr Bernanke is showing a surprising degree of political savvy, positioning himself shrewdly in the debates of the moment, which hinge on inequality and middle-class economic anxiety, and moving to meet a desire for greater public accountability at the Fed.

All this could help Mr Bernanke change the way the Fed operates, above all the adoption of a flexible inflation target with a specified inflation goal but one that would not be achieved over a fixed timeframe. Conventional wisdom has it that the Democratic victory last November and the broader mood of economic populism in the air make this an uphill struggle.

Most Fed-watchers believe Mr Bernanke will not ultimately risk being seen to elevate price stability above employment in violation of the dual mandate. In the worst-case scenario, that could trigger a backlash in Congress against the Fed and the forced imposition of a matching employment target.

However, Mr Bernanke's reputation as a chairman who pays careful attention to the real economy lends credibility to his contention that a flexible inflation target would be consistent with the dual mandate.

Moreover, he is moving to position an inflation target as a means of enabling the public and elected officials to monitor Fed performance more effectively.

Mr Frank signalled that he remained cautious on an inflation target, saying: “I admire the desire for transparency” but expressing concern it could tilt the balance of the dual mandate.

With many old Fed hands, including Don Kohn, the vice-chairman, still very cautious about an inflation target too, adopting one still looks challenging. But not as far beyond the Fed chairman’s reach as it appeared only a few months ago.

Realtors Expect Home Price Recovery After A Nasty Q4 (USAT)

By Christine Dugas

USA Today, February 16, 2007

Home prices are likely to spring back in the coming months, the National Association of Realtors predicted Thursday after reporting that median prices fell in 73 metro areas in the final three months of 2006.

Last year "was the year of contraction," said David Lereah, the NAR's chief economist. "When we get the figures for this spring, I expect to see a discernible improvement in both sales and prices."

Even in an overall sluggish fourth quarter, 71 areas had price gains, the NAR said. And 14 of those areas saw double-digit year-over-year percentage gains.

"At least the bottom appears to have already occurred," says Lawrence Yun, an NAR economist. "It looks like the figures will be improving. Whether or not that will be sustainable is a different question."

Nationwide, the median sales price for an existing single-family home fell to $219,300 in the fourth quarter, down 2.7% from the same period in 2005.

Several once-sizzling markets in Florida continued to see price declines. The Sarasota-Bradenton-Venice area was worst hit; prices fell 18% in the fourth quarter.

Still, the NAR pointed out that despite the recent downturn in prices, gains for typical single-family homes the past five years have been robust in many metro areas — and explosive in others. In Riverside-San Bernardino-Ontario, Calif., for example, prices have soared 155.3% in the past five years.

Other parts of California have yet to benefit. In the inland areas, many builders who are struggling to move new-home inventory have caused prices to fall sharply, says Leslie Appleton-Young, chief economist of the California Association of Realtors.

Such price drops, though, are starting to lure buyers, a trend that could help lift the overall housing market. "Buyers are responding to seller pricing and incentives, and there's pent-up demand as a result of buyer hesitation in the second half of 2006," says Pat Vredevoogd Combs, the NAR's president.

Among the areas that reported the biggest gains at the end of last year was Atlantic City, which saw a 25.9% jump in home prices in the fourth quarter, compared with the same period in 2005. And Trenton-Ewing, N.J., enjoyed an 18.9% rise in prices. It could post even better results this year.

"Interest rates remain extremely reasonable, and the buyers are out there and they're buying; they're not just shopping," says Rosalie Daniels, broker-owner of RE/Max TriCounty in Hamilton Township, on the outskirts of Trenton. Written contracts for home sales in January 2007, Daniels says, are 35% ahead of the pace of January 2006.

Low mortgage rates should also help boost sales. The average 30-year fixed rate for 2006 was 6.40%; it's now 6.30%, Freddie Mac said Thursday.

Blue Chips Hit Fresh Record; Pace Of Rally Begins To Slow (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

The pace of the stock rally slowed, but solid rises in shares of Caterpillar and Boeing were enough to spur the Dow Jones Industrial Average to a third straight gain and another record finish.

The blue-chip Dow industrials rose 23.15 points, or 0.18%, to 12765.01, its 29th closing high since early October. So far this year, the industrial average has gained 2.4%.

Boeing shares jumped 2%, helped by the aircraft maker's announcement of an order from United Parcel Service for 27 cargo planes. Caterpillar shares rose 2.2% after the equipment maker said it plans to repurchase $7.5 billion of its stock within the next five years. Both companies are Dow components.

Share buybacks, which increase the relative value of shares remaining in the market, have become more common in recent years amid a surge in profits that has left many companies flush with cash. Those war chests also are funding increased corporate deal making.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index inched up 0.1%, or 1.51 points, to 1456.81, up 2.7% on the year and some 70 points from its record set in March 2000. The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 0.35%, or 8.72 points, to end at 2497.10, up 3.4% on the year. The Nasdaq would have to more than double to reach its record, also set in March 2000.

Federal Reserve Chairman Benjamin Bernanke spoke to the House Financial Services Committee, on the heels of Senate testimony Wednesday that fueled that day's stock gains. His remarks offered few new specifics about Fed policy. Investor confidence that inflation is under control -- a key point in Mr. Bernanke's testimony Wednesday -- seemed to solidify.

The yield on 10-year Treasury notes fell to 4.706%, slightly below where it began the year. The price of Treasurys tends to rise, pushing yields down, when investors aren't jittery about inflation and the possibility of interest-rate increases.

Economist James Glassman of J.P. Morgan Chase said economic data have been pointing toward a reduced need for the Fed to raise its interest-rate targets to fight inflation for some time.

He said Mr. Bernanke is better able to convey that message in his detailed, semiannual congressional testimony than in the comparatively terse policy statements investors pore over after the Fed's regular policy meetings.

"What Bernanke said this week is an extension of the Fed's story that we heard over the summer," when the central bank decided to halt a long series of rate increases and hold steady, Mr. Glassman said. "People had just lost sight of it, to a certain extent."

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks gained1 and bond prices rose2. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.45 billion shares. The 10-year note gained 6/32 point, or $1.875 for each $1,000 invested.

The dollar weakened3. The dollar fell to 119.22 yen from 120.74 yen. The euro rose to $1.3145, compared with $1.3006.

Va. Bar Could Reverse Limits On Firms Hiring Legislators (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

RICHMOND -- The organization charged with regulating Virginia attorneys is pushing to erase an ethics rule that for a half-century has prohibited the state's legislators from being employed alongside lobbyists at the commonwealth's largest law firms.

The change, proposed by the Virginia State Bar's standing committee on legal ethics, could spark a bidding war among Richmond's leading law firms, which would be free to hire the speaker of the House of Delegates or the Senate floor leader even as their lobbyists prowl the halls of the General Assembly.

That has outraged some in the legislature, who say the move would create dangerous conflicts of interest for the lawmakers and the lobbyists. And they say it adds to a perception that the General Assembly is a good old boys' club where deals are cut behind closed doors instead of in public committee rooms.

"Crossing that line threatens the integrity of the General Assembly," said Clarke N. Hogan (R-Charlotte). "There are all kinds of unpleasant, undesirable effects. This will undermine public trust. I don't think you can do that."

Virginia's existing rule is stronger than in many states, where sitting lawmakers and lobbyists are often allowed to work in the same law firm, according to state bar officials. Arizona, Illinois, Washington and New Hampshire permit the practice, officials said. At least nine other bar associations prohibit firms from having both lobbyists and sitting lawmakers. Maryland does not have any such prohibition, but the state imposes certain restrictions on lawmakers who work for firms with lobbying arms.

Pressure to eliminate the rule in Virginia was sparked in part by Sen. R. Creigh Deeds (D-Bath), who recently joined the law firm of Hirschler Fleischer P.C., a Richmond-based firm with a small lobbying presence. Without the proposed change, Deeds would be violating state ethics rules.

Deeds, who describes himself as a small-town rural lawyer, said his losing bid for attorney general in 2005 made it nearly impossible to keep his small practice alive. His plans to run for governor in 2009 will require a more stable income, he said. But he said there will be a firewall between himself and the firm's lobbyists.

"For me to be able to continue the political journey, I had to find some stability. I had to do something," Deeds said in an interview this week. "If I thought I were doing anything unethical, I would step away from it."

Deeds and other advocates of the rule change, including the chief ethics counsel for the bar, say the long-standing rule needlessly restricts the activities of law firms and lawmakers. They say lobbyists and sitting legislators can coexist at firms as long as they adhere to existing state laws governing conflict of interest.

Those laws require lawmakers to recuse themselves from votes or discussions involving lobbyists with whom they have a professional relationship.

"Lawyers have a contribution to make and ought not to be disenfranchised from public service by a bright line rule that assumes [a conflict], without any evidence, because of my partner in an 800-lawyer law firm," said James M. McCauley, the bar's ethics counsel.

DOJ_NMG_0133075

Legal Ethics Opinion 1829, which McCauley's committee made public Jan. 23, states that any legislator should simply "be careful to avoid using his public position for improper special advantage for clients, and the other members of the firm must be careful to avoid suggesting that they have special influence for clients through the legislative service of their firm member."

McCauley said the bar is seeking public comment on the rule change and could back off if the response is uniformly negative. But his organization has already begun advising law firms that they can hire sitting lawmakers even if they have lobbyists who engage in activity in Richmond's capital.

In a Feb. 6 letter, assistant ethics counsel Leslie A.T. Haley wrote to a senior partner at Deeds' firm, advising him to refer to the proposed rule.

"The analysis in LEO 1829 . . . seem to provide the guidance you need," Haley wrote to James L. Weinberg. "Please review the referenced opinions for guidance on this issue."

Deeds said he joined the firm in October with the understanding that a request would be made to the state bar about the rule. But he said he expects no difference in his approach toward conflicts or other ethical issues that might arise.

"You have to avoid the appearance of impropriety anyway," Deeds said. "The burden is always on the individual. Either he is ethical or he is not."

But that's exactly what worries ethics experts and some Virginia lawmakers.

Leah Rush, a state legal specialist with the Center for Public Integrity, said the Virginia Bar's existing rule about lawmakers and lobbyists is an admirable one that goes beyond what other states have done.

"It makes sense and it's very admirable that the state bar would try to promote a clear separation of duties to clearly avoid conflicts of interest," she said. "Rolling back any provisions that have been in place kind of raises the red flag."

Sen. Thomas K. Norment Jr. (R-James City), a lawyer whose firm does not lobby the General Assembly in part because of his presence, said he opposes the bar's efforts to change the rule.

"I absolutely would oppose it unequivocally," Norment said. "I hate to be trite, but this is a slippery slope with olive oil on it."

Hogan and other lawmakers raised the possibility of legislation to block the change if it goes into effect after a public comment period ends in April.

"This is very shocking," said Sen. Ken Cuccinelli II (R-Fairfax). Del. Brian J. Moran (D-Alexandria) said the change would taint all members of the legislature in both parties.

"I think they should reconsider," Moran said. "It would damage all of us in the legislature to have that potential stink or conflict."

Clinton Offers Contract To S.C. Endorser (AP)

By Susanne M. Schafer

AP, February 16, 2007

A key black Democratic leader in South Carolina has negotiated a $10,000 per month consulting contract with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign, a development that came to light when the lawmaker endorsed the presidential hopeful.

The contract with state Sen. Darrell Jackson's firm, Sunrise Enterprises, is not yet signed but will run through the first Southern primary here next January, Clinton spokesman Mo Elleithee confirmed Thursday.

Elleithee denied there was any deal made for Jackson's endorsement.

"Not at all. ... We told him, 'We'd love your support as a community leader and love your help as a respected political consultant inside the state,'" Elleithee said.

Jackson did not return messages on Thursday. He has told several media outlets that he turned down more money from other candidates.

Jackson's firm will advise Clinton's campaign on "political matters in South Carolina, outreach, organizing issues" and purchasing advertising, Elleithee said.

On Tuesday, Jackson and state Sen. Robert Ford said they would support Clinton. In 2004, both backed former Sen. John Edwards, a South Carolina native. Jackson and Ford took credit for turning out black voters for Edwards in 2004 in a state where half the primary voters are black.

Dick Harpootlian, former chair of the South Carolina Democratic Party, said endorsements carry little weight in the state.

"And if someone is a paid employee of the person they're endorsing, it should carry no weight," Harpootlian said.

Jackson has told media outlets that he doesn't draw a salary but drives a company car.

Elleithee said Jackson, also pastor of the Bible Way Church in Columbia, has had a long-term relationship with Clinton and her husband, former President Clinton, whom Jackson backed in 1992.

"When Senator Clinton began to put together her campaign operation, he was one of the first people we called in South Carolina," he said.

Obama's Southern Support Not A Cinch (CHIT)

By Dahleen Glanton

Chicago Tribune, February 16, 2007

COLUMBIA, S.C. -- As an African-American, Dean Stewart is proud that a black man has a good shot at becoming the next president of the United States.

He likes Sen. Barack Obama's style, his intellect and his compassion. In fact, Stewart said, Obama reminds him of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.

"He understands what he is up against as a black man, and he and his wife have said they are not afraid," said Stewart, 41, who owns a barbershop in Columbia.

Regardless of his admiration for Obama (D-Ill.), however, Stewart is not sure he will vote for him next year when South Carolina holds its primary election. He also likes Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.), the candidate he thinks has the best chance of winning the presidency and one he feels he has known for almost 15 years.

On Friday, Obama will travel to South Carolina for the first time in more than two years. While the rest of the country has elevated him to celebrity status, he is likely to find his greatest challenge yet in the South, particularly among blacks. Obama is not as well known as other candidates.

Votes for Obama won't come easily here, according to political experts. The South is home to the nation's largest concentration of African Americans—one of the Democratic Party's most loyal constituencies and some of the most dedicated supporters of former President Bill Clinton.

While Democrats traditionally are overpowered in general elections in the overwhelmingly Republican region, blacks will play a major role in primary elections in states such as South Carolina, Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia. About 50 percent of voters in South Carolina's Democratic primary are black.

The Jan. 29 primary in South Carolina will be the fourth earliest contest after Iowa, Nevada and New Hampshire, which bolsters the state's role in the selection of the Democratic nominee. Among the Democratic candidates, early polls in South Carolina show Clinton with 34 percent of the vote, followed by former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina with 31 percent and Obama with 10 percent.

Black voters, in particular, have found themselves in a dilemma. Should they support Obama and possibly make history or should they support Hillary Clinton and bring back a team many feel was the most dedicated to black causes since President John Kennedy?

"In my district, people are going with Hillary," said state Sen. Robert Ford, a Democrat from Charleston. "I am sure there will be some young blacks who will be behind Obama, but elderly blacks are going with Hillary because they love Bill and they love Hillary for standing behind him for eight years."

Like many African Americans, Stewart would like to see what he considers to be a dream ticket, with Clinton as the nominee and Obama as her vice presidential running mate.

"It would be like the Super Bowl with Chicago and Indianapolis and two black coaches," said Stewart. "Either one is a winner."

Though more than 2,100 tickets for Obama's appearance Friday at the Columbia convention center flew quickly, particularly on the predominantly white campus of the University of South Carolina, he is still relatively unknown to a vast number of voters in the state. Another 1,500 tickets were distributed for a town hall meeting in Orangeburg on Saturday.

"People down here don't know him, and South Carolinians in many ways are a difficult lot," said Cole Blease Graham, a political scientist at the University of South Carolina. "They like to see their politicians up close in the flesh, shake their hand and look them in the eye.

"Blacks will determine the winner in South Carolina, and if it came down to it right now, it would be Clinton because of the lack of exposure Obama has here," said Graham. "If Obama can win some attraction from whites and overwhelming support from black voters, he can beat Clinton."

Rep. James Clyburn (D-S.C.), the House majority whip, announced this week that he would not endorse a presidential candidate. Earlier, Ford and state Sen. Darrell Jackson endorsed Clinton, saying she had the best chance of winning. The men were credited with turning out a substantial black vote for Edwards when he won the state primary in 2004.

"I considered who I thought was best able to serve right now. The day after the election, who will walk into that office and be able to serve from day one?" said Jackson, who also serves as pastor of a 10,000-member Bible Way Family Life Center in Columbia. On Thursday, the Clinton campaign confirmed that Jackson has negotiated a $10,000 per month consulting contract with Clinton, according to The Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0133077

"Sen. Clinton brings a Rolodex of people who have served well, and a lot of it has to do with President Clinton. Most people view them as partners," said Ford. "People love Obama but they really love the Clintons."

Obama's supporters said people will love Obama too, once they get to know him.

"Sen. Obama hasn't even gotten to South Carolina yet and people are excited," said Anton Gunn, Obama's political director in South Carolina. "When he gets here and people have the opportunity to hear his message up close and personal, a lot of those who are undecided will be making up their minds."

Lachlan McIntosh, executive director of the South Carolina Democratic Party, said that while there is excitement over Obama's visit, Edwards, who was born in South Carolina, draws big crowds too. Clinton plans to visit the state next week.

"Sen. Obama is sparking the interest of a lot of people we have not seen involved in politics before, particularly young people," said McIntosh. "John Edwards has been here once this year and several times last year. We will find out Friday night whether Obama is as big as John Edwards."

While national polls suggest that race will not be a factor in Obama's bid, some analysts said it could come into play in the South.

"South Carolina is one of the most racially polarized places in the country, and black people in South Carolina have never elected a black candidate statewide," said David Bositis, senior political analyst for the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies in Washington. "There are places in the South where people don't think anybody black can be elected to anything. So when they think about the presidential election, they don't think of Obama as someone with very good prospects."

State Sen. John Drummond, who at age 87 has been in the Senate for 42 years, said he has not seen much support for Obama. Right now, he said, the race in South Carolina is between Clinton and Edwards.

"I think [Obama] will do alright, but he is about four years off," said Drummond. "A few years ago, I don't think he would have had much of any support in South Carolina, but he has earned it. He's a rather attractive guy and I can see a lot of good down the road."

Black Like Me? (WP)

By Marjorie Valbrun

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

What does it mean to be black, and who is the arbiter of authentic blackness? As Sen. Barack Obama's "blackness" has increasingly been discussed on black-oriented radio shows, at political conferences and on Sunday morning news shows, I've grown more dismayed by the day.

The discourse, occurring mostly among black people, has been dominated by questions about Obama's being biracial, his immigrant father and his suitability as a presidential candidate, given that his life story doesn't parallel that of most blacks born in the United States. Some have implied that only a black candidate whose ancestors were slaves here or who have themselves experienced the trauma of this country's racial history can truly understand what it means to be black in America and represent the political interests of black Americans.

This is a narrow-minded and divisive notion. At a time when blacks living in this country, whether by birth or by choice, should be harnessing their collective political clout to empower all black people, we're wasting time debating which of us are truly black.

As a black immigrant and a Haitian-American who has lived in the country for 37 years, I know how it feels to have my blackness challenged by native-born blacks.

It makes me angry. I'm angry for Obama, too. People are asking whether he's black enough to represent them. I ask, black enough by whose standards? Why must Obama's life follow the same track of "authentic" black folk to pass this litmus test?

Many of my black immigrant friends have also had their blackness questioned by native-born blacks who see us as "not really black." My ancestors probably weren't enslaved on American soil, but they were enslaved on Haitian soil. So how am I less black or less worthy of kinship with black Americans? How ridiculous that someone would think me unable to understand the pain of racism and the long-term costs of white supremacy and slavery.

Last Saturday, Obama's name was raised at the State of the Black Union, a gathering of some 10,000 black people in Hampton, Va., in a forum on the social and economic challenges facing black America. Top black scholars, intellectuals, civil rights leaders and opinion makers were present. Princeton professor Cornel West took Obama to task for not attending. West also criticized Obama's decision to announce his candidacy that day and to do so in front of the Illinois statehouse where Abraham Lincoln began his political career.

A thread of doubt about Obama's commitment to black America ran through some speakers' comments. Harvard law professor Charles Ogletree, who has known Obama since his time at law school, came to his defense. Ogletree noted Obama's record on civil rights and suggested his scheduling conflict was a transgression worthy of forgiveness.

DOJ_NMG_0133078

So this is what things have come to: If you don't walk to the beat of the black establishment, you might get kicked out of the club. What's next? A scarlet insignia for IBMs (Inauthentic Black Men)?

We don't all have to like or vote for Obama, but we shouldn't allow this debate to undermine him or discredit his stated commitment to the black community.

When did the social and political cause of American blacks start trumping the larger cause of all blacks living in this country? American blacks don't have a monopoly on blackness or suffering. We black immigrants and children of immigrants are also often stopped by police for driving while black. Ever heard of Abner Louima or Amadou Diallo? Many immigrants feel just as powerless and as excluded from the promise of America.

Yet the hopes, dreams and successes of immigrant and American blacks are also interconnected.

Black immigrants such as myself would probably not be here if not for the sacrifices of those who were on the front lines of the civil rights movement. And that's why I identify myself as black -- not that I have a choice -- with pride and without apology. But black Americans can't on the one hand complain about black immigrants consciously separating themselves from black Americans, which many immigrants do, and on the other hand say: "But you aren't really black like us."

Few American blacks can say with certainty that they don't also have white ancestors. Does that make them less black? Who knows that some distant ancestor of Obama's father was not enslaved here? The more important question is why any of this should matter. When did having slave ancestors become a barometer for political office? Surely those blacks supporting Hillary Clinton aren't holding her to that standard.

I also wonder if Obama's message of racial inclusion worries some blacks. Do they think if he reaches out to "them"(whites), it means he neglects "us" (blacks)?

Malcolm X and Martin Luther King Jr. recognized the universality of the struggle for dignity and self-determination of black people around the world. What were our protests against South African apartheid about if not this very principle? If American blacks can view black South Africans thousands of miles away as brothers in need of their support, why are they having such a hard time seeing Obama as one of their own?

Whether Obama is ready to run, deserves our vote or has enough experience for the job are all legitimate questions. Whether he is black enough is not.

A Wide-Open Web For The '08 Campaign (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

Does Barack Obama have the potential to trump Hillary Clinton's money, organization and methodical planning by becoming the online phenomenon of 2008? The answer may determine who wins the Democratic presidential nomination.

This is the election in which Internet campaigning will reach maturity. The 2000 campaign offered the first glimmers of the medium's power when John McCain surprised the political world by raising $6 million to $7 million online in his unsuccessful Republican primary campaign against George W. Bush.

Howard Dean rode the Internet from nowhere to a strong early position in the 2004 Democratic presidential race, only to fall to John Kerry. The same anti-Bush sentiment that had powered Dean later allowed Kerry to raise an estimated $82 million in Internet contributions.

Today, the next new thing is old hat -- but still evolving. "It's so mainstream now that every part of the campaign touches the Internet," said Becki Donatelli, who pioneered McCain's 2000 Internet fundraising and is working for him again. "It's the 900-pound gorilla. It's the real thing."

That, says Joe Trippi, Dean's first campaign manager and a longtime preacher of the Internet gospel, means that no single 2008 candidate will have the early command of the online world that Dean enjoyed.

"It's hard to have a Dean-like phenomenon ever again," said Simon Rosenberg, president of NDN, formerly the New Democrat Network, a progressive advocacy group, "because the Internet is not a shiny new toy anymore."

The question is whether Obama will have an edge as the candidate who talks about his campaign as a participatory mass movement and is trying to embody the word "new." Trippi, who is neutral this year, sees Obama as having "a lot of advantages" in Internet campaigning, particularly because "he is really connecting with young people, as Dean did early on."

But much will depend on whether Obama's approach lives up to his high-minded promise to supporters that his campaign won't "only be about me" and will become instead "the occasion, the vehicle, of your hopes, and your dreams."

That language, at least, matches one measure of a successful Internet campaign, according to Eli Pariser, executive director of the MoveOn.org political action committee, a liberal group that has not endorsed a 2008 candidate yet. "You have to make people feel they're part of the campaign," he says, "that they're not just people a candidate is trying to suck money out of."

Clinton, says Trippi, has the disadvantage of being a front-runner with widely publicized prowess at large-scale, conventional fundraising. This might lead potential Internet givers to the conclusion that "she doesn't need the money." He sees Obama as having a better chance of creating a sentiment among online donors that they are an important part of his campaign.

But Obama faces two obstacles to overwhelming Clinton on the Internet. The first is John Edwards, whose strong stands against the Iraq war and in favor of a broad national health insurance plan have made him popular among the more ideologically committed bloggers and their audiences. Obama and Edwards will be in competition for some of the same online support.

The second is the Clinton campaign's awareness that the Internet matters this year as it never has before. "The Clintons have mastered every other aspect of politics," says Rosenberg. "They're going to be competitive in this arena." Hillary Clinton, he notes, has been careful -- through her well-produced webcast announcement speech and online " conversations" -- to show she understands the new desire among political activists for more interaction with the candidates they support.

Clinton also could benefit from what Donatelli sees as a major shift in the sources of online money. "In 2000, nearly 90 percent of what we took in on our Web site came from people who found their way to us," Donatelli said, referring to McCain's effort. Now, 50 percent of Internet money is raised through "direct marketing."

Clinton will almost certainly do well on the marketing side, and both Trippi and Rosenberg argue that she is likely to find a strong niche among Democratic women, who have become increasingly important to the party's financial base.

In the coming months, partly because it's fun to do, the political world will be watching Hollywood and Wall Street to see who racks up the big money. But 2008 promises to be the year when decisions made at millions of computer screens on kitchen tables and office desks could outshine the glitz and beat out the large checkbooks. The Internet could thus provide Obama his best chance of keeping up with one of the most formidable fundraisers in Democratic politics.

Gingrich Among Top GOP '08 Candidates (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

Press accounts seldom name former House Speaker Newt Gingrich in the top tier of aspirants for the Republican presidential nomination, despite polls consistently showing he belongs there.

"Newt's invisible to much of the nation's media," said Republican communications strategist Tom Edmonds. "The liberal press doesn't want to acknowledge that he casts a big shadow over the 2008 race."

News stories and opinion columns routinely refer to Arizona Sen. John McCain, former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney as the "top tier" or "first tier" Republican presidential candidates for 2008.

Yet in every recent poll national poll -- as well as in Iowa, a key early caucus state -- Mr. Gingrich leads Mr. Romney among Republican likely voters. And it's not just because of high name recognition alone, conservatives say.

"Everybody here loves Gingrich," said Iowa Republican Party Executive Director Chuck Laudner. "He is a hero."

More than a dozen years after he zoomed to national prominence as the brash leader of the 1994 "Republican revolution," Mr. Gingrich has attained status as an elder statesman among top conservative leaders.

"I don't know how Gingrich would perform if he were elected to the highest office in the land but these days he is responsible in that each time I read one of his policy initiatives I want to stand up and cheer," said Paul M. Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation.

Among the top Republican contenders, Mr. Gingrich is the only one who has neither formed an exploratory committee nor officially declared his candidacy -- and thus is the only one who is not raising money for a campaign.

Mr. Gingrich has said he will wait until September to make a decision on running. Still, in poll after poll, he joins Mr. Giuliani and Mr. McCain in scoring in double digits.

Late starters, however, may be out of luck this time, with both parties' nominees expected to be known by early February of next year. Federal Election Commissioner Michael Toner has estimated a viable presidential candidate must raise $100 million by the end of this year.

"Does Newt belong in the first tier? Not unless he gets in soon," said Patrick J. Buchanan, who unsuccessfully sought the Republican presidential nomination in 1992 and 1996 before running on the Reform Party ticket in 2000.

"Folks are committing themselves in the early states," he said. "Endorsements are coming. Organizational help is being pledged. Money is being raised. Mailing and e-mail lists and financial supporters are being lined up."

Mr. Buchanan, who challenged the first President Bush in the 1992 Republican primaries, said, "If you wait till fall, you may be able to come off the blocks fast in January, as we did in 1992, but you just don't have the legs to go the distance."

Even Mr. Gingrich's supporters acknowledge that he has liabilities. During his tenure as speaker, his Republican House colleagues twice mutinied against his leadership. Following unexpected losses in the 1998 midterm elections, he left Congress with low approval ratings.

Nevertheless, Republican pollster Kellyanne Conway said, Mr. Gingrich remains an important voice for his party and the conservative movement because he "is the same big-ideas generator that led Republicans out of the wilderness in 1994."

His name recognition and conservative credentials largely account for Mr. Gingrich's current standing among Republican 2008 contenders, said pollster John Zogby.

"Gingrich is the most high-profile conservative in the race," Mr. Zogby said. "At the very least he is the conservative place holder. Should Gingrich run, he can get double-digit support and help frame the debate. He is a player."

Mr. Giuliani, however, leads the Republican field in many polls even though he is the most liberal candidate on social issues. He won 34 percent of Republican voters nationally in the latest Fox News poll, with Mr. McCain getting 22 percent, Mr. Gingrich at 15 percent and Mr. Romney at 3 percent. Those numbers roughly mirror results in the latest surveys by Rasmussen (Mr. Giuliani 27 percent, Mr. McCain 25 percent, Mr. Gingrich 13 percent, Mr. Romney 7 percent) and Time magazine (Mr. McCain 30 percent, Mr. Giuliani 26 percent, Mr. Gingrich 14 percent, Mr. Romney 5 percent).

In Iowa, the three latest polls show Mr. Giuliani leading Mr. McCain, with Mr. Gingrich placing third and Mr. Romney fourth. Only in New Hampshire -- next door to Mr. Romney's home state -- does the former Massachusetts governor place ahead of Mr. Gingrich in recent polls.

Brownback Leads The Field In Missed Votes (POL)

By Carrie Sheffield

The Politico, February 16, 2007

Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., has been playing an awful lot of hooky these days. Last month, he missed more than half of his Senate roll call votes, according to AbsentCongress.org, a Web site launched Thursday that tracks senatorial absenteeism.

Only Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., who remains hospitalized after a life-threatening brain hemorrhage, has missed more. Johnson, who staffers say is making steady progress in his recovery, hasn't made it to any votes yet.

Brownback showed up 48 percent of the time. As a presidential hopeful, he probably has his hands full. Yet rival senators who are also moonlighting as '08 contenders have higher attendance records – though the campaign season remains young.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., has managed to show up for every vote so far. And both senators Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., and John McCain, R-Ariz., scored a 94 percent attendance record last month, according to the site. Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., attended 84 percent of votes last month; Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., who hasn't formally entered the race, was present 76 percent of the time.

Among the non-candidates, Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, has the worst attendance at 51 percent. Sen. Kit Bond, R-Mo., is next, showing up 74 percent of the time, ahead of senators Craig Thomas, R-Wyo., and Joe Biden, D-Del., who have made it to 79 percent of their votes.

Brownback and Inouye did not immediately respond to requests for comment.

"Normal American people show up to work every day," said David Ferguson, a manager of the site. "Why shouldn't our senators?"

Ferguson is president of the American Conservative Student Union. Members created and plan to update the site monthly. The ACSU launched in January as an offshoot from TheVanguard.org, a new online grass-roots network headed by Rod Martin, former counsel to Silicon Valley tech giant PayPal.

Martin and his partners say their work is a conservative response to the liberal online community at MoveOn.org.

Though his group gets funding from right-leaning donors, Ferguson said absentcongress.org pokes at lawmakers from both parties. He and his team divided the senators' monthly salary (roughly $13,767 per person) by the number of votes in January (39) and affixed a price tag ($353) for each vote they missed. They plan to send an invoice to each senator. By ACSU's tally, Brownback owes $7,060, Inouye owes $6,707, and Bond should pony up $3,530.

For now, AbsentCongress.org tracks only senators, but it plans to include House members soon.

The Banker's Candidate (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum, Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

Connecticut Sen. Christopher J. Dodd has two big jobs. He is a candidate for the Democratic nomination for president, and he chairs the Senate Banking Committee.

They are proving to be a lucrative combination. Among Democrats, Dodd's $5 million campaign nest egg is surpassed only by that of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), who has one of the most elaborate fundraising machines ever assembled.

DOJ_NMG_0133081

Dodd's electoral riches can be traced to the banking panel, whose jurisdiction includes some of the wealthiest industries in America -- banking, insurance and financial services. In addition, Dodd's home state is the hedge fund and insurance capital of the country.

But it is Dodd's philosophy, not only his geography, that has made him a cash magnet. Each of these big-money interests applauds his light-handed approach to financial regulation and considers him a reliable friend -- a fact that raises questions about Dodd's viability in a Democratic field even as it bolsters his fundraising prowess.

In recent presidential polls, Dodd has been little more than an asterisk. And his closeness with Wall Street will probably not help him with the liberal-leaning Democrats who tend to vote in presidential primaries, analysts say. "It's not something you would trumpet to primary voters," said Nathan L. Gonzales of the nonpartisan Rothenberg Political Report.

At the same time, the ample donations those connections have fostered will enable him to make his name more widely known. "At this stage, the money primary is the biggest race," Gonzales added.

Financial services companies "will be making contributions to Dodd's presidential run because they can't afford to annoy him," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. "Whether or not his presidential ambitions go anywhere, he'll still be the chairman of Senate Banking Committee, and they will still need his goodwill."

Dodd, who was elected to the House in 1974 and the Senate in 1980, has never shied away from collecting funds from financial services companies. Since the midterm elections last year, Citigroup and J.P. Morgan Chase have hosted fundraisers for him, participants said. Insurance firms have held at least three fundraisers for Dodd.

Dodd collected $3 million in the last three months of 2006, outraising even Clinton. Employees of American International Group and Morgan Stanley were among the largest givers. According to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics, Dodd has raised more money for his Senate campaigns from securities and investment firms than from any other industry.

During an interview last week in his stately fourth-floor office on Capitol Hill, Dodd expressed distaste with the near-constant need to generate campaign contributions to sustain a presidential bid. But, he said, the system being what it is, he is resigned to traveling the fundraising circuit for the next year or more.

He said he will not hesitate to shake Wall Street's money tree, even though he is chairman of the committee that watches over its companies. But accepting millions of dollars from industries that his committee oversees will not affect his policy decisions, Dodd said.

"My record speaks for itself," the senator said. "I haven't changed my tune. I've been, I think, fairly consistent in my views on these issues."

Financial firms have long liked what Dodd has done in the areas of legislation and regulation. "Chairman Dodd is a thoughtful leader in Congress playing an important policy role to ensure an open, competitive and sound global financial services marketplace," said Robert S. Nichols, president of the Financial Services Forum, a Washington group comprising the chief executives of 21 U.S. financial services companies, in typically flowery praise of the new chairman.

"A lot of his constituents are financial services types, and he's always been a reasonable person on those issues," added Bruce E. Thompson Jr., the head of government relations for Merrill Lynch. "Because of that, he's always gotten support from the industry."

"The financial services community would be a logical source of funding for him," agreed Edward L. Yingling, president of the American Bankers Association.

Dodd is a voice of federal restraint when it comes to financial services. He has opposed vigorous federal regulation of hedge funds, many of which are based in Connecticut. He also was the Senate's leading champion of a 1995 law that limited shareholders' right to bring class-action lawsuits against companies for alleged securities misdeeds.

Now, Dodd is leading the charge to renew terrorism-insurance legislation, which makes the federal government a major co-underwriter of insurance against terrorist attacks.

Hedge funds are "a great wealth generator" that if handled properly "will continue to be a tremendous asset," Dodd said. He added that the Banking Committee would probably not hold hearings on hedge funds this year.

"I don't want to be perceived . . . as setting up roadblocks and barriers to something I perceive to be very valuable," he said.

On the other hand, Dodd has taken some anti-industry positions. He helped write the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which imposed stiffer penalties on accounting irregularities. He has also taken positions on a few narrow issues that anger financial firms but are popular with the populists who usually vote Democratic.

For instance, Dodd said he intends to campaign against predatory-lending practices by banks, which entail charging excessive interest rates on mortgage loans, often to low-income people. He also said he wants to crack down on excessive fees charged by credit card companies.

Dodd has leveraged his committee's jurisdiction to press for Wall Street jobs for low-income workers. In recent weeks, he has reached out to minority voters with a speech at the Rainbow/Push Coalition's Wall Street Economic Summit in New York. At the summit, convened by the Rev. Jesse L. Jackson, Dodd decried economic inequality and pledged to establish a "working group" to expand opportunities for minorities in the financial services industry.

Since assuming the Banking Committee chairmanship last month, Dodd has held hearings on predatory mortgage loans and high-interest-rate credit cards that burden consumers with unwieldy debt. He is working with Elizabeth Warren, a Harvard Law School professor and consumer bankruptcy expert, and others to roll back those high fees, he said.

"At the end of my tenure on this committee, I want it to be said that the safety and soundness of our financial institutions was not weakened on my watch," Dodd said.

Travis B. Plunkett, legislative director at the Consumer Federation of America, said the group's rating on Dodd has been a "mixed bag." But, Plunkett added, he's effective. "He often ends up on the winning side of an issue."

"We love to have him on our side, and we wince when we're going to be opposing him because he's a very effective legislator," Plunkett said.

Mr. Romney Jumps In (WP)

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

FORMER Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney chose his home state of Michigan to formally launch his presidential bid, which may say a lot about the hurdles he faces in his effort to win the Republican nomination. Having presided over one of the most liberal states in the nation, having made statements on issues such as abortion and gay rights that appealed to the residents of that state, Mr. Romney, 59, now needs to convince the social conservatives who have a big say in picking the party's nominee that he is not a Massachusetts Republican after all. Mr. Romney, a Harvard MBA and management consultant, has methodically gone about the task of wooing social conservatives, but his record could make that a tough sell.

He has disavowed previous positions backing a federal law to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and calling for an end to the ban on gays in the military; now he emphasizes his opposition to the ruling on same-sex marriage by Massachusetts's highest court. Once he touted his support for abortion rights and backed the use of leftover embryos for stem cell research; now he endorses overturning Roe v. Wade, a position he says he came to during the stem cell debate. Our views are much more in line with the old Romney than the new version; Republican primary voters will have to judge for themselves which is authentic and whether political opportunism, rather than a moral awakening, as he says, played a role in Mr. Romney's transformation.

Mr. Romney enters the race with many strengths. In his announcement, he sounded a reformer-outsider message reminiscent of both Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.), saying that "the halls of government are clogged with petty politics and stuffed with peddlers of influence." But he also argued that the presidency is not a job for "someone who has never even managed a corner store, let alone the largest enterprise in the world." Mr. Romney's managerial and executive experience, in private life and government, separate him from most of his rivals. He had a successful stint as head of the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City, overcoming a bribery scandal and turning a failing financial enterprise into a money-making operation.

As governor of Massachusetts, he worked with the Democratic legislature -- and the state's senior U.S. senator, liberal icon Edward M. Kennedy -- to craft a universal health insurance plan by combining a mandate for individuals to purchase coverage, subsidies for those unable to afford it and a "fee" -- not a tax, Mr. Romney argued -- for employers who failed to offer coverage. How the Romney plan will work out remains uncertain: The first bids came in at double the expected monthly premium cost.

One challenge that Mr. Romney faces is something that we hope dissipates as an issue over time: winning over voters uneasy about his Mormon faith. In a Gallup poll this week, a disturbing 24 percent said they would not vote for a "generally well-qualified person for president who happened to be Mormon." Mr. Romney's religion could be a particular sticking point with evangelical Christians who wield significant clout in GOP primaries. As with another Massachusetts politician who ran for the presidency more than four decades ago and persuaded voters not to hold his Catholicism against him, Mr. Romney should be judged on a basis other than his faith.

Special Interests Launch State Term Limit Initiative (LAT)

By Nancy Vogel

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

SACRAMENTO — An unusual coalition of special interests with close ties to lawmakers launched a ballot initiative today that would tweak California's term limits to allow the Legislature's current leaders to stay in office as long as six more years.

DOJ_NMG_0133083

The measure would do what Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles) and Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata (D-Oakland) have discussed with increasing urgency as their 2008 ousters approach: Cut the number of years a legislator could hold office from 14 years to 12, but allow that time to be served in a single house. FOR THE RECORD:

Initiative: An earlier version of this story stated that the teachers union and the California Chamber of Commerce will bankroll the collection of signatures for the ballot intitiative. The coalition, which includes the California Teachers Assn. and the business group, is likely to support the intitiative. Also, it was earlier reported that the proposed initiative was filed in the secretary of state's office. It was filed in the state's attorney general's office.—

Under the proposal, filed today at the state's attorney general's office, Nuñez could serve six more years in the Assembly and Perata could have four more years in the Senate.

To appease other lawmakers, the measure would allow those who would otherwise be forced out in 2008 to serve as many as 12 years in their current house.

California voters slapped term limits on the Legislature in 1990 with an initiative, passed by a narrow margin, that also cut the Legislature's budget by nearly half and jettisoned the lawmakers' retirement system. Past attempts to relax term limits have failed. They remain at three two-year terms in the Assembly and two four-year terms in the Senate for a total of 14 years.

Lawmakers could put a term-limits proposal on the ballot themselves with a two-thirds majority vote, but Republicans — whose votes would be needed for that supermajority — have been cold to the idea.

Still, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Republican, has said he is willing to discuss term-limit changes as part of a package that includes an initiative to take away lawmakers' power to draw legislative districts and give it to an independent commission. Nuñez has endorsed such redistricting reform and said recently, "There certainly is the will to get this done this year."

The campaign will be managed by unlikely partners: Democratic consultant Gale Kaufman, who spearheaded the defeat of Schwarzenegger's reform measures in the 2005 special election, and Matthew Dowd, campaign strategist for the governor's resounding reelection in November.

A coalition that includes the California Teachers Assn. and the California Chamber of Commerce will likely support the initiative, Kaufman said. By July, the campaign must collect 1.1 million signatures.

The measure would appear on the next statewide ballot, which could be as early as February 2008. If passed then, the new limits would take effect before legislative primaries are held that June.

Riding high from a legislative session last year that many praised as the most productive in years and without an open office to land when he is termed out in 2008, Nuñez has said with increasing frequency recently that he thinks voters will be open to adjusting term limits.

"You can't do the job effectively if you can't be there for a reasonable amount of time, to have a real grasp on the issues," he told a group of newspaper publishers last month. "You've got to know in this job how to say no to your own constituents and in some cases the people that brought you there. ... It takes a couple of years to develop the level of expertise and know-how to negotiate a balanced budget.

"I think we ought to relax those terms," Nuñez said, "and I think we ought to do it sooner rather than later."

Many political scientists who have studied term limits also support relaxing them. They say that while the churn of legislators through Sacramento has increased the Legislature's diversity, it has also cost institutional knowledge, strengthened the hand of lobbyists and weakened the Legislature's traditional oversight role. These observers also say the limits encourage lawmakers to introduce bills aimed at gaining publicity rather than tackling unglamorous problems, such as prison overcrowding and pension shortfalls.

"Term limits in states have done more to limit rather than enhance the effectiveness of the legislative branch," said Karl Kurtz, a researcher with the National Conference of State Legislatures who studied term limits in six states last spring.

In the 1990s, 21 states imposed term limits. They are now in effect in 15. Courts tossed out the restrictions in four states and lawmakers repealed them in Idaho and Utah.

California lawmakers point with hope to Los Angeles, where voters extended City Council term limits in November, allowing members to serve three four-year terms instead of two terms. The extension was tied to tighter lobbying rules.

"It's a fairly significant thing when L.A. does anything and we ought to look at it very carefully," Perata said Tuesday.

The Legislature lacks continuity, he said, noting that some of the 38 new members who arrived in December have introduced bills that attempt to dictate the spending of $37 billion in public works bonds crafted by the Legislature and passed by voters in November.

"Now that's one fight I know you'd avoid if people had some continuity in office," Perata said.

"There are people like Fabian Nuñez who now is beginning to hit his stride as a political leader," Perata said. "Why shouldn't we benefit? Why should we then pick somebody off the shelf that we don't know anything about?"

A Hard Right Punch (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

Michelle Malkin has seen her head electronically grafted onto a photo of a bikini-clad body.

She had to cancel a Berkeley book signing in the face of 200 shouting protesters.

YouTube banned one of her videos. And she felt compelled to move after critics posted online her Gaithersburg area address and pictures of her home.

Clearly, this is a woman who arouses strong emotions.

"They'll ridicule my looks, ridicule my ethnicity, go after my family," the 36-year-old blogger says of her critics. "They've attacked my husband relentlessly. There's a strong sexist strain among my liberal critics, who think it isn't possible I could have gotten anywhere without my Svengali husband, or some white man, embedding ideas in my head."

Make no mistake, though: This daughter of Filipino immigrants plays pretty rough herself. Whether on her blog, her Internet talk show or her Fox News appearances, Malkin delights in sticking her finger in the eye of the liberal establishment. And she is convinced that her detractors don't play fair.

"Particularly when you're a minority conservative," she says, "you get a lot of ugly, hysterical, unhinged attacks, because you're challenging so many liberal myths about what people of color should think."

Plenty of folks find Malkin's rhetoric overheated as well. "The donkey party," she wrote last fall, "is led by thumb-sucking demagogues in prominent positions who equate Bush with Hitler and Jim Crow, call him a liar in front of high school students and the world, fantasize about impeachment and fetishize the human rights of terrorists who want to kill me. Put simply: There are no grown-ups in the Democrat Party."

Andrew Sullivan, a conservative blogger who has turned on the Bush administration, regularly bestows a "Malkin Award" for excessive attacks. "Sometimes you just can't believe what she writes -- it's so out there, and in certain respects quite disgraceful," he says.

At the same time, says Sullivan, "she's been subjected to some pretty horrifying bigotry from the left, based on her gender and ethnicity and ugly stereotypes. You can't engage in the kind of rhetoric she does and not expect some blowback."

Is this merely how the war of ideas is waged in an anything-goes digital culture? Or is Malkin an especially inflammatory practitioner, torching her targets with such books as "Unhinged: Exposing Liberals Gone Wild"?

Over lunch at a Filipino cafe at Union Station, Malkin, who has two young children, is charming one moment and pugnacious the next. She says she loves the intellectual freedom of the blogosphere, where "you can respond, you can reveal people to be the liars and slanderers they are."

Between bites, though, you can catch a glimpse of amazement that "a small-town girl from South Jersey," as she puts it, can have such an outsize impact. Even if she makes plenty of enemies in the process.

Malkin has been relentlessly critical of the media's coverage of Iraq. Last month, she went to see for herself.

"I really wanted to go to Ramadi, but my husband wouldn't let me," Malkin says. Instead, she spent a week embedded with an Army unit in Baghdad and returned more hopeful about a war effort she had increasingly begun to doubt.

Part of Malkin's self-assigned mission was to check out a much-debated Associated Press dispatch. It quoted an Iraqi police captain, Jamil Hussein, as saying that Shiites had burned or blown up four mosques -- and at one of them, doused six Sunnis with kerosene and burned them alive while nearby Iraqi soldiers did not intervene. After the widely published November report, Malkin and other conservative bloggers mounted a campaign questioning whether Hussein existed.

When the Iraqi government belatedly confirmed that Hussein was a police official -- and said that he faced arrest for speaking to the press -- Malkin reported the news and expressed regret. But she now questions Hussein's very account, saying she found little damage at the mosques.

"We quoted people saying [the victims] had been bombed and burned," says John Daniszewski, international editor at the AP, which acknowledged last week that the mosques are still standing despite some damage. "It was a moving news story. We said these were allegations and not confirmed by police."

In the wake of her Iraq trip, Sullivan has softened his criticism of Malkin. "You've got to give her credit that she has actually gone there," he says. "And she has criticized the administration on this and other things. She may be shrill, but she's not a shill."

Malkin bristles at the notion that she is "some Republican Kool-Aid drinker." She has lambasted President Bush -- whom she views as insufficiently conservative -- on such issues as immigration reform, the Harriet Miers nomination to the Supreme Court and the failed Dubai ports deal. Malkin was frustrated when the president agreed to seek court warrants for domestic eavesdropping, after she had doggedly defended his earlier position that judicial approval was unnecessary.

"There is a feeling that every time we go to bat for the Bush administration, they pull the rug out from under us," she says.

Malkin's campaigns have had mixed results. She helped lead the charge against two liberal bloggers who resigned under pressure from John Edwards's presidential campaign after being castigated for anti-Christian writing. But she apologized last month for linking to a photo of John Kerry sitting alone during a visit to Iraq, and adopting accounts by a blogger and a radio host that he had been spurned by the troops there. It turned out that the Massachusetts senator was waiting for an interview with reporters.

Malkin also serves as an early-warning system, such as when she wrote about protests (by what she called "Islamist p.c. bullies") against a Danish newspaper for publishing cartoons making fun of the prophet Muhammad. When violent demonstrations later broke out, Malkin posted all the cartoons as a free-speech gesture.

"She's a very tough lady," says Bryan Preston, her business partner in the daily video blog Hot Air. "You've never met a happier person than Michelle when she's in the thick of a fight. She enjoys the combat of ideas."

That persona is a far cry from the self-described "geek" of her youth. Michelle Maglalang grew up outside Atlantic City in a Reaganite, conservative Catholic family, was not politically active, and failed a fifth-grade public speaking class. As a college student, she was so naive that when a married Republican congressman invited her to live in his home during her internship with then-Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.), she thought it was a generous offer until her parents straightened her out.

It was at Oberlin College that she began working on an alternative newspaper founded by Jesse Malkin, her future husband. When they co-authored an article questioning the value of affirmative action -- and outraged students dumped bundles of papers in the trash -- "it was an awakening" for Michelle, says Jesse. She soon converted him from a Michael Dukakis supporter to the conservative side.

"She's always been hard-hitting," says Jesse, now a stay-at-home dad and health-care consultant. "She doesn't have a lot of tolerance for mealy-mouthed platitudes."

After seven years as an editorial writer for the Los Angeles Daily News and the Seattle Times, Michelle Malkin moved to Washington in 1999 to work for the Competitive Enterprise Institute. She launched her blog, http://Michellemalkin.com, in 2004. Last month it drew 388,000 visitors, and it's complemented by a syndicated column that appears in 150 papers.

Her newspaper experience was crucial because "you see what a lot of crackpots and cranks are out there," says Mark Cunningham, the New York Post opinion editor, who has known Malkin for years. "She learned a long time ago to deal with sticks and stones. People read her, even if they're infuriated by her."

Malkin's detractors -- whom she derides as "moonbats" -- were further riled by her book "In Defense of Internment," in which she said the confining of Japanese Americans during World War II was justified, and backed racial profiling as a vital tool against terrorism.

She was also denounced for posting the phone numbers of three antiwar protesters at the University of California at Santa Cruz who chased military recruiters off the campus. Malkin says the contact numbers were listed on a press release put out by the students' group.

Not surprisingly, it gets pretty hot in her kitchen. The liberal blogger Atrios (Duncan Black) called Malkin a racist over her views on immigration and said anyone who promotes her site "may as well be promoting the Klan." A Web site called Malkin Watch runs a cartoon of her in a Nazi uniform. In comments on her own blog -- a feedback loop she has since restricted -- one person called her "lyin' pond scum" and another asked why she believed "she will be treated as white when God chose to make her yellow?"

When Malkin posted a video about Islamic violence -- set to religious chanting -- on YouTube last year, the Web site promptly removed it as inappropriate. She fought back with an online video criticizing YouTube, which the site also deleted, posting a one-line explanation that Malkin herself had withdrawn it. That, she said on her blog, was a lie.

After a few liberal sites posted her home address and phone numbers last year, Malkin received a wave of harassing calls. She responded with a defiant post, headlined "I AM NOT AFRAID OF YOU." Malkin and her family have moved elsewhere in Maryland.

"No one likes to receive the kind of attacks she gets," Preston says. "She has had to take some security precautions to make sure it doesn't rise to the level of threatening her family."

Sometimes, though, Malkin seems to use the same howitzer against every provocation. After she started crusading against the "Girls Gone Wild" culture as a "liberal assault on decency," the satirical site Wonkette received -- and posted -- a picture of Malkin's head on the scantily-clad body of a college student, whose image had been plucked from the Web. Malkin denounced what she called the "hate-filled cowards" at Wonkette's parent company for "repeatedly smearing and attempting to humiliate me."

DOJ_NMG_0133086

After being contacted by Malkin's lawyer, Wonkette ran a snarkily worded semi-retraction. The site's West Coast bureau chief, Ken Layne, says he doesn't know or care whether the picture is real and calls Malkin "incapable of getting a joke."

"People send us dumb stuff all the time, and if it makes us laugh, we post it," he adds. "Malkin responds in such a predictably psychotic way whenever we mention her."

What some might have dismissed as a prank became another salvo in the culture wars. It is as though eternal vigilance is the price of being Michelle Malkin: No slight can go unanswered, no insult allowed to stand. Blogging is an addiction, she says, but not one she is looking to kick.

"You have to accept that you'll never have many friends," Malkin says. "It's a lonely existence."

The Autoworkers' Pain (NYT)

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

American autoworkers are suffering through another round of layoffs, factory closings and buyouts. This time DaimlerChrysler has announced that it will cut 13,000 jobs in North America. Ford Motor and General Motors offered buyouts to a total of nearly 200,000 hourly workers in 2006.

These losses stoke fears that America's manufacturing base is disappearing, that the country is "de-industrializing." With the loss of three million American factory jobs since the end of 2000 and the trade deficit at an all-time high, it's easy to see China's spectacular growth and assume that American factories are being gutted by foreign competition.

But global competition is not the whole cause for the car manufacturers' problems, just as the answers are not to be found in protectionism.

Many of the car companies' difficulties stem from some bad decisions by management and some uninspired car designs. Chrysler lost $1.48 billion last year and Ford lost $12.7 billion, the most in more than a century in business, while Toyota reported record profits and sales.

The plight of the workers who have lost their jobs is real and has to be addressed, but the U.S. manufacturing sector is far more robust than the struggle of the carmakers suggests. According to the United Nations, the United States accounted for 21.2 percent of world manufacturing in 2000. As China surged ahead in recent years, the American share of world manufacturing barely budged, falling to 21.1 percent by 2005, the most recent year available. American factories produced a record $1.5 trillion in goods that year.

In part, that's because foreign companies have invested so much in factory capacity in America. In a recent report, a Democratic research organization, the Progressive Policy Institute, cited government figures showing that foreign manufacturers invest billions more in the United States than American manufacturers invest abroad. Toyota provides over 29,000 manufacturing jobs in this country.

Many of the jobs that have disappeared did not drain off to foreign competition, but to technological change on the shop floor. Robots and computers have allowed far fewer workers to produce more than ever. That kind of high-tech manufacturing is one reason successful American companies like Boeing and Caterpillar can compete with companies in countries where the labor costs are low.

This is not to ignore the human dimension. It is too easy for free trade advocates to blame the robots and then ignore the pain of the blue-collar workers they have sidelined. The suffering in places like Ohio, Indiana and Michigan is very real, and so is the political backlash that results. The long-term answer is the vexing question of training American workers for a new world of jobs. But there are more short-term issues as well, starting with taking care of those Americans, middle aged and older, who suddenly find themselves without jobs right now.

The burden falls on pro-trade politicians and those who support them, unless they want to see high tariffs and duties, which will ultimately choke global and domestic growth. Just to start, pro-trade politicians have to make sure that a lost factory job does not mean a drastic and lasting decline in living standards, with no access to health insurance and no hope for a college education for that worker's children. As the tide rises, this country cannot allow millions to drown.

Rice Is Said To Have Speeded North Korea Deal (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Thom Shanker

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15 — To win approval of a deal with North Korea that has been assailed by conservatives inside and outside the administration, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice bypassed layers of government policy review that had derailed past efforts to negotiate an agreement, several senior administration officials said this week.

DOJ_NMG_0133087

After a meeting in Berlin in mid-January with her top negotiator on North Korea, Christopher R. Hill, who had just held lengthy sessions with his North Korean counterparts, Ms. Rice called back to Washington to describe the outlines of the deal to Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, and then to President Bush.

But to some, it seemed the usual procedures were cut short — vetting the details though an interagency process that ordinarily would have brought in Vice President Dick Cheney's office, the Defense Department and aides at the White House and other agencies who had previously objected to rewarding North Korea before it gives up its weapons.

"There was no process here," said an official who has been deeply involved in the issue. "Nothing. There was no airing of whether this is the way to deal with the North Koreans."

White House and other administration officials dispute that, saying that all relevant agencies were consulted.

In lieu of the formal meetings where objections to such accords were usually voiced during the president's first term, Mr. Hadley "walked it through with concerned people," a senior administration official said. The official acknowledged that the process was much more informal, and rapid, than usual, although much of Mr. Hill's work was built upon previous negotiations at the talks that had been widely vetted across the administration.

The result has been an unusual attack on the agreement from the right, starting with John R. Bolton, the former ambassador to the United Nations who takes a tough stance on North Korea issues. He said bluntly that it was a "bad deal," and expressed the hope that it would fall apart before being carried out.

State Department officials said that Robert Joseph, the under secretary of state for arms control and disarmament, vehemently disagreed with the approach, telling associates privately what Mr. Bolton has said in public: that the new agreement was no better, and perhaps worse, than one signed by President Clinton in 1994. Mr. Joseph, who announced last month that he would resign soon, declined to comment Thursday.

Ms. Rice on Thursday sternly played down the significance of any internal dissent, making it clear that she would not entertain dissent after the president had made up his mind.

"First of all, the U.S. government is the U.S. government," she said. "And so the decision has been taken. And since people are loyal to decisions that are taken, I think that everybody expects there to be loyalty to this decision."

Mr. Bush, asked at a news conference on Wednesday about Mr. Bolton's critique, was succinct: "I strongly disagree — strongly disagree with his assessment."

But in Mr. Bush's first term, the decision-making process worked very differently.

State Department negotiators almost never dealt with the North Koreans without officials from the Defense Department and the vice president's office coming along, and reporting back. In one instance, Mr. Cheney stepped into the Oval Office to put an end to a discussion under way in Beijing, when he feared an agreement setting out steps for resolving the nuclear standoff lacked the tough language on disarmament that he believed Mr. Bush wanted. Colin L. Powell, then the secretary of state, learned of the decision after a black-tie dinner.

In this deal, North Korea has agreed in principle to disarmament, but all discussion about actually giving up weapons — and what the North might receive in return — has been deferred.

Senior administration officials said they had been concerned that this deal, unlike the 1994 accord, should not "front-load" benefits to North Korea, and they said that instead it would reward the country bit by bit, as it carried out a freeze, and the "disablement," of North Korea's nuclear facilities.

"What's different this time is that it is clear that both the president and Condi wanted a deal," said an official peripherally involved in the debate. Several officials acknowledge that as the Bush presidency enters its final years, two foreign policy goals have risen higher on the agenda: peace between the Israelis and Palestinians and disarming North Korea.

Others said that the rapidly shifting terrain beneath the negotiations allowed Ms. Rice to press her case with Mr. Hadley and directly to the president. Another senior administration official said that the North Korean response to Mr. Hill in Berlin was circulated, but on a "relatively limited" basis as it was one of the most delicate national security issues facing the Bush administration.

Immediately after Mr. Hill's meeting with his North Korean counterpart in Berlin, Mr. Hill briefed Ms. Rice as she stopped in the German capital on the way home from the Middle East. She called the president from Berlin, and also spoke with Mr. Hadley, who was reviewing a copy of the document presented to Mr. Hill by the North Koreans, a senior administration official said.

"Chris signed on to it in Berlin," said a senior administration official, although a full six-party session was required to formalize the deal because the Bush administration was insisting on a multilateral format to better enforce any agreement with the North.

White House Calms GOP Base On Korea Deal (AP)

AP, February 16, 2007

The White House on Thursday sought to ease concern among conservatives, including at least one key aide to President Bush, that a nuclear disarmament deal with North Korea goes too easy on the communist country.

One provision that conservatives find particularly troubling could allow North Korea to be removed from a list of terror-sponsoring states. One of Bush's deputy national security advisers, Elliott Abrams, raised alarms about that section in a series of e-mails.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said he spoke with Abrams and assured him North Korea will not be removed from the list unless it changes it behavior.

"The North Koreans don't get it for free," Snow said. "They've got to earn it, like everything else."

"We've seen conservatives criticizing this provision because they want the same kind of reassurance," Snow said. "So here it is — no political deal, it has to be based on facts and performance on the part of the North Koreans."

Snow said Abrams was reassured about the terms, and that Abrams did not oppose the deal — he was just seeking clarification.

Asked if Abrams was satisfied with the answers he'd received, Snow said: "Yes. I can say that without reservation."

"In this White House, people do express their opinions freely and give their advice," Snow responded after Abrams' skepticism had made its way into the newspaper.

That disclosure of Abrams' concerns came after John Bolton, who until recently was Bush's U.N. ambassador, said the agreement rewards North Korea for bad behavior. He called the agreement "fundamentally flawed." Bush said in a news conference on Wednesday that he strongly disagreed with that assessment, and that North Korea would receive no aid unless it lives up to its end of the deal.

Bush underscored that point Thursday in a conversation with Chinese President Hu Jintao. Bush congratulated Hu about the important role China played in reaching disarmament deal.

"President Bush told President Hu that it was now up to the leader of North Korea to live up to the commitments made in order to create a better life for the North Korean people," said Bush's national security spokesman, Gordon Johndroe.

Under the first phase of the breakthrough agreement reached in Beijing on Tuesday, North Korea would shut down its main nuclear reactor and allow U.N. inspectors back into the country within 60 days. In return, it would receive aid equal to 50,000 tons of heavy fuel oil from the other countries participating in the six-party talks — the United States, South Korea, Russia, China and Japan. The United States will also begin the process of removing North Korea from its designation as a terror-sponsoring state, but no deadlines have been set.

S. Korean Dissenter Warns Of Nuke Deal (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

A top contender to be South Korea's next president is warning that North Korea must be forced to give up all its nuclear-weapons programs if the new accord to end the peninsula's nuclear crisis is to succeed.

Park Guen-hye, daughter of the late South Korean President Park Chung-hee and a former chairman of the leading opposition party, said on a Washington visit Wednesday that the deal reached during the six-party talks in Beijing this week was a "good first step," but there were still "many mountains to cross" before the crisis was resolved.

Merely freezing Pyongyang's existing nuclear arsenal, she said, was unacceptable and would only re-create the conditions of the discredited 1994 Agreed Framework negotiated by the Clinton administration.

She also said the deal reached this week among the United States, the two Koreas, Japan, Russia and host China was not clear on whether Pyongyang would have to destroy its nuclear arsenal, estimated at four to 12 bombs.

She made the comments at the National Press Club as North and South Korean negotiators yesterday announced plans to hold high-level talks later this month, the first tangible result of the nuclear disarmament pact. Cabinet-level meetings on bilateral ties will take place in Pyongyang starting Feb. 27 -- the first such gathering since North Korea conducted missile tests in July.

Top North Korean negotiator Kim Kye-gwan, on his return to Pyongyang yesterday, said the six-party talks had "gone well," Japan's Kyodo News service reported.

"We are ready to implement the results of the meeting," he said.

President Bush, in a White House press conference Wednesday, brushed aside as "flat wrong" conservatives' complaints that the North will pocket promised fuel and food aid from the deal without being required to dismantle its nuclear programs first.

But he echoed Mrs. Park in saying that the North's follow-up moves to the Beijing deal will be crucial.

"Those who say the North Koreans have to prove themselves by actually following through on the deal are right, and I'm one," Mr. Bush said. "This is a good first step."

DOJ_NMG_0133089

One provision that conservatives find particularly troubling could allow North Korea to be removed from a list of terror-sponsoring states. One of Bush's deputy national security advisers, Elliott Abrams, raised alarms about that section in a series of e-mails.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said he spoke with Mr. Abrams and assured him that North Korea will not be removed from the list unless it changes its behavior.

"We've seen conservatives criticizing this provision because they want the same kind of reassurance," Mr. Snow said. "So here it is -- no political deal, it has to be based on facts and performance on the part of the North Koreans."

Joel Wit, who helped negotiate the nuclear-freeze deal with North Korea in 1994 when he was with the State Department, praised the accord but cautioned there were huge question marks hanging over its implementation. They include the fate of the North's nuclear stockpile, Pyongyang's cooperation in disclosing all its nuclear assets and the effectiveness of the five "working groups" set up to implement the deal.

"There is a distinct danger that this deal could collapse," Mr. Wit said.

Mrs. Park's Grand National Party has soared in the polls ahead of the December presidential election as the Uri Party, allied to Mr. Roh, has slumped. Recent polls put the GNP's support at nearly 50 percent, compared with 10 percent for Uri.

In a five-day U.S. visit designed to burnish her international credentials, Mrs. Park will meet with top U.S. officials and reach out to the large, increasingly affluent Korean-American community.

She enjoys high name recognition because of her father, but recent polls put Mrs. Park behind former Seoul Mayor Lee Myung-bak in the race for the GNP nomination. The party will choose its candidate in a primary in June.

On another issue, Mrs. Park said she strongly opposed a plan to transfer wartime command of joint U.S.-South Korean forces from the United States to South Korea, a move scheduled to occur by 2012.

She said the command transfer, coupled with recent cuts in U.S. troop levels on the peninsula, had raised popular fears about the future of the U.S.-South Korean alliance.

Korea nuclear denial

A senior Bush administration official said that one serious shortcoming of the tentative deal on North Korea's nuclear program is that it does not resolve the status of Pyongyang's secret highly enriched uranium (HEU) program.

"North Korea denies having a HEU program and denies making any acquisitions necessary for a production-scale HEU program," the senior official said. "We know they made these acquisitions."

North Korea purchased special metals from Germany used in centrifuges in 2002 through a procurement office based in Shenyang, China. The North Koreans also were part of the centrifuge-technology network headed by Pakistani covert nuclear supplier A.Q. Khan.

The purchases were the basis for the confrontation in October 2002 between State Department official James Kelly and North Korean Deputy Foreign Minister Kang Seok-ju, who admitted that the uranium program had been under way for several years.

The North Koreans then reversed course and began denying that they had the uranium program, a position eventually adopted by both China and Russia.

The U.S. discovery of the HEU program in 2002 was the trigger to the current crisis with North Korea, which ultimately led to the six-party talks among North Korea, the United States, China, Japan, South Korea and Russia.

Rules of engagement

Now that Lt. Gen. David Petraeus is the commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, one of his first jobs will be to clarify what military and defense officials say are vague rules of engagement that govern how U.S. troops can use force to defend themselves.

Gen. Petraeus was asked recently about the problem of the vague rules, which have been discussed at length in this column over the past several weeks. He told a former general during a recent meeting that fixing the rules will be one of his most important priorities.

More evidence of the rules problem comes from an e-mail from an Army E-5 sergeant in Iraq who took issue with the recent letter in The Washington Times written by an Army attorney. The lawyer asserted that the current rules for soldiers were adequate and not confusing.

"I can tell you from personal experience that [the current rules of engagement] don't give us very much leeway with self-defense," wrote the sergeant, a member of a combat service support unit.

DOJ_NMG_0133090

"They tell us in our convoy briefings that we have the right to self-defense, defense for civilians and other coalition forces," the soldier said. "However, I do know that it is hard for soldiers to distinguish when is the proper time to use self-defense and when it is not. Soldiers are scared and they have a right to be. If a higher-up decides what you did was not in self-defense, you could get in major trouble and we feel that it's really not worth it."

In one case, a soldier fired two 5.56 rounds and as a result "had to sit in an office for two days straight and tell his story over and over and fill out a ton of paperwork for doing what he felt was right."

The soldier said after the experience that "he would never fire his weapon again because he felt the aftermath wasn't worth it, and that's just not right."

"The military has gone severely soft in its effort over here and that is why more and more [people] are dying," the sergeant concluded. "They're just too scared to let soldiers think for themselves."

Surge forces

Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker told Congress yesterday that the Army will be able to supply its portion of the 21,500 troops needed for the new "surge" of troops in Baghdad but that there will be some problems with training and equipping the soldiers.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, also said yesterday there are problems equipping the new troops and that equipment is being taken from other units and given to those deploying to Baghdad. Two of the brigades now are in Iraq and one more will be added later this month. Two additional brigades will be added later.

"We've got about 40 percent of all of our equipment that is either currently in Iraq or Afghanistan or in depots for repair, which leaves you about 60 percent of your inventory, which is an enormous amount of equipment," Gen. Pace said.

He acknowledged that "we are moving equipment from some units to those units." However, he insisted that the new troops will be sent "fully trained and have all the equipment that they're required to have, so when we put those soldiers and Marines into combat, they are as well protected and trained as those who they are joining."

Asked if the Army is now "scurrying" to get five brigades geared up to the proper combat readiness for the Iraq deployment, Gen. Schoomaker said:

"I testified previously that I was concerned about the strategic depth in the Army. We're now supplying more; therefore we have an additional challenge on the strategic depth. Obviously, we are not going to put any force in the theater that isn't properly trained and equipped; therefore scurry is a kind word in terms of, you know, the machinations we go through to make this happen."

Gen. Schoomaker said there are "some issues" with preparing the troops but he does not consider them critical problems. "And our estimation is that we will be able to provide the surge forces in the time that the theater has asked for them, and they will be properly trained, led and equipped when they arrive," he said.

The additional troops will have 500 medium and large trucks sent to the region by June to augment the 8,000 trucks currently in the region.

Gen. Schoomaker assured the House Armed Services Committee that every soldier sent into Iraq, both in combat zones and those who stay "inside the wire," will be equipped with what he described as "the very finest body armor that can be manufactured."

Rice Faces Steep Hurdles In New Israeli-Palestinian Peace Drive (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, February 16, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice leaves Friday to host a rare summit between Israeli and Palestinian leaders that she hopes will break new ground in reviving peace negotiations frozen for nearly seven years.

But a political resurrection of the radical Palestinian group Hamas and a flare-up of violence in the disputed city of Jerusalem have cast a shadow over Monday's meeting with Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Rice has in recent months heralded the existence of a "new opening" for progress towards Isreali-Arab peace and the creation of an independent state for Palestinians, and she billed Monday's summit in Jerusalem as a high-profile jump through that breach.

On Thursday, though, her spokesman was lowering expectations for the encounter.

"It's not designed as a set of meetings that is going to result in a formal outcome, it is designed to start a series of conversations", Sean McCormack said.

DOJ_NMG_0133091

Rice's plan, unveiled earlier this month, is to move beyond security issues which have bogged down Israeli-Palestinian negotiations for years and get the two sides also talking about the contours of a future Palestinian state.

Such "final status" issues have not been broached by senior leaders since former president Bill Clinton brought the two sides together at the Camp David retreat in 2000 for negotiations which ultimately failed.

Rice's initiative is designed to bolster the position of Abbas and his secular Fatah party in a power struggle with the Islamist movement Hamas, which gained control of the Palestinian government through January 2006 elections.

The West responded by withholding critical aid and recognition from the government, plunging the Palestinian areas into financial crisis and political deadlock.

Raising final status issues like the borders of a Palestinian state, the future of Jerusalem and the fate of Palestinian refugees, the new US logic goes, will help convince Palestinians that Abbas is better-suited to advancing their cause than Hamas.

But the plan snagged after the Fatah-Hamas power struggle turned violent late last year, leaving more than 100 dead and threatening to plunge the Palestinian territories into civil war.

The bloodshed spurred the two sides into a Saudi-backed power-sharing deal in Mecca last week that would bring Fatah into a unity government still headed by a Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniya.

While the deal has so far tamped down the violence, Hamas has yet to clearly signal a willingness to accept the West's conditions for ending the aid boycott: recognition of Israel's right to exist; a renunciation of violence; and compliance with past Israeli-Palestinian peace accords.

Abbas formally charged Haniya with forming the new government Thursday, and the White House responded by reaffirming that the new cabinet had to meet those conditions to be recognized by the West.

McCormack acknowledged that the Abbas-Hamas deal had complicated Rice's mission.

"Clearly the uncertainties concerning the formation of a possible national unity government have added to the complexity of the situation," he said.

"But if you waited for perfect clarity to all the issue in the Middle East and all those currently unanswered questions, the plane would never take off," he said.

Olmert for his part is under threat from the political right and, according to Israeli commentators, unwilling to even begin tackling thorny final status matters -- potentially leaving Rice with little room to maneuver.

"The gaps separating the Israelis and Palestinians are bigger and more complicated than they've ever been," said Aaron Miller, a former diplomat who advised six previous US secretaries of state on Arab-Israeli negotiations.

Instead of partners for peace ready and willing to make tough compromises, Rice will find Olmert and Abbas, also known as Abu Mazen, weakened by their political struggles at home.

"Olmert and Abu Mazen are not masters of their constituencies, they're prisoners of their own domestic politics," said Miller, now an analyst at Washington's Woodrow Wilson Center.

"That's a bad combination: big issues and weak leaders."

Rice's Mideast Paradox (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Cam Simpson

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will confront a paradoxical question when she arrives this weekend in the Middle East: Is peace among Palestinians bad for potential peace with Israel?

Ms. Rice's trip to Israel comes as the two main Palestinian factions -- the Islamist militant group Hamas and the Fatah party of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas -- are trying to cement a Saudi-brokered unity government. Their aim is to stanch the recent bloodshed between them and to win the financial backing of the outside world.

The budding political alliance between Hamas -- which refuses to recognize Israel's existence or to renounce the use of violence -- and Fatah has thrown a wrench into Ms. Rice's plans to start peace talks between Mr. Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. Until a week ago, when Saudi Arabia jumped in to broker a settlement between the two factions, the Bush administration was arguing that the time was ripe to start talking about a future Palestinian state.

Ms. Rice is sticking to her plans to hold three-way talks Monday with Israeli and Palestinian officials. "You can't wait for the perfect circumstances," she told reporters yesterday on the eve of her trip, adding that it would be a mistake not to keep ties strong with Mr. Abbas and "take advantage of his commitment" to eventual peace with Israel.

Skeptics, including some Israeli officials, are wondering if Ms. Rice is wise to proceed on this trip, especially when the Palestinian political scene is in such turmoil. "We could use some time to sit back and reassess where we are right now," said one Israeli official.

The U.S. itself is sending mixed signals over whether it may be willing to interact with a unity government led by Hamas. Ms. Rice said the U.S. wouldn't take a position on this question until the new government is formed, but U.S. officials in Israel have told the Palestinians that the U.S. would shun the government if it doesn't embrace Israel, renounce violence and agree to abide by previous international peace accords.

Ms. Rice's strategy in the past year has been to embolden Mr. Abbas and his secular Fatah movement, politically and militarily, believing that would force Hamas to yield to better terms for a unity government. Street battles raged between Fatah and Hamas, claiming scores of lives from within the leadership ranks of the warring factions and among Palestinian civilians.

That strategy has apparently failed, as the deal brokered by Saudi Arabia at Mecca last week would seem to require Mr. Abbas and the other U.S.-backed moderates to move closer to the Islamists -- not vice versa.

The Saudi deal, if it holds, also has thrown into question a core premise underlying the U.S.'s regional strategy over recent months. Ms. Rice has portrayed the moment as ripe for progress on the Israeli-Palestinian peace front largely because Sunni Arab states like Saudi Arabia appeared eager to help broker a deal. The U.S. logic was that Iran, and its aid to militant groups like Hamas, had become a greater threat to many Arab states than Israel.

The Saudis, by summoning both Hamas and Fatah to Mecca last week and then offering them $1 billion in aid, have made clear that their main desire is to preserve intra-Palestinian comity while weaning Hamas away from Iran.

Ms. Rice yesterday said she approved of the Saudi effort to stop the fighting. "We want calm between the Palestinians as well," she said.

The U.S. finds itself in a delicate place, facing the possibility it soon could be leading the opposition against a unity government that the Saudis helped put together. Arab states are eager to see the Palestinians end their internecine fighting. If Ms. Rice comes out strongly against the new government, she could create an even-greater backlash against the U.S. across the region and beyond. The U.S. and Israel would largely be alone if they tried hard to scuttle it.

After her talks with Israeli and Palestinian officials, Ms. Rice is scheduled to meet with an assortment of Arab ministers in Jordan before flying Tuesday to Berlin. Talks there, with representatives from the European Union, Russia and the United Nations, will be just as crucial, because the U.S. may have to push hard to keep in place the current international freeze on aid to the Palestinians if a new unity government is formed.

Rice Faces An Uphill Battle For A Mideast Breakthrough (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15 — On a chilly Saturday morning late last year, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, sat down alone in Ms. Rice's apartment at the Watergate here and hashed out a plan.

It was an ambitious one. To jump-start Arab-Israeli peace, Ms. Rice would encourage Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel to start talks with the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, leap-frogging interim details and squabbles, and instead trying to define the big "final status" issues of a Palestinian state, which have bedeviled peace negotiators since the Camp David accords of 1979.

"It's important to start sketching out broader political issues," Ms. Rice said Thursday in a group interview with newspaper correspondents at the State Department.

To some extent, the approach turned the clock back to the closing days of the Clinton administration, when a push toward a final settlement expired. Since then, the Bush administration has engaged the peace effort in fits and starts, and none of the paths has led far.

On Monday, Ms. Rice, Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas are scheduled to sit down in Jerusalem, ostensibly to discuss what Ms. Rice calls horizon issues: the fate of Jerusalem, the borders of a Palestinian state and the question of the treatment of Palestinian refugees.

But the timing could not be worse, American, Israeli and some Palestinian officials said. "If you invited a man from Mars down and asked him, 'Is this the moment to go for a breakthrough?' the answer would be categorically 'No,' " said Aaron David Miller, a scholar at the Woodrow Wilson Center who was a senior adviser for Arab-Israeli relations at the State Department under the last three presidents.

"What she's got going for her is that expectations of her success have plunged lower than the Dead Sea," said David Makovsky, a Middle East expert with the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. And that, he said, "might actually help her."

Prospects for any real breakthrough were already bleak two months ago, when Ms. Rice and Ms. Livni came up with their proposal. The Palestinian government was controlled by Hamas, which preaches Israel's destruction. Mr. Olmert's approval ratings were as bad as, if not worse, than those of President Bush. There was factional strife in Gaza, to the south, and turmoil in Lebanon, to the north.

DOJ_NMG_0133093

Last week, one more giant obstacle emerged: a national unity government of Fatah and Hamas leaders that was worked out in talks brokered by Saudi Arabia in Mecca.

Bush administration officials, publicly lukewarm about the agreement, were angry with Mr. Abbas. They say the pact brings him closer to Hamas instead of bringing Hamas, which America views as a terrorist organization, closer to Mr. Abbas, who is seen as far more moderate.

In her session with reporters on Thursday, Ms. Rice said the task of negotiations had become “obviously more complicated because of the uncertainties surrounding the national unity government,” and that the Bush administration would “await the formation of that government before we make any decisions about it.”

The Bush administration, along with Israel and several European countries, wants the new Palestinian government to meet three benchmarks for normal relations: recognize the right of Israel to exist, forswear violence and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian accords. The Mecca accord does not address the first two benchmarks. The Palestinians argued that the three benchmarks were met implicitly, though the accord does not mention Israel.

While Ms. Rice was angry about the Mecca deal, she said that she would nonetheless go ahead with the planned summit, Arab and American officials said. But she has warned Mr. Abbas that the United States would deal only with Palestinian government ministers who explicitly agreed to the three conditions, the officials said.

So what was supposed to be a summit that shored up Mr. Abbas in the eyes of the Palestinian people by discussing a future Palestinian state may now downgrade to one in which Mr. Abbas spends his time trying to defend the Mecca deal and convince the United States and Israel that he has not sold out to Hamas.

Both Mr. Abbas, who is also known as Abu Mazen, and Mr. Olmert are politically weak, making compromise tricky. “If Olmert agrees to talk about Jerusalem, someone could threaten to leave his government,” said Martin S. Indyk, the United States ambassador to Israel in the Clinton administration. “If Abu Mazen talks about giving up the right of return, Hamas would condemn him for betraying the cause.” He was referring to giving Palestinian refugees the right to return to lands they left in 1948.

Still, Mr. Indyk, who is now the director of the Brookings Saban Center for Middle East Policy, said the Bush administration had let Arab-Israeli peace talks go untended for too long. Ms. Rice, he said, “deserves full support for trying, and she deserves to be given a chance and some rope and leeway to try to make this work.”

Palestinian Power-Sharing Deal Complicates Rice's Mideast Trip (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday that the formation of a Palestinian unity government that includes the Hamas militant group complicates her high-profile peace mission this weekend, strongly suggesting that the new government falls short of standards that would allow a resumption of international aid.

"Our position toward the Hamas government was very clear: It did not meet the international test," Rice told a group of newspaper reporters on the eve of her departure. "I have to say that we have not yet seen any evidence that this one will."

Rice added, "I don't deny that it's more complicated" now and that before the announcement of the unity government "it was clear, more black and white."

With prodding by Saudi Arabia, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas last week reached a deal with his Hamas rivals that would bring Abbas's Fatah party into the government. Yesterday, Abbas formally asked Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, of Hamas, to assemble the next cabinet.

Abbas's move has placed the United States in a quandary because, under Rice's formulation, he is a "mainstream" leader, while Hamas is an "extremist" group that needs to be isolated. The Bush administration has pushed a plan to bolster security forces loyal to Abbas in part because Hamas's security forces have gained strength, but at the same time the administration has said it wants an end to violence between Hamas and Fatah that has left scores dead. The unity accord is intended to end street battles between the factions.

After a weekend of meeting separately with Israeli and Palestinian officials, Rice intends to bring together Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Monday for a lengthy series of talks on the contours of a Palestinian state -- what she calls "the political horizon." She will then travel to Amman, Jordan, for meetings with Arab officials before flying to Berlin. There, she will meet with the other members of the "Quartet" -- Russia, the European Union and the United Nations-- which monitors Middle East peace and sets the conditions on aid to the Palestinians.

Rice's hope is that the "political horizon" will provide a vision for a Palestinian state that will inspire the Palestinians, strengthen Abbas and reduce the influence of anti-Israeli militants such as Hamas. The Palestinian people need to "know what is at stake for them in the future," Rice said. "Without a political horizon, it is going to be difficult to show why this course, the course of Abu Mazen, is better than other courses." Abu Mazen is Abbas's nickname.

Rice also hopes to prod Arab governments to begin the process of recognizing Israel as progress is made with the Palestinians -- a way of strengthening Olmert, who suffers from low public approval ratings. The "political horizon has to include them, and it has to include a relationship between them and Israel," Rice said, referring to Arab states.

Few details of the Palestinian unity agreement have been released, except a vague statement in which Abbas called upon Hamas to "respect international resolutions," which appeared to fall far short of international demands that the new government pledge to recognize Israel, renounce violence and abide by previous agreements signed by the Palestinian Authority. Hamas officials later told reporters that the movement has no intention of ever recognizing Israel.

Abbas aides hoped the unity accord would end the international boycott, but U.S. officials have made it clear in recent days that they will not deal with the new government as long as it does not meet the three conditions. Israeli officials have been very critical of Abbas's decision, saying it sets back the chances of reaching a peace agreement.

In the interview, Rice repeatedly defended Abbas, calling him "someone who has devoted his whole life to nonviolence," and said that no matter what happens with the unity government, the United States will continue to work with him because he has accepted the conditions. "It would be a very big mistake to not continue to deal with him," she said.

Rice said she is traveling to the region because "it is important to inject energy and confidence" in the dealings between Olmert and Abbas. Despite the uncertainty over the new government, "in the Middle East, if you wait for the perfect circumstances, I think you would probably never take the airplane," Rice said. "I am not going to let the fact that the circumstances are not perfect at this particular point in time delay what I think is extremely important work to be done."

Hopes Not High For Mideast Talks (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration's latest Middle East peace initiative, which begins this weekend, is taking place under a cloud of uncertainty because of Israeli anxiety about the complexion of a proposed Palestinian unity government.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will lead an American push to bring together Israeli and Palestinian leaders for the first talks in six years about the eventual shape of a longproposed independent Palestinian state.

But hopes for the U.S. mission have dimmed amid Israeli worries that a new power-sharing Palestinian government, while including more moderates, may not go far enough in rejecting the views of the militant Hamas party leaders who also will play a central role. Many Israelis have indicated they would be reluctant to try to work with such a government.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert declared his intention to cooperate Thursday, but Israeli Cabinet officials and other commentators have spoken pessimistically about the gathering, and some Palestinian Authority officials have expressed their own doubts.

Officials of the Hamas and Fatah movements have said they have a formula for dividing Cabinet positions, including leaving Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas as prime minister. The two sides did not name an interior minister, nor decide who will control the various agencies of the security services.

Rice acknowledged Thursday that the peace mission was "obviously more complicated because of the uncertainties surrounding the unity government." But she signaled that Washington would continue to push for progress by working through its primary ally, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, even if U.S. officials dislike the new Palestinian government.

"In the Middle East, if you wait for the perfect circumstances, you will never take the airplane," Rice said.

Under the Palestinian Authority structure, the president's office is separate from the administrative branches that will be overseen by the new ruling coalition. The United States could still provide aid and political support to Abbas even if the Bush administration decided it could not do business with the remainder of the Palestinian government.

Rice will meet over the weekend in bilateral sessions with Olmert and Abbas, and all three will meet Monday in Jerusalem.

Rice's mission is built around the idea that by renewing discussions of a Palestinian state, she can illustrate to Palestinians the advantages of choosing a moderate path rather than the violent resistance espoused by Hamas.

The administration also is eager to show allied Arab governments that it can make progress on Israeli-Palestinian issues, in hopes of strengthening their cooperation in stabilizing Iraq and resisting the influence of Iran.

But the politically weak Olmert government has been unenthusiastic about peacemaking overtures that could build pressure for Israeli concessions and further weaken its position.

Many Israelis have been wary of the unity Palestinian government, announced Feb. 8 in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, even though it will incorporate moderate and pro-Western Palestinian figures.

Abbas, who is eager to have world powers resume direct aid to the Palestinian Authority, said the Mecca deal committed the government to respect previous agreements. But critics said the Palestinians were not supporting the three principles called for by the diplomatic quartet of the United States, the United Nations, the European Union and Russia: recognizing Israel, repudiating violence and observing past agreements.

Israeli opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu on Monday urged Olmert to cancel the three-way talks in light of the Mecca agreement.

Although Olmert has agreed to go ahead with the talks, Israeli officials in Jerusalem say he does not want to engage in detailed negotiations until he learns directly from Abbas about the power-sharing deal.

For a start, he plans to demand the release of Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit, who was captured in June and is being held by Hamas.

"I think we will have a tough situation to convince Israel to deal with a unity government," said Abbas aide Nabil Amr. "But what can we do? This is what we achieved in Mecca."

The Bush administration denied news reports that U.S. officials privately told Palestinian officials that they would not recognize the new government.

There are also risks that the new government will not survive long. On Thursday, the Cabinet of the former Hamas government formally resigned, a procedural step required to open the way for the new team. But some observers believe the many unresolved issues, and the recent bloodshed between Hamas and Fatah, will make the new government inherently fragile.

A U.S. official defended proceeding with the talks.

"What happens to the government is important, but it doesn't change the ability, or the rationale, of Abbas engaging with the prime minister," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. "Can anyone argue that this will make less sense than it did when Hamas led the government?"

U.S. officials play down their expectations for the three-way meeting, characterizing it as an informal discussion.

2 Palestinian Leaders Meet To Pave Way For A New Cabinet (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

GAZA, Feb. 15 — After months of difficult negotiations and bloody Palestinian street fighting, the Hamasled Palestinian government resigned Thursday to pave the way for a unity government that will include Hamas and the rival Fatah movement.

Prime Minister Ismail Haniya of Hamas submitted his cabinet's resignation on Thursday evening at a meeting with the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, at Mr. Abbas's seaside compound in Gaza City. The agreement is intended to help prevent a resurgence of the internal Palestinian battles that have claimed nearly 100 lives in the Gaza Strip since December.

There was no immediate sign that a new Palestinian government would win a restoration of direct financial assistance that Israel and Western countries cut when Hamas came to power a year ago.

American diplomats told Mr. Abbas, who is from Fatah, that Washington would shun the new government as long as it did not meet several conditions, according to one of Mr. Abbas's top aides, who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

Israel, the United States and the European Union have demanded that the Palestinian government recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous agreements. But with Mr. Haniya set to retain his post in the new government, which will again include many prominent Hamas figures, it appears highly unlikely that the new cabinet will explicitly meet the conditions.

"I am not certain that the full scope of this agreement is clear to anyone," Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, who was in Turkey on Thursday, said on Turkish television. "The initial signs are not very encouraging."

The Bush administration, like the Israeli government, has contacts with Mr. Abbas. But Israel and the United States refuse to deal with Hamas, which they classify as a terrorist organization.

Washington's stance toward a new Palestinian government may be clarified when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice arrives for a meeting with Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas, set for Monday in Jerusalem.

Mr. Abbas seeks a resumption of negotiations with Israel, which collapsed six years ago, several months after the Palestinians began an uprising in September 2000.

"The unity government must be given a chance," said Nabil Abu Rudeineh, a spokesman for Mr. Abbas. "After the formation of the unity government there shouldn't be any excuse for not holding negotiations."

Mr. Haniya's resignation was mostly a formality, as Mr. Abbas immediately asked him to form the new government, which is to be presented to the Palestinian parliament for approval within five weeks.

Hamas will continue to hold the largest number of cabinet posts. Fatah, which refused to take part in the previous government after losing elections to Hamas last year, will have at least a half dozen ministerial portfolios, and other factions and independents will also have posts.

DOJ_NMG_0133096

“Brother Ismail Haniya presented me with his government’s resignation, and I charged him with forming his new cabinet,” Mr. Abbas said Thursday after their meeting. “We call on you to be committed to the high interests of the Palestinian people,” he said to Mr. Haniya.

There was no word on who would hold the key post of interior minister, overseeing several branches of the security forces, including the police. Mr. Abbas is responsible for all other security agencies.

Under a preliminary agreement reached last week in Saudi Arabia, Hamas is to nominate an independent figure to lead the Interior Ministry, and Mr. Abbas can accept or reject the choice. Security force members, some loyal to Fatah, others to Hamas, were deeply involved in the recent Palestinian infighting in Gaza.

Palestinians celebrated in the streets when Hamas and Fatah announced their agreement last week. But on Thursday many expressed doubts about whether a unity government would survive.

Rawya Shawa, an opposition member of the Palestinian parliament, said she would vote to support a unity government, but without much enthusiasm. “In principle I support power-sharing,” she said, “but it won’t be easy for Hamas and Fatah to get along together, and I’m not sure a unity government will last long.”

Hamas And Fatah Act To Clear Way For Palestinian Unity Government (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 15 -- Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, of Hamas, resigned Thursday to make way for a power-sharing government with the rival Fatah party in the hopes of ending factional strife and restoring international aid to the nearly bankrupt Palestinian Authority.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, a Fatah leader, immediately reappointed Haniyeh to assemble the next cabinet. At a news conference in Gaza City, Abbas said he hoped the step would "inaugurate a new Palestinian era in which people live in peace and security."

The next cabinet's composition was set out in an agreement that Abbas and Hamas leaders reached last week in the holy Islamic city of Mecca, Saudi Arabia, although who will fill some of the key ministries has been a point of debate between the two sides for the past few days.

Palestinian officials said they hope the next government will prove acceptable to international donors, who cut off aid to the Palestinian Authority after Hamas's victory in January 2006 parliamentary elections. The win gave Hamas, a radical Islamic movement that does not recognize Israel, effective control of the Palestinian government, which had been run by the secular Fatah party for more than a decade.

The aid embargo and Israel's decision to stop transferring the tax revenue it collects on the Palestinian Authority's behalf have crippled the government and sharpened the longtime rivalry between the two largest political movements in the occupied territories.

The parties' armed wings, as well as security forces loyal to each, have clashed repeatedly over the past year, particularly in the Gaza Strip. More than 100 Palestinians have died in partisan violence in that period, most of them since December, when Abbas threatened to call early elections to end the political stalemate.

The fighting gave way to relief and celebration Feb. 8, when the two sides agreed on the terms of a unity government that gives Hamas nine cabinet seats, Fatah six and some smaller parties four. Haniyeh's cabinet, sworn in last March, included only Hamas members and supporters.

Hamas will keep the post of prime minister but give up several important ministries.

Talks in recent days focused on who would fill those posts, including the top job at the Interior Ministry, which effectively controls some of the most powerful Palestinian security services. Under the agreement, Hamas will nominate an independent candidate, although party officials have resisted the stipulation that Abbas must first approve their choice.

In addition, Hamas and Fatah must agree on an independent candidate to be foreign minister. The consensus choice appears to be Ziad Abu Amr, a longtime mediator between the parties who won his parliamentary seat as an independent with Hamas's backing. Abbas also reportedly wants Mohammed Dahlan, a senior Fatah official who has enormous influence within the security services, to be deputy prime minister. Dahlan is loathed by Hamas for the violent crackdown he led against the group in Gaza during the 1990s.

"These questions will be resolved in the course of putting the government together," said Saeb Erekat, a Fatah lawmaker and the chief Palestinian negotiator with Israel. "Internally speaking, we're moving in the right direction. But will this program solve our problems with the international community? That's the key question."

Haniyeh has five weeks to assemble the cabinet, which under the terms of the accord will "respect" agreements with Israel signed by the Fatah-dominated Palestine Liberation Organization.

DOJ_NMG_0133097

But Hamas officials have made clear that the new government will not recognize Israel's right to exist, a condition international donors have set for the resumption of aid.

The United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations -- known as the Quartet -- had previously demanded that Hamas recognize Israel, renounce violence and abide by previous agreements in return for aid.

Neither Israel nor the Quartet has taken a formal position on the next government's platform, which will be a major point of discussion during meetings this weekend among visiting Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Abbas.

Palestinian Deal Complicates Work Toward Peace, Rice Says (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday that her efforts to broker an Israeli-Palestinian peace have been complicated by an agreement by feuding Palestinian factions to form a joint government.

Rice said the Bush administration had not rejected the Cabinet being formed by the secular Fatah and militant Hamas movements. But she said there is no sign the new government would recognize Israel — as demanded by the administration and the Israeli government.

Rice leaves Friday for the Middle East. She is to meet Monday in Jerusalem with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

Agreement to form the government was reached Feb. 8 in Saudi Arabia. Hamas did not renounce violence or affirm Israel's right to exist. Those are conditions for U.S. recognition and aid.

The Bush administration has sought to bolster Fatah and its leader, Abbas, by holding talks to begin to sketch the contours of a Palestinian state. Rice said she was going ahead with the meeting with Abbas and Olmert.

"In the Middle East, if you wait for perfect circumstances, you would never take the airplane," she said.

Abbas, Rice said, has a record of opposing violence and recognizing Israel. "It would be a very big mistake not to continue to deal with him," she said.

Robert Satloff, director of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said the prospect of a Fatah-Hamas government made chances for a peace agreement unlikely. Abbas "has chosen internal unity over the potential for diplomatic progress," Satloff said.

Weak leadership on both the Palestinian and Israeli sides, along with the growing influence of Iran and Syria, also undermine chances for success, said Aaron Miller, a Middle East adviser to six former secretaries of State.

"You can't build the house if the foundation is not put together in a sound way," he said.

Rice Wary Of Mideast Peace Trip (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday that the "uncertainty" of the new Palestinian government will complicate her peace mission in the Middle East next week and that Washington will not support the future Cabinet unless it recognizes Israel.

Miss Rice made her comments hours after Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas formally asked Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of the Hamas militant group to form the next government after last week's agreement between Hamas and Mr. Abbas' Fatah faction in Saudi Arabia.

"It's more complicated with the horizon of a government we don't yet know what its character will be, but in the Middle East, if you wait for the perfect circumstances, I think you'll probably never take an airplane," Miss Rice, who leaves for the region today, told a small group of newspaper reporters.

"The efforts to try and get the Palestinians to live at peace, to stop fighting ... is something that we understand and will support," she said. "Whether or not we can then support the government that came out of that, I think we've been very clear: The Quartet principles will have to be respected."

Those principles of the international mediators -- the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations -- are renouncing violence and accepting the Palestinians' previous international agreements, as well as recognizing Israel.

Miss Rice said that when she meets with Mr. Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Monday, they will "begin a conversation" about "moving forward" toward a Palestinian state.

She will meet with them separately over the weekend and also will hold talks with King Abdullah II of Jordan and other Arab leaders in Amman, Jordan.

DOJ_NMG_0133098

On her return, the secretary will stop in Berlin for a Quartet meeting on Wednesday.

Mr. Abbas also urged Hamas yesterday to accept the Quartet's conditions so the West can lift a ban on financial assistance for the Palestinians.

That ban contributed to the inability of Hamas' first government, which emerged from last year's elections, to provide some basic services to the Palestinian people and even pay the salaries of some civil servants.

The United States and Europe have said Hamas, which they have designated as a terrorist organization, has to make a choice between terrorism and being a political party that fulfills its election promises.

Aides to Mr. Abbas were quoted by wire reports as saying C. David Welch, assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, warned Mr. Abbas during a telephone conversation yesterday that Washington would not deal with members of the new government -- even those from Fatah -- unless it meets the Quartet conditions.

The aides also said that Jacob Walles, the U.S. consul-general in Jerusalem, delivered the same message to Mr. Abbas in person at a meeting in the West Bank town of Ramallah. The consulate confirmed the meeting took place but did not disclose its content.

Miss Rice declined to discuss private exchanges, though she said the administration's message is the same in public and in private.

She also said that the United States will continue to deal with Mr. Abbas because he has demonstrated that he respects the Quartet's principles.

The administration has pledged $86 million in aid for Mr. Abbas' security forces, but Rep. Nita M. Lowey, New York Democrat and chairwoman of the House Appropriations Committee, has blocked the funding.

"Early last week, I placed a hold on the $86 million," she said yesterday. "It is imperative that we have a fuller understanding of exactly what the funding is for and what the situation is on the ground."

Defense Chief Again Says U.S. Will Not Wage War With Iran (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15 — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said Thursday that the United States had no intention of attacking Iran and that any American military efforts against it would be confined to Iraq to disrupt the smuggling of bomb-making materials over the border.

“For the umpteenth time, we are not looking for an excuse to go to war with Iran,” he said at a Pentagon news conference. “We are not planning a war with Iran.”

Even if the Bush administration were able to establish that Iran’s top leaders knew and authorized the smuggling, Mr. Gates said, there would probably be no change in the Bush administration’s strategy of limiting its military response to actions within Iraq.

Questions about the administration’s intentions toward Iran have re-emerged in recent days after senior officials, beginning last weekend, laid out what they said was evidence that bomb-making materials from Iran were being supplied to Shiite militants in Iraq.

Mr. Gates and Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, repeated Thursday that weapons used against American troops were coming from Iran and that personnel from the Quds Force, a paramilitary arm of the country’s Revolutionary Guards, were involved.

But both officials said, as President Bush did at a White House news conference on Wednesday, that they lacked evidence that Iran’s top leaders were involved in the weapons smuggling.

“Whether or not more senior political leaders in Iran know, we don’t know,” Mr. Gates told reporters in the Pentagon. “Frankly, for me, either way it’s a worry.”

General Pace ignited some controversy earlier this week while visiting Indonesia, when he told reporters that American forces had confirmed that some bomb materials found inside Iraq were made in Iran, but “that does not translate that the Iranian government, per se, for sure, is directly involved in doing this.”

Those remarks conflicted with comments by a senior Defense Department analyst who said, at a briefing in Baghdad over the weekend, that the effort was being directed “from the highest levels of the Iranian government.”

Asked about the discrepancy, General Pace said Thursday that the analyst in Baghdad “didn’t make a clear enough break between fact and assessment” when he said there was high-level Iranian involvement, “or those listening didn’t hear the break between fact and assessment.”

DOJ_NMG_0133099

Mr. Gates said he was sensitive to the public skepticism about American intelligence claims as a result of faulty prewar intelligence about Iraq. He said he insisted that the statements about Iranian weapons smuggling “make it exactly clear what we know and what we don’t know.”

In an interview on Thursday, the speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, said the United States could not invade Iran without specific Congressional authority.

“The president has said that he supports a diplomatic solution of the situation in Iran,” Ms. Pelosi said, speaking to six reporters in her office. “I would take him at his word. I do believe that Congress should assert itself, though, and make it very clear that there is no previous authority for any president to go into Iran.”

Iran Provided Bombs, Pentagon Says (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 16, 2007

Senior defense and military leaders said yesterday that Iran's government is behind the providing of deadly bombs to Iraqi insurgents, although it is difficult to say whether senior Iranian leaders approved the shipments.

"We know that the Quds force is involved. We know the Quds force is a paramilitary arm of the [Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps (IRGC)], so we assume that the leadership of the IRGC knows about this," Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates told reporters.

"Whether or not more senior political leaders in Iran know about it, we don't know," he said. "And frankly, for me, either way it's a worry. Either they do know and have approved it, or they don't know and the IRGC may be acting on their own in Iraq."

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, qualified earlier comments that he doubted high-level Iranian government linkage to special armor-piercing bombs and rockets found in Iraq.

"What I tried to say when I said I didn't know about the Iranian government, I'm talking about the top two or three people in the government," Gen. Pace said, noting that "we do not have proof that the senior leadership in Iran is directing these activities in Iraq."

The level of Iranian government involvement is secondary to the danger the arms pose to U.S. and coalition forces, he said.

"We know that there are explosives and weapons being used inside of Iraq that were manufactured in Iran," Gen. Pace said.

Also, on two occasions during operations to attack networks supplying improvised bombs, "we had policed up Iranians," he said. "We know that those Iranians are Quds force members. Those are facts."

The comments came after a senior defense official in Baghdad said Sunday that the Iranian arms shipments -- including shaped charge explosives, shoulder-fired missiles and armor-piercing rockets -- had been directed by the highest levels of the Iranian government.

Mr. Gates also cautiously defended the tentative nuclear deal with North Korea, saying it is "a very important first step."

"The timelines are very tight ... we're talking months, not years for actions that have to be taken," he said. "I think that if the deal is structured in a way that we will be able to monitor compliance before the United States or the other countries have had to do very much, in terms of whether the North Koreans are complying with the agreement that they've signed."

Critics of the accord, including former U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton, have said the agreement makes too many concessions to North Korea.

Asked what steps were being taken to stop the flow of Iranian weapons, Mr. Gates said there is a major effort under way to disrupt the supply networks.

"The explosively formed projectiles are a real problem because they're so lethal," he said. "But the fact is that a bigger problem is the [improvised explosive device] problem in general, and those are coming from a lot of sources, including from inside Iraq."

The Iranian-supplied armor-piercing IED are a relatively small percentage of the homemade bombs, he said.

"So our focus is more broadly on disrupting these IED networks throughout Iraq," he said. "The Iranian responsibility for one set of them is a concern. We are taking action to try to deal with that, but it's part of a much larger problem."

On reports that Iraqi Shi'ite militia leader Muqtada al-Sadr has fled to Iran, Mr. Gates said there is no proof he is there but that as a result of current stepped-up operations in Baghdad "these guys will go to ground."

Gen. Pace was asked about the release of U.S. Central Command documents from the start of the Iraq war and said one assumption that turned out wrong was the collapse of the Iraqi army.

"One assumption was that the Iraqi army, once freed of Saddam's dictatorship, would become a force of good for the people and that it would be a standing army at the time of liberation," Gen. Pace said. "As you know, it disintegrated in the very early hours of the fight, and therefore there was no army of some 400,000 Iraqis who were able to then provide security for their country."

Pelosi: Bush Lacks Power To Invade Iran (AP)

By David Espo

AP, February 16, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Thursday that President Bush lacks the authority to invade Iran without specific approval from Congress, a fresh challenge to the commander in chief on the eve of a symbolic vote critical of his troop buildup in Iraq.

Pelosi, D-Calif., noted that Bush consistently said he supports a diplomatic resolution to differences with Iran "and I take him at his word."

At the same time, she said, "I do believe that Congress should assert itself, though, and make it very clear that there is no previous authority for the president, any president, to go into Iran."

Pelosi spoke in an interview in the Capitol as lawmakers plowed through a third day of marathon debate in the House on a nonbinding measure opposing the administration's plan to increase troop strength in Iraq — and as Democrats readied a more provocative challenge to the president.

That included drafting legislation to require the Pentagon to meet certain standards for training and equipping the troops, as well fixing the time that military units must be given at home between deployments. "That stops the surge (in troops) for all intents and purposes, because .....they cannot sustain the deployment," said Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, who said he would attach the conditions to legislation providing nearly $100 billion for the military.

Republicans quickly fired back. Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the GOP leader, issued a statement saying the plan would "pull the rug out from under American troops in the combat zone by cutting off their reinforcements and forcing them to face the enemy without our full support."

Across the Capitol, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid unexpectedly announced plans to hold a test vote on Saturday on the same nonbinding measure critical of the troop increase that was making its way through the House.

Partisan bickering has prevented a Senate vote so far, with Republicans insisting on equal treatment for an alternative that rules out the "elimination or reduction of funds for troops in the field."

Pelosi and other Democrats have said approval on the nonbinding measure would mark the first step in an effort by the new Democratic-controlled Congress to force Bush to change course in a war that has killed more than 3,100 U.S. troops.

Bush administration officials and their allies are resigned to House passage of the resolution and have worked in recent days to hold down defections by GOP lawmakers.

But Bush, who has challenged lawmakers not to cut off funds for the troops, took a swipe at his critics during the day.

"This may become the first time in the history of the United States Congress that it has voted to send a new commander into battle and then voted to oppose his plan that is necessary to succeed in that battle," the president said.

The Senate unanimously confirmed Lt. Gen David Petraeus last week to take over as the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

Bush said at a news conference Wednesday there is no doubt the Iranian government is providing armor-piercing weapons to kill American troops in Iraq. But he backed away from claims the top echelon of Iran's government was responsible.

Administration critics have accused the president of looking for a pretense to attack the Islamic republic, which is also at loggerheads with the United Nations about what Tehran says is a nuclear program aimed at developing energy for peaceful purposes.

Defending U.S. intelligence that has pinpointed Iran as a hostile arms supplier in Iraq, Bush said, "Does this mean you're trying to have a pretext for war? No. It means I'm trying to protect our troops."

Bush has asked Congress to approve $100 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Congressional Democrats are hoping to insert provisions that would make it harder for the administration to follow through on its plan to deploy an additional 21,500 combat troops to Iraq.

Murtha, in a video aired on movecongress.org, a coalition of groups opposed to the war, said his proposals were designed with the safety and protection of the troops in mind.

The Pennsylvania Democrat also said the measure may be changed to prohibit any military action against Iran without specific congressional approval.

Asked about Murtha's remarks, Pelosi said, "I fully support that." She added that she would propose it as stand-alone legislation if it is not included in the bill that provides more money for the Iraq war.

Bush has said he intends to go ahead with the troop buildup regardless of nonbinding expressions of disapproval in Congress.

But, Pelosi said, "I don't think that the president can completely ignore it."

DOJ_NMG_0133101

She spoke down the hall from the House chamber, where Republicans and Democrats alternated turns at the microphone in a debate on the war.

"The enemy wants our men and women in uniform to think their Congress doesn't care about them," said Rep. Sam Johnson, R-Texas, who was a prisoner of war during Vietnam. "We must learn from our mistakes. We cannot leave a job undone like we left in Korea, like we left in Vietnam, like we left in Somalia," Johnson said.

Added Rep. Geoff Davis, R-Ky., a West Point graduate who was a flight commander with the Army's 82nd Airborne: "This nonbinding resolution serves no purpose other than pacifying the Democrats' political base and lowering morale in our military."

When his turn came to speak, Rep. Lloyd Doggett, D-Texas., said, "There is a better way of protecting our troops than sending more of them to be killed."

Rep. James Clyburn of South Carolina, a member of the Democratic leadership, said the victory to be won in Iraq "is not a military conquest."

"The victory we seek is earned through the restoration of America's role as peacemaker, not warmonger," he said.

Japan Freezes Assets Related To Iran (AFP)

AFP, February 16, 2007

The Japanese government has decided to freeze the assets of 10 groups and 12 individuals related to Iran's nuclear and missile programmes, under a UN sanction resolution approved in December.

"We must execute the measures with a determined will and resolve because (the Iranian nuclear problem) affects the nuclear non-proliferation regime and North Korea's nuclear problem," foreign minister Taro Aso told reporters after the cabinet approved the measures.

The cabinet of Prime Minister Shinzo Abe also decided to ban transfer of funds in connection with Iran's sensitive nuclear and ballistic missile programmes.

The measures will become effective Saturday.

Japan, despite being a close US ally, has maintained close trade ties with Iran. Asia's largest economy is almost entirely dependent on the Middle East for its oil, and imports about 15 percent of its total oil consumption from Iran.

Last year, the UN Security Council unanimously approved a resolution imposing sanctions that target Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programmes.

Aso called on Iran to stop its uranium enrichment activities and return to the negotiating table before and after the passage of the resolution.

Western countries backed the sanctions, fearing Iran could use uranium enrichment activities to develop nuclear weapons.

Iran, which says its programme is for peaceful purposes, vowed to expand its enrichment.

Iran's Smoking Guns (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

Following the weekend intelligence disclosures about Iranian-supplied weapons killing GIs in Iraq, we predicted Tuesday that "a large part of Washington will pretend the evidence doesn't exist, or suggest the intelligence isn't proven, or claim that it's all the Bush Administration's fault for 'bullying' Iran." Sure enough, President Bush faced a barrage of questions Wednesday wondering whether senior Iranian leaders were really aware of the weapons transfers, whether he was using "faulty intelligence," and whether the disclosures were part of a strategy designed to "provoke Iran."

So here is the state of our public discourse: American military officials present prima facie evidence of Iranian weapons implicated in killing 170 U.S. soldiers and wounding 600 more, and Washington's main concern is not for the GIs but in refighting the last intelligence war.

Well, here's an item that doesn't seem to have been manufactured by Dick Cheney. According to a report in Britain's Daily Telegraph, U.S. forces in Baghdad have recently discovered 100 high-powered sniper rifles made by Austrian gun-maker Steyr-Mannlicher. The .50-caliber Steyr can accurately fire an armor-piercing round at a range of 1,500 meters. The weapon is good against Humvees, helicopters and body armor.

In 2004, Iran purchased some 800 Steyrs, allegedly for use against drug traffickers. At the time, both U.S. and British officials urged the Austrian government to bar the $15 million sale, fearing the weapons would fall into enemy hands. Former Austrian Chancellor Wolfang Schüssel thought otherwise, and let the deal go forward. To better grease the skids, then-Steyr-Mannlicher CEO Wolfgang Fürlinger made the case that the weapons were basically harmless and that Tehran had signed "end-user certificates" guaranteeing they would not be re-sold, according to the German newsweekly Der Spiegel.

Today, the Austrian government pleads that the sale had been "checked very thoroughly," and that "what happened to the weapons . . . is the responsibility of the Iranians" -- which prompts the question of why the Austrians would have bothered with the end-user certificates. The Bush Administration took a less cavalier view and in 2005 banned Steyr-Mannlicher from bidding for U.S. government contracts.

It remains to be confirmed whether the serial numbers on the Steyrs found in Iraq match those from the 2004 sale -- if they do, it ought to prompt a top-to-bottom review of all Austrian military contracts. Meantime, is it too much to expect American journalists and Members of Congress to devote as much skepticism to Iran's motives and behavior as they do to Mr. Bush's?

Egypt Cracks Down On Muslim Brotherhood (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack And Noha El Hennawy

The Los Angeles Times, February 16, 2007

CAIRO — Egypt's regime is seizing upon a moment of regional chaos and U.S. inattention to crack down aggressively on the country's most popular opposition group and shore up its hold on power, analysts here say.

In a bald push against the Muslim Brotherhood, the secular government in recent weeks has arrested hundreds of activists, unveiled new restrictions on political Islam and published a stream of anti-Brotherhood propaganda in the state-run media. More than 80 members were jailed on Thursday alone, Brotherhood officials said.

"This is the most brutal campaign against the Brothers since [Egyptian President Hosni] Mubarak came to power," said Amr Shobaki, a political analyst and Muslim Brotherhood expert at the Al Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo.

With the U.S. distracted by the war in Iraq and increasingly nervous about the regional rise of political Islam, Mubarak's regime appears free to squeeze the Brotherhood, which has long been officially outlawed — though tolerated — as an Islamist opposition force.

About 300 Brotherhood members have been imprisoned of late, including at least 100 senior activists. Some of the prisoners' assets were frozen by order of the government. Meanwhile, Egyptian officials and their media mouthpieces have accused the group of creating armed militias and receiving aid from Iran.

"The banned Muslim Brotherhood group is dangerous to Egypt's security," Mubarak told an Egyptian newspaper in a recent interview. If the group gets more powerful, "investments will stop and unemployment will increase…. Egypt will be completely isolated from the rest of the world."

Brotherhood activists have seen a severe shrinking of leeway since 2005, when they stunned the country by capturing one-fifth of the parliamentary seats in national elections. Back then, U.S. officials said the invasion of Iraq would deliver democracy to the Arab world, and Egyptian officials portrayed the empowerment of Brotherhood members as a necessary step toward democratization.

"Democracy cannot progress in Egypt without deciding what to do with them," a ruling party official said at the time.

But voting has empowered Islamists across the board: Hamas in the Palestinian territories, Hezbollah in Lebanon, Iranian-backed Shiite parties in Iraq, in addition to the Muslim Brotherhood.

Egypt is a major recipient of U.S. aid and a partner in a chilly, often contentious peace with Israel. Mubarak's struggle to appease his allies, hold on to power and tamp down the popular Brotherhood has long been considered a litmus test of Islamist strength across the region.

Not its first battle

Formed in the 1920s to advocate Islam and oppose secular and Western influence, the Brotherhood has a history of battling Egypt's governments. With its vast network of social services, it is deeply popular among religious Egyptians who regard it as a non-corrupt answer to cronyism and decadence. Mubarak has controlled Egypt for a quarter of a century, permitting virtually no dissent. As the one movement he hasn't been able to squelch, the Brotherhood is his nemesis. At the same time, it allows Mubarak and his inner circle to justify their repressive style of rule by claiming that the only other option is an Islamist state administered by the Brotherhood.

The elections played neatly into that argument. Many analysts here believe the Bush administration began to back away nervously from its democracy push when it saw Islamists winning at the polls across the Middle East.

Egypt's hand also has been strengthened by the instability in Iraq and the Palestinian territories, conflicts that have forced the United States to call on powerful Sunni allies in Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Jordan for diplomatic and political backing.

Nabil Abdel Fattah, an analyst at the Al Ahram Center, said the war in Iraq "has given more weight to the Egyptian foreign policy, which will give the government leeway in dealing with the Muslim Brotherhood."

"The regional and international atmospheres have become convenient," Fattah said. "Attacks against the group will continue in order to send strong messages."

A criminal court acquitted several prominent Brotherhood detainees last month, but they were immediately returned to prison while their cases were sent to military court.

DOJ_NMG_0133103

In the most startling and incendiary charge, the Egyptian government has begun to accuse the Brotherhood of forming and training underground militias. In news stories short on details, officials say they have seized documents proving that the Brotherhood has secret cells dedicated to provoking civil disobedience.

The accusations mark a serious departure from the status quo between the regime and the Brotherhood, considered the only opposition group with any serious street popularity.

The old understanding was simple: The Brotherhood was officially outlawed but treated with grudging tolerance. The group didn't try to overthrow the government, and in exchange, the regime looked the other way when the movement slipped its leaders into parliament by running them as "independents."

Trying new strategies

Lately, the mounting pressure seems to have pitched the group into crisis, forcing it to cast about for ways to cement its foothold in the government.

Brotherhood leaders have taken pains to tailor their words for an intellectual, even Westernized, audience. Their speeches are carefully moderate, scrupulously tolerant and reverent toward democracy.

Seeking to calm fears that it would morph into another Taliban if it gained power, the group has reached out to Egyptian Christians. Seeking to ease concern about women's rights, it fielded a female candidate in last year's elections. (She lost.) And in an improbable move, a Brotherhood leader recently told The Times that the Islamic head scarf was a choice for women, not an obligation.

But the group's quest for credibility has been badly undercut by a series of public relations disasters.

Brotherhood lawmakers raged in parliament after Culture Minister Farouk Hosni told a female reporter that the head scarf was a sign of "backwardness" and "regression." They demanded that Hosni be replaced by someone who "respects the constitution and the Islamic Sharia," and they called unanimously for a no-confidence vote. Veiled women marched in protest; clerics issued a storm of condemnations.

Though the uproar eventually died down, it left feminists and secular-leaning Egyptians more leery than ever about the Brotherhood. The hubbub also fed the perception that Brotherhood lawmakers have neglected the issues of poverty and housing in favor of showy campaigns to advertise their Islamist credentials.

Abdel Moneim Abul Fotouh, a Brotherhood leader, defended the group's record in parliament. Members have done their best to chip away at a repressive government, he said at his office near downtown Cairo.

"The problem is, we work under a despotic, corrupt regime that doesn't really care about the members of parliament, that only cares about the ruling elite," Fotouh said.

Student demonstration

But the woes in parliament were nothing compared with the scandal that erupted at Al Azhar University, the storied seat of Sunni Muslim learning.

In December, young men from the Brotherhood's student group dressed in black and staged a military-style parade, complete with martial arts demonstrations, to protest restrictions on student political activities at Al Azhar. The action shocked a nation where public demonstrations have been banned since President Anwar Sadat was shot dead by soldiers in a 1981 military procession, and it fueled fear that the Brotherhood might have secret militias.

"This militia show defied the state and contradicted all the peaceful ideas the Muslim Brotherhood talks about," Fattah said.

Brotherhood leader Fotouh dismissed the students' spectacle as a meaningless display and said the government had inflated the event's importance to harm the group's reputation.

"They were just amusing themselves by putting on this show," he said. "The regime brought the media to cover it to use against the Muslim Brotherhood."

Despite the tension, or perhaps in reaction to it, the Brotherhood has announced that members are drawing up a political platform for a party. Although the regime is unlikely to consider giving the group a license, the move is widely seen as an attempt to continue the Brotherhood's push into mainstream politics.

"What we're really afraid of is to have a popular explosion in Egypt due to corruption, unemployment and poverty," Fotouh said. "If we don't work on rescuing our nation, this can happen."

Russia Threatens To Quit Arms Treaty (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo, Neil Buckley, Daniel Dombey And Jan Cienski

Financial Times, February 16, 2007

Russia threatened on Thursday to pull out of a landmark nuclear arms control treaty unless the US backed away from plans to install its missile defence shield in Eastern Europe.

DOJ_NMG_0133104

Yury Baluyevsky, the Russian army chief of staff, said Moscow might unilaterally withdraw from the 1987 Intermediate-range Nuclear Forces treaty, which forced the US and the Soviet Union to ban nuclear and conventional ground-launched ballistic and cruise missiles with ranges of 500 to 5,500km.

There was "convincing evidence" for leaving the agreement because "many countries are developing and perfecting medium-range rockets", he said.

But the general also explicitly linked Russia's stance to the US's plans to extend its missile defence into central Europe.

The Pentagon is preparing to start negotiations with Poland and the Czech Republic about hosting missile interceptors and radars. Jaroslaw Kaczynski, Polish prime minister, on Thursday expressed conditional support for participating in the system.

A senior Pentagon official said the US would "resist" the Russian move, which he said would have serious implications for American allies in Europe.

The INF treaty includes the right for a party to withdraw with six months' notice if "extraordinary events ... jeopardised its supreme interests". The State Department said Russia had not formally notified the US of any move to abrogate the treaty.

Gen Baluyevsky's comments came days after Vladimir Putin, Russian president, warned that US attempts to deploy part of its missile shield in Poland could spark a new arms race.

Mr Putin said the INF treaty was no longer in its interests because of proliferation of short and medium-range missiles. He rejected US assertions that the system was aimed at countries such as North Korea and Iran, not at Russia.

The US official said Russia had privately told the US it wanted medium-range missiles to counter Iranian threats while arguing publicly that the lack of Iranian missiles meant the US did not need a defence system.

Col-Gen Leonid Ivashov, a former senior Russian defence official, said Moscow had "every reason" to pull out of the treaty. He pointed to the US withdrawal in 2002 from the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile treaty.

Yuri Solomonov, director of the Moscow Institute of Thermal Technology, which manufactures missiles, told Itar-Tass news agency Russia was ready to resume production of medium-range ballistic missiles.

Nato officials said Russia intended to pressure Poland and the Czech Republic to reject US plans, but added that what Moscow really wanted was to be included in a European-wide anti-missile system.

"We are already talking to the Russians about co-operating on tactical missile defence for armies in the field," said a senior Nato diplomat.

Russian Leader Expands Powers Of A Possible Successor (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 15 -- President Vladimir Putin promoted Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov to the post of first deputy prime minister Thursday, an elevation that immediately intensified speculation that Putin might favor him as his successor.

"Ivanov has been coping and coping well with the day-to-day tasks of the Defense Ministry," Putin said at a televised government meeting where he announced the promotion as part of a government reshuffle. "Given the expansion of his powers, Ivanov will no longer be able to keep the post of defense minister."

Ivanov, 54, will now be charged with overseeing Russia's military-industrial complex as well as part of the civilian economy. He was recently put in charge of consolidating and revitalizing Russia's aviation industry.

"In terms of the succession, this is definitely another step for Ivanov," said Olga Kryshtanovskaya, director of the Moscow-based Center for the Study of Elites, in an interview. "He will become a less parochial and more universal figure for the public. And that is essential if he is to become president."

Ivanov bade farewell to senior Defense Ministry staff in a ceremony Thursday night. "I remember well how Vladimir Vladimirovich introduced me in this same hall six years ago," he said, using Putin's first two names. "A long time, but it now seems like one moment. I want to thank you all for backing me."

But for all the apparent nostalgia, the new brief allows Ivanov to shed a ministry fraught with political risk because of the Russian military's propensity to generate scandals, particularly the violent hazing of young recruits. The death of a young conscript last year and Ivanov's slowness in responding to it briefly galvanized public opinion against him.

Ivanov's new position puts him on the same level in government as Dmitri Medvedev, who is also a first deputy prime minister and chairman of the energy conglomerate Gazprom. The two men now appear to be in an open contest for Putin's nod -- the decisive factor in determining who will become president in elections in March 2008.

Putin said this month that he will make his choice known during the campaign early next year. Because of his huge popularity and standing with voters, his endorsement will certainly swing the job to his preferred candidate, according to numerous opinion polls and analysts here.

Russian officials, including Ivanov, have rejected claims that Putin will simply anoint a successor who will be rubber-stamped through a controlled election.

"We won't have any successors or crown princes," Ivanov said last week at an international security conference in Munich, where Putin launched a blistering attack on U.S. foreign policy. "Who will be the president of Russia is for the Russian people to decide in the March 2008 elections. In this respect Russia does not differ from any other democracy in the world."

Like Putin, Ivanov had a long career as a KGB official. In private meetings, he displays a low-key toughness that is similar to the president's. He speaks English fluently, having lived for several months with a family in London as a student. He also speaks Swedish and reportedly served in Sweden. But as with many aspects of his 20 years in foreign intelligence, it is unclear exactly where he served.

Both Ivanov and Medvedev have ties to the president that reach back to their mutual home town, St. Petersburg. Medvedev, a 41-year-old lawyer, worked with Putin in city hall in St. Petersburg in the early 1990s. There they formed a bond that led Putin to bring Medvedev into the presidential administration in Moscow.

Ivanov and Putin both served in the Leningrad Directorate of the KGB, although Putin and Ivanov have said they did not know each other very well at the time. Since Putin first moved to Moscow in 1996, initially to take an administrative position in the Kremlin, the two have become increasingly close. In August 1998, Ivanov became deputy director of the FSB, the internal security agency, which Putin headed at the time.

In November 1999, Ivanov moved to the Kremlin on the recommendation of Putin, then prime minister, to become secretary of the Security Council. And in 2001, Putin appointed him defense minister, the first non-military person to head the ministry.

After President Boris Yeltsin abruptly resigned and Putin became acting president, he was asked who on his team he trusted. "Trust? Sergei Ivanov," he replied, as related in the question-and-answer book "First Person: An Astonishingly Frank Self-Portrait by Russia's President," based on 24 hours of interviews with him by a panel of Russian journalists.

Ivanov is widely believed to be less ensnared than Medvedev in the opaque but fierce rivalries of different interest groups around Putin in the Kremlin and could emerge as an acceptable alternative for those against Medvedev's candidacy, according to some analysts.

Igor Sechin, another St. Petersburg native, who is a Kremlin official as well as chairman of Rosneft, a Gazprom rival, is reported to oppose Medvedev. Sechin is said to lead a Kremlin faction that represents the interests of security service members who would like to see Putin stay on for a third term. That is barred by the constitution and has been ruled out by the president.

"Putin's main aim is to keep stability, and if Medvedev becomes president there will be a fight," said Aleksey Mukhin, general director of the Center for Political Information, in an interview. "Sergei Ivanov, I believe, is stronger. He has very good relations with other groups, including Sechin. He can ensure stability."

As defense minister, Ivanov established a reputation as a hawk, albeit one still able to charm his Western interlocutors. He has opposed expansion of the NATO alliance, clashed with the pro-Western leadership in neighboring Georgia and opposed U.S. plans to build a missile defense system in Eastern Europe.

He was replaced as defense minister by Anatoly Serdyukov, the head of Russia's tax service.

Putin, Promoting An Ally, Fuels Speculation Over Successor (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 15 — President Vladimir V. Putin on Thursday added intrigue to the unsettled but widely debated question of who might succeed him as Russia's leader in 2008 when he promoted his minister of defense in an unexpected cabinet tinkering.

Sergei B. Ivanov, a former K.G.B. officer who became the first civilian to lead the country's military in 2001, will now serve as a first deputy prime minister, giving him expanded duties. He will have the same rank in government and title as another closely watched contender, Dmitri A. Medvedev.

The two men, who are friends and close aides from Mr. Putin's hometown, St. Petersburg, have emerged as the leading candidates to replace Mr. Putin when he completes a second and — by law — final term after presidential elections scheduled for March 2008.

The move, which went largely unexplained like most of Mr. Putin's actions, is certain to intensify speculation over which of the two might have the upper hand for Mr. Putin's endorsement. That would be a virtual guarantee of election, given his popularity and the centralized control of politics here.

Since Mr. Putin's last significant cabinet reshuffling in November 2005, Mr. Medvedev had nominally been Mr. Ivanov's superior in the government. Mr. Medvedev also serves as chairman of the Russian energy giant, Gazprom.

DOJ_NMG_0133106

"I think it is the formulation of the two candidates for the presidency of the Russian Federation in 2008," said Sergei A. Markov, director of the Institute of Political Studies, who works closely with the Kremlin.

Mr. Putin also moved to settle a struggle for control of Chechnya, the southern republic where Russian forces have largely crushed a separatist movement in two wars since 1994. Appearing on television later Thursday night, Mr. Putin accepted the resignation of Chechnya's president, Alu D. Alkhanov, and appointed him a deputy justice minister.

With Mr. Alkhanov's departure, Ramzan Kadyrov, the republic's prime minister and a man whose fighters have been broadly accused of rampant human rights violations, becomes the acting president. Mr. Kadyrov and Mr. Alkhanov have quarreled openly in recent weeks, prompting so many rumors of intrigue and betrayals that Mr. Alkhanov had declared that he had no intention of leaving office.

Mr. Kadyrov is the son of Mr. Alkhanov's predecessor, Akhmad Kadyrov, who was assassinated by rebels in 2004. The younger Mr. Kadyrov turned 30 last year, reaching the minimum age for the republic's presidency, and was widely assumed to be waiting in the wings for the top post.

Tanya Lokshina, a prominent rights campaigner who travels to the region frequently, said Mr. Alkhanov's removal cemented Mr. Kadyrov's control over Chechnya's affairs, underscoring the Kremlin's disregard for complaints about Mr. Kadyrov's tactics. "There's not even a nominal president who was protesting what Kadyrov is doing," she said, calling him a feudal leader. "That's what Alkhanov was doing."

On the national level, Mr. Putin has not signaled that he has a preferred candidate to replace him, as Boris N. Yeltsin tipped Mr. Putin to be his successor shortly after appointing him prime minister in August 1999. Four months later, on New Year's Eve, Mr. Yeltsin resigned and made Mr. Putin acting president.

Mr. Putin announced the changes in televised meetings, the first with his ministers and later with leaders of the Ministry of Defense. Mr. Medvedev was absent from at least the televised portions of the meetings, and Mr. Putin did not mention him.

The president said he was expanding Mr. Ivanov's duties to include "a part of the civil sector of the economy," as well as the military industries that have undergone a significant consolidation under Mr. Putin. "I hope that what positive has been done in the military-industrial complex will extend to the civil sector, as well," he said.

Mr. Medvedev, 41, has overseen economic and social issues, a portfolio he will now have to share with Mr. Ivanov.

"Ivanov is an equal of Putin," said Olga V. Kryshtanovskaya, a sociologist who studies Russia's leaders, calling him "successor No. 1." "He is no less clever. Ivanov should show himself as a strong figure, capable of making firm decisions. But of course, he could not just work on defense. He had to operate wider. This is the next step."

Mr. Markov, by contrast, said the undeclared race remained wide open, though he said the move could help Mr. Ivanov by distancing him from the military, which, despite an aggressive effort to rearm and rebuild, remains scarred by accusations of corruption and a brutal system of hazing young draftees.

Mr. Ivanov, 54, faced unusual public criticism last year after a particularly egregious hazing episode that left a private maimed. The appointment, Mr. Markov said, "liberated him from the not quite convenient theme of the Russian military."

Mr. Ivanov's replacement as defense minister is Anatoly E. Serdyukov, a former army officer and furniture manufacturer who has served as a tax inspector since Mr. Putin became president in 2000. Since July 2004, he has served as the head of the Federal Tax Service, an agency that has streamlined itself significantly but that remains a feared bureaucracy, one that critics say has been used selectively to punish opponents.

At a news conference this month, Mr. Putin faced repeated questions about his successor, but refused to answer them directly.

"Everyone who should be is already working in his proper place," he said, apparently not hinting at the shuffle announced Thursday. "And what we should do is not to make a fuss about future elections but, as I have said, provide the citizens with an opportunity to make a free and democratic choice."

Putin's Succession Gets Murkier (WSJ)

By Guy Chazan And Gregory L. White

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

MOSCOW -- President Vladimir Putin's promotion of a hawkish ally has rejiggered the power balance among his likely successors, sharpening the competition faced by the more pro-Western candidate who had been considered the front-runner in next year's presidential contest.

Mr. Putin yesterday elevated Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov to the same rank as Dmitry Medvedev, the pro-Western first deputy prime minister.

"The succession is clearly not yet a done deal," said Alexei Makarkin, an analyst with the Center for Political Technologies. "It suggests that the president has not yet made up his mind."

DOJ_NMG_0133107

With the latest reshuffle, Mr. Putin is effectively keeping Russia's political elite guessing about who will be his favored candidate in the March 2008 election, analysts said. That helps him to avoid being seen as a lame duck for the remainder of his presidency, and to retain his ability to shape events.

Mr. Putin has repeatedly said it is up to the Russian people to decide who will be Russia's next leader, and he said early this month that he wouldn't endorse any candidate until after parliamentary elections in December. But with his approval rating still topping 70% and Kremlin control of the media and politics tight, it is widely assumed that voters will elect anyone who has his personal stamp of approval.

Although both Mr. Ivanov and Mr. Medvedev enjoy lavish coverage on state television and have seen their ratings rise in polls, neither will admit publicly to harboring presidential ambitions.

Separately, Mr. Putin abruptly dismissed the president of the war-torn Russian region of Chechnya, naming as acting president Ramzan Kadyrov, the Chechen prime minister widely alleged by human-rights groups to be responsible for abductions and detentions of civilians and suspected separatist rebels.

While promoting Mr. Ivanov, Mr. Putin also appointed two trusted allies from St. Petersburg to top posts in his cabinet -- a further move to ensure his influence on Russia's political system outlasts his term in office.

He picked Anatoly Serdyukov, head of the federal tax service and a former businessman with no military experience outside his Soviet-era compulsory service, to succeed Mr. Ivanov as defense minister. Meanwhile, Sergei Naryshkin, who used to work with Mr. Putin in the St. Petersburg mayor's office and is currently the government chief of staff, was named deputy prime minister in charge of trade with Russia's ex-Soviet neighbors. Both men are seen as politically unambitious technocrats who are intensely loyal to Mr Putin.

Addressing the cabinet, Mr. Putin praised Mr. Ivanov's performance as defense minister, crediting him with record Russian arms exports last year, and said he will be charged with expanding growth from the military sector to the civilian economy.

Mr. Ivanov's promotion removes him from a job that at times exposed him to vehement public criticism. A former foreign-intelligence officer in the KGB like Mr. Putin, Mr. Ivanov headed the defense ministry at a time of unprecedented public anger over army hazing. In one notorious incident last year, a soldier had to have his legs and genitals amputated after an officer ordered him to crouch for several hours.

"This promotion takes Ivanov out of the line of fire, especially on hazing," said Dmitry Badovsky, head of Moscow University's Social Systems Institute. "He will still be able to coordinate military policy, but he won't be so closely associated with all that negative imagery."

The reshuffle came at a time when Mr. Medvedev, who is responsible for a series of high-profile welfare projects, was being viewed as the front-runner in the presidential race, and was beginning to openly formalize his role as chosen successor. That climaxed last month with his widely publicized address at the World Economic Forum in Davos.

Instead of pushing Mr. Medvedev to the fore, Mr. Putin now seems to be putting in place a complex system of checks and balances to even out the influence of power centers. That allows him to emerge as the chief arbiter of rival interests in Russia's murky system of power, a role he is expected to hang on to once he has left the presidency.

"Putin is determined not to allow the perception in the elite that it's all over," said Christopher Granville, managing editor of Trusted Sources, a London-based research boutique covering emerging markets. "There will now be a balance to keep [Medvedev and Ivanov] competing until the election campaign formally begins next year."

Putin Removes Chechen President, Appoints Ally (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 15 -- President Vladimir Putin dismissed the president of Chechnya on Thursday, clearing a path to the southern republic's highest office for Ramzan Kadyrov, the controversial prime minister of Chechnya who has been accused of major human rights abuses in his drive to pacify the war-torn region.

Putin appointed Kadyrov as acting president in advance of elections, in which analysts expect the young Kremlin ally to face only token and timid opposition. No election date has been set, and Russian officials insisted there would be more than one candidate.

Alu Alkhanov, who had been president since May 2004, was appointed deputy justice minister of Russia. Alkhanov became president when Kadyrov's father, a former separatist who switched his loyalties to the Kremlin, was assassinated with a bomb in the Chechen capital, Grozny. Alkhanov's departure had been rumored for weeks, and he was reportedly under pressure from Kadyrov to step aside.

The younger Kadyrov was not eligible to become president until he turned 30, which he did in October. As deputy prime minister and later prime minister, ostensibly under Alkhanov, Kadyrov was regarded as the real power in Chechnya.

A brash, ginger-haired man, Kadyrov commands a large paramilitary group, composed mostly of former rebels, that has essentially displaced Russian federal troops and special police units as the principal force in Chechnya.

Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, who was assassinated last year, wrote in 2005 that "the Kremlin decided to replace one type of civil war (federal troops versus a broad strata of Chechen society) with another type (Chechens fighting Chechens for power in Chechnya and federal funding from Moscow)."

Kadyrov's black-clad troops have been accused by human rights groups and some of his Chechen critics of torture, abductions and disappearances.

"He acts like a medieval tyrant," Movladi Baisarov, a former Chechen special forces officer who broke with Kadyrov, said in a newspaper interview last year. "I know of many people executed on his express orders, and I know exactly where they are buried. If someone tells the truth about what is going on, it's like signing his own death warrant."

A month later, on Nov. 18, Baisarov was shot dead on Moscow's busy Leninsky Prospekt while apparently resisting arrest. Some witnesses said he was shot repeatedly by specially dispatched Chechen police as he lay on the ground and Moscow police officers stood by.

Kadyrov has repeatedly denied having any connection to killings or other human rights violations.

In the past 12 years, rebels and Russian forces have fought two brutal wars in Chechnya. Kadyrov's defenders, including the Kremlin, credit him with routing the separatist movement and reducing violence in Chechnya, although armed clashes continue. Yet there has not been a major terrorist attack in Russia since the seizure of a school in the southern town of Beslan in September 2004, and a number of Chechen rebel leaders have been killed in special operations by Russian forces.

The Kremlin has pursued a policy of substituting Chechens for Russians in the republic, handing over power to local officials as a constitution was written and a parliament elected. The elevation of Kadyrov, who was awarded a Hero of Russia medal by Putin in 2004, would mark the culmination of that process.

Some analysts in Moscow, however, contend that Kadyrov has assumed so much power that he could easily slip out of the Kremlin's control, if he has not already, and spark more conflict. Kadyrov's image is almost ubiquitous in the province, leading to charges that he is building a cult of personality.

Despite Russia's constitutional secularism, Kadyrov has been burnishing his Islamic credentials in Chechnya, which is predominantly Muslim. He has advocated the introduction of some aspects of sharia, or Islamic law, including polygamy and bans on alcohol and gambling.

Sergei Markedonov, an expert on the Caucasus region at the Institute for Political and Military Analysis in Moscow, calls Kadyrov a "system separatist" who is undermining Russian authority while pledging formal loyalty to the Kremlin.

Putin And Progress (WSJ)

By Padma Desai

The Wall Street Journal, February 16, 2007

Whatever the West's grave misgivings about Vladimir Putin, they are not widely shared by the Russian people, who consistently give their president 70% approval ratings in opinion polls. Even former Presidents Gorbachev and Yeltsin, much admired in the U.S., have given a nod of approval to Mr. Putin's "strategic" direction, even though they express reservations about his moves to consolidate federal authority.

Nonetheless, there are two pertinent issues to face. First, would any Russian president succeeding Mr. Putin act differently in foreign policy? Second, is Russia regressing irretrievably into authoritarianism, or is she likely to embrace Western democratic norms despite the zigzags?

The Kremlin's pursuit of national interests in foreign policy, whether we like it or not, reflects a broad agreement among Russians. Indeed, on a whole range of issues ranging from NATO's eastward expansion to Mr. Putin's hardball tactics with the independent states in Russia's neighborhood, the majority of Russians support his decisions. Even Russia's leading reformers regard the neighborhood as Russia's area of interest.

Former Prime Minister Mikhail Kasyanov, who successfully carried out a series of reforms during his 2000-2004 tenure, insists that Russians "have special interests and responsibilities" in their immediate neighborhood. "We have a long history of shared problems and common tradition, although the former Soviet republics are now independent states," Mr. Kasyanov told me in a December 2004 interview.

Anatoly Chubais, the legendary privatizer of Russian industry, was even more explicit in his pronouncements, suggesting that Russia should become a "liberal empire." In an interview on Vremya TV, he added, "We must be frank and straightforward and assume this mission of leadership, not just as a slogan but as a Russian state policy. I believe this mission of leadership means that Russia is obliged to support in every way the expansion of its business outside Russia."

In short, unlike Europe and Japan, which share U.S. concerns despite occasional differences, Russia always will have geopolitical interests in its immediate neighborhood, extending its decision-making periphery as far as the Middle East and China. This does not imply that the West should uncritically accept specific decisions in pursuit of these interests, such as the expulsion of Georgians from Russia. But even if Russians were to subscribe to liberal Western values as President Bush desires, their future leaders still might choose to define their interests independently. Moscow would continue to engage the U.S. leadership in win-lose dialogues over Russia's determined foreign policy.

But never mind the likelihood that a liberal, democratic Russia might change its foreign-policy style: What are the prospects of such a Russia emerging in the first place? If it's correct to say that a prospering middle class -- dare one call it a bourgeoisie? -- inevitably leads to the rise of democracy, then Russia fits the bill admirably. The transformative changes in Russia, a remarkable development since Mr. Gorbachev's glasnost, are phenomenal. Russians are acquiring private housing, automobiles and fixed and mobile telephones at a dizzying speed. The overall poverty rate has declined from around 35% in the mid-1990s to about 10% today, and 70% of college-age youngsters receive a higher education.

There has been much angst over Russian muscle-flexing on the pricing and supply of oil and gas. However ham-handed, Moscow has simply used its bargaining power to extract better economic terms in situations of bilateral monopoly. Gazprom, the Russian gas supplier, has sought maximum possible terms from its European customers before they switch to alternative energy sources. At the same time, Ukraine and Belarus have bargained with Gazprom over transit charges because Russian gas must pass en route to Europe via pipelines located in their territories.

Russian industry and energy sectors will increasingly adopt market-economy rules and practices as they learn to interact and integrate with Western business. Recognizing this, German Chancellor Angela Merkel signed with Mr. Putin a 2006 agreement in which Wintershall, the energy unit of German chemical giant BASF, and Gazprom exchanged equivalent stakes in early 2006. More contracts are proliferating with French and Italian partners. Russia's giant power company is poised to raise $10 billion in the next two years and to invite Western companies to supply power generating units, technology and management know-how. Gazprom, according to some reports, is set to raise $75 billion in the next decade for financing a variety of projects. Will American businesses be sidelined from lucrative contracts and a liberalizing, market-oriented mission in a fast growing and diversifying Russian economy?

"There is a definite consensus among Russian society and the elite that Russia needs a market economy," Yegor Gaidar, Mr. Yeltsin's young reforming prime minister told me in October 2004. "By contrast, our struggle to form a robust, functioning democracy has not brought decisive results. . . . I do not think that the educated, urban populations in large countries such as Russia can put up with undemocratic regimes for long."

Russia's Course: Still Uncertain (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

MOSCOW -- Think of the new Russia as a highway: People used to drive on the left side of the road; now, officially, they are supposed to drive on the right, but the change has been uncomfortable (especially for the authorities). So the country straddles the middle -- which is understandable, but also dangerous.

That's a paradox of Vladimir Putin's Russia that I have encountered in nearly every conversation here this week. Russian officials insist they don't want to go back to communism, and why would they? Moscow glitters like a Christmas package, with more neon per square mile than any city I know. But behind Moscow's dazzling lights, the remnants of the old police state remain -- and many order-loving Russians seem glad of it.

The energy boom has helped Russians forget about the nagging problem of where they're heading politically. "There is a lack of clarity about our final destination," says one prominent Russian businessman. "Are we building China? The United States? Sweden? What is it? The situation now cannot continue. We are sitting between two chairs."

Russia is wary of full, American-style democracy, argues Konstantin Kosachyov, the chairman of the foreign affairs committee in the lower house of the Russian parliament. "To my mind, democracy is not a goal in itself, it is an instrument. It is the best instrument, but it should be used very cautiously. It's like the jackhammers that miners use. It increases productivity, but if you give this instrument to a child, it will destroy the child."

Kosachyov explains that Russians have bad memories of the wide-open democracy of the 1990s, and most Russians I spoke with confirmed that view. It was a crazy time, when people's savings were wiped out, gangsters battled in the streets, and the country was governed by what Russians saw as an alcoholic president and his thieving cronies. "Democracy came to us without us being ready to use it in a constructive way, and it destroyed us," says Kosachyov. "That's why Putin acts in a cautious way. He does not want to repeat the experience of the 1990s."

The Russian political puzzle now centers on the question of who will succeed Putin when his second term ends in 2008. The Russian president is very popular, and he would almost certainly be reelected if he ran for a third term, but he insists he will abide by the new constitution's two-term limit. So who is the crown prince? Moscow was buzzing this week about whether Putin favored First Deputy Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev or Deputy Prime Minister and Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov. Medvedev appeared to be the front-runner -- until Putin announced late Thursday that he was promoting Ivanov to equal status as first deputy prime minister, with new economic responsibilities.

The succession circus, in truth, reinforces the awkwardness of Russia's not-quite-democratic system. Analysts count the minutes allocated to Medvedev and Ivanov on state-controlled television. It's like Kremlin-watching in the old days, when observers tried to handicap power struggles by noting where officials stood on the podium during parades in Red Square. The reality is that power resides with Putin and his small inner circle of presidential assistants.

I had a chance to peek into Putin's inner circle this week when I met with his chief economic adviser, Igor Shuvalov. His office is a Soviet-era palace that once housed the head of the Communist Party, but Shuvalov is very much of the new era: He's just 40, speaks English fluently and is as sharply dressed as any London investment banker.

A key to Russia's future, argues Shuvalov, is Putin's decision to seek membership in the World Trade Organization. He says some Kremlin advisers opposed WTO accession, but Putin decided it was the best way to guarantee Russia's continued economic modernization. When I ask about corruption in the new Russia, Shuvalov doesn't deny the problem. "We need to be persistent and patient," he says. "If we are persistent, then slowly it will change."

High oil prices have encouraged a consumer boom, but they are a mixed blessing. The giant state-controlled gas and oil companies, Gazprom and Rosneft, overwhelm the rest of the economy and dominate Russian politics -- with several of Putin's closest advisers holding energy directorships. Energy politics and democratic politics don't mix easily.

"Don't give up on us. Treat us as a normal democratic country," says Mikhail Kasyanov, who was prime minister during Putin's first three years but is now a critic of the government. Certainly, Western pressure can help preserve democracy here. But in the end, it's the Russians who will have to decide which side of the road they're driving on.

The Putin Doctrine (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

Vladimir Putin -- Russia's president, although the more accurate title would be godfather -- made headlines last week with a speech in Munich that set a new standard in anti-Americanism. He not only charged the United States with the "hyper-use of force," "disdain for the basic principles of international law" and having "overstepped its national borders in . . . the economic, political, cultural and educational policies it imposes on other nations." He even blamed the spread of weapons of mass destruction, which the United States has been combating with few allies and against constant Russian resistance, on American "dominance" that "inevitably encourages" other countries to acquire them.

There is something amusing about criticism of the use of force by the man who turned Chechnya into a smoldering ruin; about the invocation of international law by the man who will not allow Scotland Yard to interrogate the polonium-soaked thugs it suspects of murdering Alexander Litvinenko, yet another Putin opponent who met an untimely and unprosecuted death; about the bullying of other countries decried by a man who cuts off energy supplies to Ukraine, Georgia and Belarus in brazen acts of political and economic extortion.

Less amusing is the greater meaning of Putin's Munich speech. It marks Russia's coming out. Flush with oil and gas revenue, the consolidation of dictatorial authority at home and the capitulation of both domestic and Western companies to his seizure of their assets, Putin issued his boldest declaration yet that post-Soviet Russia is preparing to reassert itself on the world stage.

Perhaps the most important line in his speech was the least noted because it seemed so innocuous. "I very often hear appeals by our partners, including our European partners, to the effect that Russia should play an increasingly active role in world affairs," he said. "It is hardly necessary to incite us to do so."

Soviet foreign minister Andrei Gromyko once boasted that no conflict anywhere on the globe could be settled without taking into account the attitude and interests of the Soviet Union. Gromyko's description of Soviet influence constitutes the best definition ever formulated of the term "superpower."

And we know how Putin, who has called the demise of the Soviet Union the greatest political catastrophe of the 20th century, yearns for those superpower days. At Munich, he could not even disguise his Cold War nostalgia, asserting that "global security" was ensured by the "strategic potential of two superpowers."

DOJ_NMG_0133111

Putin's bitter complaint is that today there remains only one superpower, the behemoth that dominates a "unipolar world." He knows that Moscow lacks the economic, military and even demographic means to challenge America as it did in Soviet days. He speaks more modestly of coalitions of aggrieved have-not countries that Russia might lead in countering American power.

Hence his increasingly active foreign policy -- military partnerships with China, nuclear cooperation with Iran, weapon supplies to Syria and Venezuela, diplomatic support as well as arms for a genocidal Sudan, friendly outreach to other potential partners of an anti-hegemonic (read: anti-American) alliance.

Is this a return to the Cold War? It is true that the ex-KGB agent occasionally lets slip a classic Marxist anachronism such as "foreign capital" (referring to Western oil companies) or the otherwise weird adjective "vulgar" (describing the actions of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which infuriated Putin by insisting upon a clean election in Ukraine). He even intimated that he might undo one of the unequivocal achievements of the late Cold War era, the so-called "zero option" agreement of 1987, and restore a Soviet-style, medium-range ballistic missile force.

Nonetheless, Putin's aggressiveness does not signal a return to the Cold War. He is too clever to be burdened by the absurdity of socialist economics or Marxist politics. He is blissfully free of ideology, political philosophy and economic theory. There is no existential dispute with the United States.

He is a more modest man: a mere mafia don, seizing the economic resources and political power of a country for himself and his (mostly KGB) cronies. And promoting his vision of the Russian national interest -- assertive and expansionist -- by engaging in diplomacy that challenges the dominant power in order to boost his own.

He wants Gromyko's influence -- or at least some international acknowledgment that Moscow must be reckoned with -- without the ideological baggage. He does not want to bury us; he only wants to diminish us. It is 19th-century power politics at its most crude and elemental. Putin does not want us as an enemy. But at Munich he told the world that, vis-Ã -vis America, his Russia has gone from partner to adversary.

Will Russia Bet On Its People Or Its Oil Wells? (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

In a high-rise building with a view of Lenin's Tomb, the U.S. aerospace giant Boeing is designing key parts of its new 787 Dreamliner, using hundreds of Russian aerospace engineers. Yes, President Putin may be talking cold-war tough, but down the street from the Kremlin, America's crown jewel industrial company is using Russia's crown jewel brainpower to design its next crown jewel jetliner.

Boeing's Moscow Design Center, which employs 1,400 Russian engineers (earning less than their U.S. counterparts) on various projects, symbolizes Russia's unique potential: Russia is that rare country that not only has a treasure trove of natural resources — oil, gas and mines — but also has a treasure trove of human talent: engineers, mathematicians and other valuable minds.

Most nations with highly developed human talent — like Singapore or Taiwan — have few natural resources, and those that are rich in natural resources — Venezuela or Sudan — tend not to develop their people's talents. The exceptions, like Norway, which is rich in both human and natural resources, usually built their democratic institutions before they got rich on oil, so the money was well spent.

The meta-question with Russia today is this: Will it become more like Norway, a democracy enriched by oil, or more like Venezuela, a democracy subverted by oil? Is the Boeing center Russia's future or its exception?

You see signs of both trends. On the positive side, Russia has been smarter than most petro-states. It has set up a rainy day fund and tucked away $100 billion from its oil and gas windfall. Direct foreign investment in Russia hit $30 billion last year, according to The Economist, and not all of it goes to the oil and gas sector anymore.

And then there's Boeing. Its impressive Moscow center operates two shifts of engineers: 7 a.m. until 3 p.m., and 3 p.m. until 11 p.m. — which is shortly before the workday begins in the United States. A Russian Boeing engineer might be designing part of the 787's nose during his day, and then initials and stores his work in the computer. A U.S. Boeing engineer, working on an identical computer, then picks it up during her day and engineers it some more. With regular teleconferences, it's as if they are in one virtual 24-hour office.

"There is no paper at all," said Sergei Korolev, the deputy head of Boeing Moscow. "We do the presentations electronically and have online sessions with Wichita and Seattle, and everyone looks at the same part and talks about it. Our center is the reason people are not emigrating."

But Russia has a unique legacy in aerospace from Soviet days, so the educational centers and talent were in place for Boeing to tap. What Russia still glaringly lacks is an ecosystem of secure property rights, venture capitalists and homegrown innovators, and universities and business schools churning out idea-entrepreneurs. “Made in Russia” will never be a global brand as long as research spending by Russian companies remains among the lowest in the world.

The Moscow Times recently reported that only two Russian colleges — Moscow State and St. Petersburg State — are listed among the world’s top 500 universities. When you walk down the streets in Bangalore, India’s high-tech capital, it feels as if there’s a computer school or English-language school on every street. You walk in Moscow, and it feels as if there is a new shoe store or beauty salon on every street.

A former top aide to President Putin remarked to me that Russia had a huge interest in building a postindustrial knowledge economy, not an energy-intensive industrial one, so it can export most of its oil and gas, not consume them at home. But that would take a big investment in education, which is not being done.

Noting that Russia today spends far less of its G.D.P. on higher education than Europe or America, Sergei Guriyev, rector of Russia’s New Economic School, wrote in The Moscow Times, “Russians simply are not prepared to pay the taxes that would be necessary to finance science and education at Soviet-era levels, and no incentives have been created to attract more private funding.”

So here’s my prediction: You tell me the price of oil, and I’ll tell you what kind of Russia you’ll have. If the price stays at $60 a barrel, it’s going to be more like Venezuela, because its leaders will have plenty of money to indulge their worst instincts, with too few checks and balances. If the price falls to $30, it will be more like Norway. If the price falls to $15 a barrel, it could become more like America — with just enough money to provide a social safety net for its older generation, but with too little money to avoid developing the leaders and institutions to nurture the brainpower of its younger generation.

Silence Of America (WP)

The Washington Post, February 16, 2007

FOR DECADES, the Voice of America and its sister broadcasting organizations offered a remarkably balanced alternative to state-controlled media all over the world, buoying dissident movements and undermining anti-American dictatorships for a relatively small investment. Soviet citizens even learned how to reconfigure their radios to break through the jamming signals their government used to interrupt VOA and British Broadcasting Corp. programming.

Now, with Russian President Vladimir Putin bullying his neighbors, manipulating the Russian media and throwing increasingly audacious anti-American tantrums, one would think U.S. policymakers would have the sense at least to maintain relatively modest VOA operations in and around the Russian Federation. Yet President Bush's recently released 2008 budget proposal does just the opposite, cutting VOA programming for a range of post-Soviet states to finance programming expansion in other areas of the world.

The White House's proposed reprioritization of VOA broadcasting moves money out of operations aimed at the large and largely Muslim country of Uzbekistan. Broadcasting into neighboring Kazakhstan is also being cut. The citizens of both countries live under illiberal regimes, and Uzbekistan's brutal dictatorship is of the sort that incubates religious fundamentalism and anti-Americanism. Voice of America's half-hour of radio and half-hour of television programming in Uzbek, says a VOA staff member, provide about the only direct contact Uzbeks have with the United States and the only unvarnished news in the region. Meanwhile, the highly controlled Russian media beam their often misleading programming in with ease.

Mr. Bush's budget also proposes reductions in Ukrainian-language VOA programming to serve a country struggling to Westernize in the shadow of Mr. Putin's increasingly lawless regime. Mr. Bush should be eager to encourage democratic forces in Ukraine, as well as in Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan, not further limit their sources of information about the United States. The price of such programs is so low that federal financial constraints are hardly an excuse to kill them; a relatively tiny increase in the VOA's budget would make a world of difference.

U.N. Chief Presses Sudan To Allow Team To Visit Darfur (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Feb. 15 — Secretary General Ban Ki-moon said Thursday that President Omar al-Bashir of Sudan had broken a personal pledge he made last month to give entry permits to a United Nations human rights team, and Mr. Ban urged the Sudanese leader to reconsider.

“This is the issue I discussed with President Bashir during my meeting with him in Addis Ababa, and he said he would issue visas to the fact-finding mission,” Mr. Ban said. “He said he would have no problem.”

“I am very much disappointed by the decision of the Sudanese government,” he added. “If he believes that there is no problem, then he should be able to receive the human rights fact-finding mission.”

DOJ_NMG_0133113

Mr. Ban also said he had received no reply from Mr. Bashir to a Jan. 24 letter addressing Sudanese concerns over a combined African Union and United Nations force to curb attacks on villagers in the Darfur region of western Sudan.

Mr. Ban said the letter detailed how an advance force would be created, as well as its command structure and financing. “With an affirmative answer, we can pave the way immediately to the introduction of a hybrid A.U./U.N. mission,” he said.

Under an agreement reached late last year with Sudan, a 20,000-member joint force was to be sent to Darfur to replace an undermanned and poorly equipped 7,000-member African Union contingent that has said it cannot control the rising violence.

Since that agreement, however, President Bashir has repeatedly defied the United Nations, saying he would not accept its peacekeepers and at one point threatening to send the Sudanese Army into combat against any who tried to enter the country. Because the resolution creating the force specifies that it must have the consent of the government before it can deploy in Sudan, United Nations officials have been pressing Mr. Bashir to drop his objections.

Mr. Ban said he was expecting to hear word shortly from Jan Eliasson, his special envoy for Darfur, and Salim A. Salim of the African Union, who are both currently in Sudan.

“This continuing deteriorating situation in Darfur is just unacceptable,” Mr. Ban said.

The violence in Darfur has left more than 200,000 villagers dead and made 2.5 million people homeless since the government moved to fight rebels there in 2003.

In Washington, Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said the United States was putting pressure on United Nations members, and African countries in particular, to supply more troops to the mission but had met resistance.

“It is absolutely essential that member nations of the U.N. step up and make those troop contributions,” he said.

Andrew S. Natsios, President Bush’s envoy for Darfur, said Wednesday that pro-government Janjaweed militias blamed for most of the killing, raping and pillaging were planning new actions — a threat, he said, that could drive out aid workers and close camps, producing a “bloodbath.”

Plan Prepared For Cuban Exodus (MH)

By Pablo Bachelet

The Miami Herald, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON - Concerned about a possible mass exodus of Cubans, the Department of Defense plans to spend $18 million to prepare part of the U.S. Navy base at Guantánamo Bay to shelter interdicted migrants, U.S. officials told The Miami Herald.

The new installation is needed because terrorism suspects occupy space on the base used in past emergencies to hold large numbers of migrants, Bush administration officials directly involved said. They note that the facilities are designed to house people from any Caribbean nation who attempt to enter illegally -- not just Cubans.

But they say privately that Fidel Castro's illness and temporary hand-over of power to his brother Raúl last summer injected a renewed sense of urgency into plans to handle a mass exodus. The administration quietly requested the funds about a month ago and Congress has approved it, The Miami Herald was told.

The officials, who were authorized to speak on the subject but requested anonymity because of the sensitive nature of Cuban issues, say there is no sign a Cuban migration crisis is brewing, but they acknowledge predicting one is difficult. The 1980 Mariel boatlift, which saw 125,000 Cubans arrive in Florida, began when a group of Cubans tried to storm the Peruvian embassy in Havana.

BIGGER PLAN

The $18 million initiative is part of a broader U.S. government effort to prepare for the death of Castro. The administration will not say how many migrants it believes might flee Cuba or even if any will do so, but one expert warned that up to 500,000 may try to leave the island after Castro's death.

Top Bush Cabinet officials have met at least twice since December to review Cuba contingency plans. On March 7 and 8, the Department of Homeland Security will lead an exercise in South Florida involving the Coast Guard and dozens of federal, state and local agencies, focused on stopping U.S. boaters from picking up rafters.

The U.S. Navy base, on the eastern tip of Cuba, apparently would be used as a shelter of last resort if the volume of Cubans interdicted at sea overwhelms the U.S. policy known as ``wet foot/dry foot."

Under that policy, Cubans who make it to U.S. territory are allowed to remain. Those intercepted at sea are interviewed aboard Coast Guard vessels and most are repatriated to Cuba. A few who have been found to credibly risk persecution if returned to Cuba have been taken to Guantánamo for more interviews while U.S. officials arrange for their resettlement in third nations.

U.S. officials refused to say whether the wet foot/dry foot policy will be changed in case of an exodus, since such an announcement might prompt many Cubans to leave.

For years, migrants captured during surges ended up in tent camps at Guantánamo on a bluff called Radio Range, on the larger Windward side of the base.

1994 MIGRATIONS

At the height of the last migration crisis in 1994, more than 32,000 Cubans and 21,000 Haitians overwhelmed the base in tent cities. Most of the Cubans were later sent to the United States. Most of the Haitians were sent home.

The Pentagon has since built its sprawling terrorism detention and interrogation center at the site of the old tent camps, limiting shelter space. The plan would put them on the smaller Leeward side, which has an airstrip but no docks for large ships.

"The capacity to process migrants at Guantánamo is an integral part of our overall plans to ensure that any attempted mass migration in the Caribbean is not successful," said one official, who also declined to be identified. The official said the new facility is ``part of prudent contingency planning."

"The U.S. has established avenues for safe, orderly, legal migration from the various countries in the Caribbean," the official added. ``Any effort to send people to the United States via unsafe and illegal means will not succeed."

The Pentagon already has solicited construction bids for the new facility. The $18 million would pay for things like land leveling, sewage and electrical infrastructure, bathrooms, dining facilities and administrative offices to process asylum applications. The installations will be initially designed to handle about 10,000 migrants, officials say, though more can be quickly accommodated if needed.

SCENARIOS

Andy Gomez, senior fellow at the University of Miami's Institute for Cuban and Cuban-American Studies, says focus groups and other interviews show many young Cubans are eager to leave.

"If the economic conditions do not get better, there is the strong possibility that as many as 500,000 Cubans will want to leave the island in all directions," he says. ``The other possibility will also be a large group of Cubans rushing the U.S. base in Guantánamo or foreign embassies in Havana."

Latin American countries may be reluctant to take in numerous migrants, he added.

Meanwhile, the Coast Guard is finalizing plans for an exercise next month that will involve scores of vessels.

Rear Adm. David Kunkel, head of the Coast Guard's South East District, is in charge of coordinating interdiction efforts among many agencies, including the U.S. Navy and Miami-Dade Police.

"We would be concerned with boaters leaving from South Florida marinas to potentially increase the problem," said Jim Watson, chief of staff of the South East District. He said "deterrent elements" would be tested.

Miami Republican Reps. Lincoln and Mario Diaz-Balart, who have been briefed on preparations, could not be reached for comment.

Indonesia's Avian Flu Holdout (NYT)

The New York Times, February 16, 2007

Indonesia sent a chill through the World Health Organization recently when it refused to supply any more samples of the avian flu virus that has killed scores of its people. The move, which seemed aimed at gaining access to vaccines at an affordable price, threatens the global effort to track the virus and develop vaccines. But Indonesia has raised a valid point that needs to be addressed: if a pandemic should strike, poor countries would be left without protection.

The W.H.O. relies on a global network of laboratories to provide virus samples so experts can determine which are most likely to spread. These strains are then used to develop the seed stocks that are given — at no cost — to manufacturers to use in making vaccines.

In a typical flu season, the key strains emerge from Asia, while the vaccines are sold primarily in the West. This has not caused a ruckus because most developing countries consider influenza one of their lesser health threats. But with rising fears of an avian flu pandemic, the dynamic has changed.

Indonesia decided to act after a foreign company announced work on a vaccine that would be based on its samples. Indonesia stopped cooperating with the W.H.O. and started negotiations to send future samples to another vaccine maker in return for technology that would allow Indonesia to make its own vaccine.

That may be good for Indonesia but could be harmful to global health — especially if other countries follow. Clearly Indonesia, which is in discussion with W.H.O. officials, needs to rejoin the global network. Unfortunately, the W.H.O. has no good answer to the inequities Indonesia has spotlighted.

If a pandemic struck, the current vaccine makers could produce only 500 million doses of vaccine per year if they ran 24 hours a day. That is far short of what would be needed to vaccinate all 6.7 billion people in the world. Thus there seems no doubt that in a crisis, the countries that are home to the vaccine makers would tend to their own citizens first — or those willing to pay the highest prices — leaving little or no vaccine for everyone else.

The W.H.O. needs to work much harder to encourage the transfer of vaccine production technology to countries, like Indonesia, that have the technical ability to use it. That will increase the supply of vaccine and presumably bring prices down. Even then, we fear, there still won't be enough.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Holiday Publishing Notice. In observance of the federal Presidents Day holiday, the Attorney General's News Briefing will not be published on Monday, February 19. News from the holiday will be included in your Tuesday, February 20, briefing.

Trial Of March 11, 2004 Conspirators Divides Spaniards. NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 5, :15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "High drama today in a courtroom in Madrid where 29 suspects in what some call Spain's 9/11 went on trial, accused of bombing four crowded commuter trains back in 2004. 191 people were killed in those terrorist attacks."

The Washington Post (2/16, A12, Anderson, Rolfe, 690K) reports, "Twenty-nine suspects went on trial Thursday for the March 11, 2004, bombings of four commuter trains in Madrid, but Spain's political parties and news media have turned the investigation of the attack into a partisan battle, fraying the country's traditional solidarity against terrorism and leaving Spaniards bitterly divided over who launched the attack and why." The "strongest evidence collected by investigators suggests that the bombings -- which killed 191 people and injured 1,824 in the worst terrorist attack ever carried out in continental Europe -- were the work of Islamic radicals inspired by al-Qaeda, principally in retaliation for the stationing of Spanish troops in Iraq." But leaders of the conservative Popular Party "continue to assert that the Basque separatist movement known as ETA had a central role in the bombings. Some independent terrorism experts accuse the Popular Party -- in power at the time of the attack and voted out of office in national elections three days later -- of spinning conspiracy theories to escape blame for the bombings and redeem itself with the public."

Attorneys Say "Torture" Left Padilla Incompetent. The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Richey, 59K) reports suspected Al Qaeda operative Jose Padilla "is facing an April trial in federal court here on charges that he became a willing Al Qaeda recruit in a violent global jihad. But his lawyers complain that Padilla's harsh treatment during nearly four years of military detention and interrogation has left him so psychologically damaged that he is unable to help wage his own defense." In a hearing before US District Judge Marcia Cooke, federal prosecutors "are expected to urge the judge to ignore everything that took place during Padilla's military detention. They say his harsh treatment is irrelevant to whether he is mentally competent to stand trial." Padilla's lawyers "disagree. They say their client was tortured by the military and they are asking the judge to order the government to fully account for its treatment of Padilla." The "issue of the scope of the judge's inquiry into Padilla's mental condition is important because it could open the door to the first detailed examination of torture allegations made by an alleged enemy combatant."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

"Washington Legend" Faced With Difficult Task Of Building DHS Intelligence Unit. The New York Times (2/16, Lipton, 1.16M) profiles "born contrarian" and "Washington legend" Charles E. Allen, who has taken on "a job that virtually no one else wanted, to rescue a fledging intelligence operation that gets little respect and assumes a role doubters say is not even necessary." As he works "to build a credible operation" as head of the intelligence unit at the Department of Homeland Security, "Allen has muscled his way into meetings of the nation's top spy agency chiefs, claimed ground that the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the C.I.A. had already carved up, defended his efforts before Congress and forced rivals to make room — sometimes literally — for his department." Allen has also "met resistance" from some leaders within the Department of Homeland Security, "over whom he has little direct authority." The Times continues to describe Allen's myriad challenges, which, coupled with Congressional demands for progress, have led some friends to "believe his task is almost hopeless."

Accidental Tainted Food Outbreaks Fuel Concern About Agroterror. The CDC yesterday warned of a Peter Pan peanut butter tainted with salmonella – urging consumers to throw out jars with a product code on the lid beginning with "2111" – and the CBS Evening News (2/15, story 7, 3:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported in its "CBS News in Focus" segment that the incident is "presumed to be an accident, but what's to prevent intentional food poisoning by terrorists?" CBS (Orr) added, "Nearly 300 people were sick before the current salmonella outbreak could be tracked to a peanut butter processor in Georgia." It and the recent e. Coli outbreak "underscore a frightening reality -- once a poison or bioagent infects America's food chain, it's hard to detect and even harder to stop, making the US food supply an inviting target for terrorists." John Perren, FBI: "This is the new fight, the new battleground since September 11." Orr: "John Perren, who runs the FBI office handling weapons of mass destruction, says so-called agro-terrorism is a real threat from 'farm to fork.'" Perren: "The food chain, agriculture system is very large. Therefore, we have vulnerabilities. We consider that a soft target." Orr: "The most worrisome agro-weapon is foot-and-mouth," and the "virus could be easily carried into the United States from an infected area by a tourist or terrorist. … CBS News got an exclusive look at a first-of-its-kind, yet-to-be-opened, agriculture bio-security center. Here investigators will work to identify emerging biothreats, handling some of the most lethal pathogens from e. Coli, to anthrax, to foot and mouth." CBS News also posts the story on its Web site.

Lieberman Measure Would Extend Union Rights To TSA Workers. Under the headline, "Effort To Give TSA Screeners Union Rights Advances," the Washington Post's (2/16, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports that the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee "approved a measure that would give collective-bargaining rights to about 43,000 airport screeners at the Transportation Security Administration." The Post adds that if the full Senate also approves the measure, "the issue of union rights for TSA screeners is likely to provoke a rare clash with the White House over federal workplace rules. After the House vote, the Bush administration vowed to oppose the legislation." The Post adds that committee chairman "Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.)," proposed "the union-rights amendment to" a Senate bill to "implement unfinished recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission" and the amendment was approved on a "party-line vote of 9 to 8." The Post adds, "Lieberman said 'personnel management has been troubled at TSA' and concluded that 'it is time to give TSA screeners parity with other security officers within TSA and DHS in terms of their employment rights and protections.'"

Senate Bill Lacks "Radical" Cargo, Port Screening Measures. The Washington Times/UPI (2/16, Waterman) reports the union rights measure came during the committee's mark up of legislation implementing the remaining recommendations of the September 11 commission, which "also mandates a pilot project that would allow new secure driver's licenses to be used instead of passports at the Canadian border. However, it does not contain some of the more radical cargo and port security measures in the House version."

Engineer Calls For Less "Conservative Approach" To Freedom Tower. In a New York Times (2/16, 1.16M) op-ed, structural engineer and author Guy Nordenson faults the current design for the Freedom Tower, the structure scheduled to be built on the site of the World Trade Center, calling it's design "a very conservative approach. The result, a 20-story fortified wall around the base of a 1,776-foot tower, hardly evokes freedom — rather, it embodies fear and anxiety." Nordenson suggests that the original design was altered by former Gov. George Pataki for political and symbolic reasons and says "the alterations, unfortunately, made the design impossible to build, and eventually the entire concept was abandoned." The new design, engineered to meet Pataki's parameters, "is in every way inferior, and those flaws — in terms of aesthetics, economics, security and ethics — are all rooted in the way in which it was conceived." Nordenson details these perceived design flaws, continuing to suggest that there is insufficient demand for tenant space in the new building. He concludes, "The good news is that it is not too late to change things. … The work should continue up to the ground level and stop (this should take about a year) so that the architects and engineers are given another chance to design a Freedom Tower that, like other buildings rising downtown, is financially viable and a secure and welcoming work environment worthy of its place in the skyline."

Couple Drops Katrina Damage Insurance Suit. The AP (2/16, Kunzelman) reports, "The first federal trial in New Orleans in the wave of insurance litigation spawned by Hurricane Katrina ended abruptly Thursday when a couple suing Allstate Indemnity Co. dropped their lawsuit amid allegations they misrepresented their claims." The AP continues, "Lawrence and Elizabeth Tomlinson, who claimed Allstate underpaid them and acted in bad faith in handling their claims, agreed to drop the suit before jurors could hear closing arguments in the case. … The Tomlinsons' attorney, Christy Howley, would not specify why they didn't let a jury decide the case, but Allstate, in court papers, had accused the couple of misrepresenting their claim." The AP adds, "The Northbrook, Ill.-based insurer said it paid the Tomlinsons more than $30,000 for living expenses after they moved into office property that they already owned. Lawrence Tomlinson testified that Allstate knew of their living arrangement when they made the payment. … Allstate paid the Tomlinsons a total of more than $150,000 for damage to their home and its contents, plus living expenses. The couple claimed the company underpaid them after Katrina's winds tore holes in their roof and let rain pour into their home in the New Orleans suburb of Marrero. … The insurer disputed the extent of the damage and suggested that the couple overbilled them for certain renovations to the home. Allstate attorney Judy Barrasso declined to say whether the company has considered taking further legal action against the couple."

WSJournal Blames Mississippi Attorney General For State Farm's Departure. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "State Farm, the nation's largest home insurer, announced this week that it would no longer be writing new homeowner or commercial policies in Mississippi. Magnolia Staters wondering whom to thank for their rising insurance bills, assuming they can get insurance at all, should direct their catcalls at Attorney General Jim Hood." In the "wake of Hurricane Katrina, private insurers began invoking their entirely legal 'flood exclusions' and refusing to pay for any damage that wasn't caused by wind. These exclusions had been clearly written into contracts, yet Mr. Hood declared them 'unconscionable' and sued the industry." He "claimed victory several weeks ago when he bludgeoned State Farm into a settlement, although everyone can now see his triumph comes at a price. State Farm will now be paying at least tens of millions of dollars in claims that it never factored into its risk premiums, and it has reasonably chosen not to make itself vulnerable again to Mr. Hood's extortion." Hood "and his buddies in the tort bar have provided an exquisite illustration of how political and legal predation against business ends up harming the little guy."

Hundreds Of New Orleans' "Best And Brightest" Leaving City. Under the headline "In Setback For New Orleans, Fed-Up Residents Give Up," the New York Times (2/16, Dewan, 1.16M) reports on the hundreds of New Orleans' "best and brightest who, as if finally acknowledging a lover's destructive impulses, have made the wrenching decision to leave at a time when the population is supposed to be rebounding. Their reasons include high crime, high rents, soaring insurance premiums and what many call a lack of leadership, competence, money and progress." The Times adds that many of those deciding to leave describe "a dissipating sense of possibility, a dwindling chance at redemption for a great city that, even before the storm, cried out for great improvement." Meanwhile, though "many poorer residents have moved back to the city, the 'brain drain' of professionals that the city was experiencing before the storm appears to have accelerated."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Orders Additional Troops To Afghanistan. ABC World News (2/15, story 5, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In a speech, today, President Bush focused on the other war, Afghanistan. The US will send 3,000 reinforcements there. And the President urged NATO nations to send more troops, as well. The President also warned that more fighting could come in Afghanistan." ABC (Ross) added that "without directly saying it, the President, today, essentially conceded that Al Qaeda is making a comeback. The comeback is taking place in the mountains of Pakistan, near the border with Afghanistan. Pakistan pulled its troops out five months ago and will not allow US troops to go in." Bush was shown saying, "Taliban, al Qaeda fighters are in remote regions of Pakistan. This is wild country. This is wilder than the Wild West."

The Financial Times (2/16, Daniel, Sevastopulo) reports, "Borrowing the rhetoric of US and Nato commanders, who are preparing to step up their campaign against the Taliban, Mr Bush said: 'This spring there's going to be a new offensive in Afghanistan. It's going to be a Nato offensive, and that's part of our strategy.'" The Pentagon "will send the 173rd Airborne brigade, which was originally scheduled for deployment to Iraq, to Afghanistan to replace another brigade whose tour was recently extended by several months." In a speech to the American Enterprise Institute, Bush "sought to set out a strategy for political and military success, saying troop increases would be sustained." USA Today (2/16, Jackson, 2.27M) notes "the American Enterprise Institute was once home to several members of the Bush administration, such as Vice President Cheney, and has long supported Bush's foreign policy initiatives."

The Washington Times (2/16, Dinan, 88K) reports the President "promised a five-part plan designed to put Afghan President Hamid Karzai's government on more solid footing, including training 26,000 more national police and 48,000 more troops for the military; strengthening NATO's commitment; improving provincial government; reversing last year's growth in heroin-producing poppy, which finances the Taliban; and helping Mr. Karzai fight corruption in the judicial system." Bush's speech "comes as a growing number of Democrats and Republicans say the administration has failed to complete the mission in Afghanistan in part because Mr. Bush has been too preoccupied in Iraq."

NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 4, 1:00, Williams, 9.87M) said the President "acknowledged the 2006 was the most violent year in Afghanistan since the US arrived there in 2001." Bush was shown saying, "We face a thinking enemy. And we face a tough enemy. They watch our actions, they adjust their tactics. And in 2006, this enemy struck back with vengeance."

The AP (2/16, Riechmann) reports, "Calling poppy cultivation a threat to a fragile democracy, Bush implored President Hamid Karzai to address the marked increase in harvests last year, after a decline in 2005. 'I have made my concerns to President Karzai pretty clear -- not pretty clear, very clear -- and that in order for him to gain the confidence of his people, and the confidence of the world, he's got to do something about it, with our help,' Bush said."

The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Reynolds, 850K) notes Bush "mentioned the troop increase as well as the administration's request for congressional approval of an additional $11.8 billion in aid over two years to shore up the government of…Karzai." Frederick D. Barton, "who studies postwar reconstruction at the nonpartisan Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the president's speech appeared aimed at preparing the public for a bloody spring in Afghanistan."

The Washington Post (2/16, A15, Baker, DeYoung, 690K) says "major NATO allies have so far resisted the sort of robust engagement that Bush wants," while McClatchy (2/16, Hutcheson) reports "analysts say that British, Danish and Canadian troops are sharing the burden with American soldiers in Afghanistan. Estonia, Poland and Romania also have helped. Most of the criticism" from the US "is directed at France, Germany, Italy, Spain and Turkey."

The Washington Post (2/15, A21, Kamen, 690K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that Bush "tried to wander off-message a little, to folksify his chat. He hailed prosecutors, judges, police and defense lawyers for going over to Afghanistan to mentor their counterparts. 'And I appreciate our own citizens going over there. It is, must be neat, really -- I guess 'neat' isn't a sophisticated word, but it must be heartening to be somebody who's helping this young democracy develop a judicial system that is worthy.' Or maybe gratifying?"

The New York Times (2/16, Stolberg, 1.16M) reports, "The speech renewed criticism from Democrats that had the United States not been tied down in Iraq, the situation in Afghanistan would not have turned dire. At the same time, some Republican lawmakers said Mr. Bush's new strategy would not do enough to tamp down the Afghan drug trade." And "outside experts criticized the president for painting too rosy a picture." The speech was also "a striking effort by the White House to focus attention back on Afghanistan at a time when Congress is debating resolutions criticizing Mr. Bush's strategy in Iraq and the administration is making a case that Iranian forces are supplying Shiite militants in Iraq with roadside bombs."

The New York Times (2/16, Kifner, 1.16M) reports on the "the 3,200 soldiers of the 10th Mountain Division whose one-year deployment in Afghanistan has been extended by four months." They "were so close to the end of their tour that their uniforms, gear and equipment had been packed into shipping containers and an advance party had already reached Fort Drum, their home in upstate New York. The extension, mentioned in…Bush's speech yesterday, was originally announced on Jan. 25." The Times adds, "About 50 soldiers from the advance party came home in late January, said Benjamin Abel, a Fort Drum spokesman. A group of about 150 were intercepted in Kuwait before they could reach the States, he added. All have since been sent back to Afghanistan as part of a buildup in anticipation of a renewed Taliban offensive in the spring."

Bush's comments on Afghanistan were extensively covered by local TV newscasts, with most stations pointing out that the President wants more assistance from NATO. Some examples: WTXL-TV Tallahassee (2/15, 11:08 pm) reported early on in its 11 o'clock news program that Bush "is asking Congress for nearly $12 billion to keep up the fight in Afghanistan." The President "wants additional troops and says our allies should follow suit. … Mr. Bush called on NATO forces to do more and said the organization will launch a new offensive this spring with the help of more US funds and the extended stay of 3,200 US troops."

KAIT-TV Jonesboro, AR (2/15, 10:13 pm) reported, "For a second day, President Bush tried to re-dedicate the people's will to a battlefield far away." While the President cited "remarkable" progress in Afghanistan, "he also painted a grim picture." The station showed the President saying, "Last year, the number of roadside bomb attacks almost doubled. Suicide bombings grew nearly five-fold. These escalating attacks were part of a Taliban offensive that made 2006 the most violent year in Afghanistan since the liberation of the country." Many other stations ran footage of the President's Afghanistan comments, including KCNC-TV Denver (2/15, 6:37 pm), WNYT-TV Albany (2/15, 5:40 pm), and KTVZ-TV Bend, OR (2/15, 5:06 pm).

Neumann Echoes Bush's Call For More Troops. In its "Embassy Row" column, the Washington Times (2/16, Morrison) reports the US ambassador to Afghanistan, Ronald Neumann, "sounded the call in Kabul for more NATO troops, as President Bush in Washington warned of the dangers of a spring offensive by Taliban forces trying to regain control in the Central Asian nation." In an interview with AFP, Neumann said he would "like to see NATO countries collectively put in place the forces that NATO and its military committee have said are necessary." The ambassador noted that some NATO "partners do a great deal," citing the troops deployments from Britain, Canada, Denmark, the Netherlands and Romania. But "did not criticize the other members of the 37-nation alliance," like Germany, who "restrict their troops from engaging in key areas in the south and east where Taliban fighters are concentrated."

Al Qaeda Releases Video Of Attacks On US Troops In Afghanistan. The AP (2/16) reports al-Qaeda posted a video on the Internet Friday "showing what they claimed to be an insurgent attack on a military position of US and Afghan forces in southern Afghanistan." The video "appears to be an attempt by the terrorist network to disparage US claims that it is winning the war against the Taliban and allied militia in Afghanistan." In the video, al-Qaeda deputy leader, Ayman al-Zawahri, is how "ridiculing President Bush and saying that his claim to have deprived al-Qaeda of a safe haven in Afghanistan" is a "bare-faced lie."

Pentagon Seeks "Rapid Acquisition Fund." USA Today (2/16, Brook, 2.27M) reports, "Fierce fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan has forced the Pentagon to speed new weapons and equipment to troops at faster rates than ever, according to military records and officials." The Pentagon budget proposed by Bush "adds even more money for what military leaders call 'urgent need' requests. For the first time, the budget includes $100 million for a Pentagon 'rapid acquisition fund' aimed at getting vital supplies to troops in the field more quickly."

As House Resolution Vote Nears, Attention Shifts To Murtha Measure. As the House moves toward an expected vote today on a nonbinding resolution criticizing President Bush's Iraq policy, reporting shifts to Rep. Jack Murtha's measure that would, in the words of the CBS Evening News (2/15, story 3, 2:05, Attkisson, 7.66M), "place substantial roadblocks in the way of the President's troop surge." CBS said Murtha, "head of the powerful committee that approves funding for the war, made it clear he plans to go well beyond symbolism." His legislation "would prohibit sending any soldiers back into battle until they've had a full year at home. It would set equipment and training requirements that the military can't currently meet. And it would stop Pentagon from extending current battlefield tours, a practice that has become routine. … At his press conference yesterday, President Bush seemed to see Murtha's tactics coming." Bush: "My hope, however, is this nonbinding resolution doesn't try to turn into a binding policy that prevents our troops from doing that what I asked them to do." Attkisson: "It's not clear yet whether Murtha's proposal can pass the House and Senate but he's clearly putting his muscle behind it."

On its front page, the Washington Post (2/16, Weisman, Murray, 690K) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "linked her support for President Bush's war-funding request to strict standards of resting, training and equipping combat forces, a move that could curtail troop deployments and alter the course of U.S. involvement in Iraq." Murtha, "a Pelosi ally, is rewriting the president's spending request to limit Bush's options in prosecuting the war." Pelosi said, "If we are going to support our troops, we should respect what is considered reasonable for them: their training, their equipment and their time at home." Also on its front page, the Washington Times (2/16, Ward, 88K) reports on the Murtha measure, saying that "some Democrats said the proposal, released on the eve of a symbolic vote against the war in Iraq, does not do enough to stop the war."

USA Today (2/16, 10A, Kiely, 2.27M) says the "showdown votes" over Iraq "may dramatize the breadth of discontent with the White House war strategy, but they also demonstrate the limits of how far Democrats are willing to go to change it." USA Today says Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid were both "cool" toward Murtha's proposal. The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Chaddock, 59K) says the "next move" could create a rift among Democrats, which is what Murtha "hopes to avoid" by opposing "a troop buildup in Iraq, without cutting funds to troops in harm's way." The Politico (2/15, Bresnahan) says Murtha "is not pushing a total cutoff of funds for the war in Iraq. But he is considering measure to limit the military actions Bush can take against Iran." He "also intends to push a provision to bar the creation of permanent U.S. military bases in Iraq and to raze the notorious Abu Ghraib prison." The AP (2/15, Flaherty) says Murtha "is quickly emerging as one of President Bush's most formidable foes in the Iraq war debate."

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (2/16, Rogers, 2.04M) said Pelosi said the nonbinding vote expected today "represents a 'huge statement' that President Bush can't 'completely ignore' even if he is unwilling to change course militarily." The Washington Post (2/16, A3, Kane, 690K) says in a headline that a "broad swath" of House GOP members are "defecting" on the resolution vote, but the article itself tallies them at just "a dozen or more." The Wall Street Journal (2/16, A4, Harwood, 2.04M) "Washington Wire" writes that "predictions range from 20 to 40" on the total number of GOP defectors.

Local TV newscasts across the country devoted widespread coverage to the continuing House debate, with many stations airing reports on the story focused on Rep. Murtha's plan to stop the surge. Some examples: WFMJ-TV Youngstown (2/15, 11:21 pm) reported that "the House moved closer to a non-binding resolution against the Bush surge in Iraq. … To try to stall the surge, a powerful Democrat today proposed cutting off funds. John Murtha, on the website of MoveCongress.org, detailed his plan not to pay to surge in any soldiers who've had too much time in Iraq or too little training." The station showed Rep. Murtha saying, "That stops the surge for all intents and purposes, because, as I said over a year ago, they cannot sustain this deployment."

WINK-TV Ft. Myers (2/15, 11:18 pm) reported, "Murtha wants any future deployments to Iraq tied to two conditions. Troops would have to meet high standards of training and they would have to get enough rest between combat tours. Murtha said that would stop the President's plan since he doesn't think a single army unit meets the standards." KPNX-TV Phoenix (2/15, 10:08 pm) and KGWN-TV Cheyenne (2/18, 10:02 pm) were just two of the many other local TV stations in various parts of the country also taking note of Murtha's anti-surge plan.

Members Of House Air Views On Resolution. USA Today (2/16, 10A, Kiely, Kiely, 2.27M) samples the views of four representatives – all Democrats – who support the resolution, and four – all Republicans – who oppose it. Among the supporters, Rep. Mike McIntyre said, "We cannot continue to increase troop levels in Iraq at the expense of allowing the Taliban to come back into power in Afghanistan." Rep. John Conyers said, "This week, we tell this administration enough is enough; stop ignoring the American people; stop ignoring your generals." Among the opponents, Rep. Jack Kingston said, "Here is what the Democrats are up to: Dearest troops, we support you, but your mission is in the tank. … You are on your own." Rep. Dan Burton said, "If we don't deal with this problem now, we will deal with it later, and the costs will be a heck of a lot more than it is today, and it may involve millions and millions of lives."

And on Fox News' Your World (2/15, Cavuto), Rep. Eric Cantor said, "We're at war right now. We have real lives, men and women, on the battlefield, in the arena, in Baghdad, as we speak. … What kind of message is that to them? We have got to give them everything they need right now to fight and win this war."

Iraq Setting Up "Constitutional Clash" Between White House, Congress. The Washington Post (2/16, A5, Abramowitz, 690K) says that while Bush "has not been shy about asserting robust powers for the presidency in waging war," he has recently "seemed to concede that Congress has a role to play as well. Lawmakers, he has indicated, are within their rights to try to cap total deployments or limit where troops can go in Iraq." But as the "debate in Congress shifts from nonbinding resolutions of disapproval for adding troops in Iraq to attaching conditions on funding for the war, a constitutional clash between the legislative and executive branches may be inevitable, say lawmakers and legal scholars with close ties to the administration." The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Hook, 850K) reports that while congressional Democrats "quickly and easily united behind a nonbinding resolution denouncing President Bush's plan to send more U.S. troops to Iraq," the party will next "confront more divisive questions: how to force a determined president to back down from his plan, and whether to push for a complete withdrawal."

Vilsack Says Congress Should Cut Off Funding For Iraq War. Presidential candidate Tom Vilsack said on NBC's Tonight Show With Jay Leno (2/15) that he would end the Iraq war immediately, adding, "I would ask Congress to have the constitutional fortitude and the moral authority to say to the President, 'Mr. President, you've made a serious mistake. We're cutting off funding now. We're going to bring our troops home.'"

Democratic State Legislators Push Resolutions Against Surge. The New York Times (2/16, A14, Steinhauer, 1.16M) reports state legislators across the country, "frustrated by the inability of Democrats in Congress to pass a resolution opposing President Bush's policies in Iraq," are "pushing forward with their own resolutions. Resolutions have passed in chambers of three legislatures, in California, Iowa and Vermont. The Maryland General Assembly sent a letter to its Congressional delegation, signed by a majority of the State Senate and close to a majority of the House, urging opposition to the increase in troops in Iraq. Letters or resolutions are being drafted in at least 19 other states."

Eagleburger Says Resolution Shows "Weakness To Our Enemies." On Fox News' Your World (2/15, Cavuto), ex-Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger said, "It sends a bad message. It sends a bad message to the troops. It sends a bad message -- or a good one, depending on your point of view -- to our enemies. It does everything that I should think some decades of American history would tell us we should never do, and that is show our weakness to our enemies."

Broder Says Bush "Poised For A Political Comeback." In his Washington Post (2/16, A23, 690K) column, headlined "Bush Regains His Footing," David Broder writes, "It may seem perverse to suggest that, at the very moment the House of Representatives is repudiating his policy in Iraq, President Bush is poised for a political comeback. But don't be astonished if that is the case." Bush "now shows signs of renewed energy and is regaining the initiative on several fronts. More important, he is demonstrating political smarts that even his critics have to acknowledge. His reaction to the planned House vote opposing the increase he ordered in US troops deployed to Iraq illustrates the point." Bush "did three things to diminish the impact of that impending defeat," by arguing that the "House was at odds with the Senate," by minimizing the "stakes in the House debate by endorsing the good motives of his critics," and that by "contrasting today's vote on a nonbinding resolution with the pending vote on funding the war in Iraq," shifting "the battleground to a fight he is likely to win."

Reid Schedules Senate Resolution Procedural Vote For Saturday. The Washington Post (2/16, A2, Milbank, 690K) writes that "after four years of fighting in Iraq, and two weeks of trying to force senators to debate the conflict, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid yesterday wheeled out the ultimate weapon. He ordered his colleagues to work on Saturday." The New York Times (2/16, A8, Zeleny, Toner, 1.16M) reports that as the House "prepared to pass a symbolic resolution denouncing President Bush's war policy," in the Senate, Reid "abruptly scheduled a weekend debate on Iraq in an effort to break a stalemate and avoid impressions that partisan bickering was weighing down deliberations over the war." When they convene Saturday afternoon, senators "will not debate the Iraq resolution itself. Instead, they will be taking up a procedural vote required under Senate rules to move forward to the actual debate."

The Washington Times (2/16, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Reid "said he did not take members' 2008 aspirations -- or planned weekend visits to Iowa and New Hampshire -- into consideration" in scheduling the vote." Sen. Joseph Biden "was the first to say he would scrap plans for an Iowa visit to make sure he participated" in the vote, while Sen. Hillary Clinton will pop back to Washington from New Hampshire, then return to the leadoff primary state after the vote. Sen. Sam Brownback "will stay for the vote," but "there was no indication Sen. John McCain…would reschedule his morning town-hall forum in Des Moines." The plans of Sens. Christopher Dodd and Barack Obama remain unclear.

Biden Seeks To Narrow Bush's Iraq Authority. The AP (2/15, Schweid) reports Biden said he would "move to repeal the authority Congress gave President Bush in 2002 to send U.S. troops into Iraq and replace it with a narrower mandate." Biden, who chairs the Foreign Relations Committee, "said the legislation was based on the idea that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction and was designed to oust Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein." He said he is "working to repeal the authorization and to replace it with 'a much narrower mission statement for our troops in Iraq.'"

Asked on CNN's The Situation Room (2/15, Blitzer) about Bush's remark that "this may become the first time in the history of the United States Congress that it has voted to send a new commander into battle and then voted to oppose his plan that is necessary to succeed in that battle," Biden said, "I think that's ridiculous. It's a little bit like saying that because I opposed the war in Iraq that I should be against the military. I mean this is the President of the United States' plan. It's not Petraeus' plan. … I know Gen. Petraeus. He's a fine guy and he's perfectly capable of leading our forces. The policy he's asked to lead on is a mistake. … He's sending 17,500 people into the middle of Baghdad, 6.2 million people, a lot of them without the right armor, without the right vests. We ought to get real here. This is a president who sent our troops to war unprepared. He didn't send enough of them to war. Now he's sending them in the middle of a civil war."

Auditors Say $10 Billion Wasted In Iraq Reconstruction Efforts. The AP (2/16, Yen) reports, "About $10 billion has been squandered by the US government on Iraq reconstruction aid because of contractor overcharges and unsupported expenses, and federal investigators warned Thursday that significantly more taxpayer money is at risk." The "three top auditors overseeing work in Iraq told a House committee" their review "of $57 billion in Iraq contracts found that Defense and State department officials condoned or allowed repeated work delays, bloated expenses and payments for shoddy work or work never done. More than one in six dollars charged by US contractors were questionable or unsupported, nearly triple the amount of waste the Government Accountability Office estimated last fall." David M. Walker, "who heads the auditing arm of Congress," said, "There is no accountability."

The Wall Street Journal (2/16, A4, Paltrow, 2.04M) reports, "Under questioning by the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, Defense Contract Audit Agency chief William Reed confirmed that unsupported and questionable costs found in Iraq reconstruction contracting total more than $10 billion -- nearly three times the previous public estimate." Under Chairman Henry Waxman, "the committee is holding a series of hearings into contracting abuses in Iraq. Staffers confirmed that Mr. Waxman and other committee Democrats likely will take a much wider look at defense contracting after the Iraq hearings conclude."

Al Qaeda In Iraq Head Reportedly Wounded As Security Push Sweep Continues. The CBS Evening News (2/15, story 4, :25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The Iraqi Interior Ministry claims tonight its forces wounded a major terrorist leader. He's Abu Ayyub al-Masri, the head of the group known as Al Qaeda in Iraq. The US military has not confirmed the report, and the Iraqis did not say what his condition is or whether he's in custody. But they do say his top aide was killed in a battle near Balad, north of Baghdad." NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 3, 2:05, Williams, 9.87M) also reported on the "showdown between Al Qaeda and the Iraqi police. And one of Iraq's most wanted was wounded but apparently not captured."

The Washington Post (2/16, A13, Londoño, 690K) reports "US officials have said Masri took over the leadership of the insurgent group following the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who was killed by US forces in a June 2006 airstrike."

USA Today (2/16, 11A, 2.27M) reports, "Meanwhile Thursday, US and Iraqi forces pushed deeper into Sunni militant strongholds in Baghdad as part of a wide-ranging security sweep of the capital." US and Iraqi soldiers "set up dozens of roadway checkpoints around the city and conducted top-to-bottom searches of vehicles as part of their new campaign to disarm militias and pacify the capital. Low-flying fighter jets thundered over the capital. A spokesman for the US military in Baghdad, Maj. Steven Lamb, said 17 suspects were arrested and three weapons caches seized."

The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Daragahi, 850K) reports, "On Thursday, US forces often found themselves back at the small bases they used in the early months after the 2003 invasion. The facilities were abandoned as US commanders under the direction of Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. decided to lower the American profile in neighborhoods and hand security over to Iraqi forces." The Times adds, "Since then, a once-vibrant Baghdad has become a forbidding maze of concrete walls and concertina wire roamed by mysterious gunmen, where petrified residents rush to their homes before dark."

ABC World News (2/15, story 4, 2:05, Gibson, 8.78M) said US and Iraqi troops "have begun a security crackdown in Baghdad, setting up checkpoints and pushing into militant strong holds in Baghdad. We have seen Pentagon documents from almost five years ago that indicate Defense officials in their prewar planning thought that at this point after the war, there would only be a few thousand troops left in Iraq. Obviously, they were way off in their estimate." The CBS Evening News (2/15, story 5, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) was similarly critical, saying the "security crackdown continued today in the capital with US and Iraqi forces moving into a Sunni neighborhood after sweeping three Shiite sections yesterday. For most of the city, the crackdown is not yet stopping the violence."

Iraqi President Says Sadr Has Ordered Top Deputies To Leave Country. The Washington Post (2/16, A13, Londoño, 690K) reports "Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said anti-American Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr has ordered his top deputies to leave Iraq in order to ease the implementation of the Baghdad security plan, which U.S. and Iraqi forces began to roll out this week. Sadr, the leader of the powerful Mahdi Army militia, recently went to Iran, according to US officials." In Washington, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates "said he believed that Sadr's followers were concerned about the new operation to secure Baghdad and suggested that Sadr and his militia would 'go to ground' over the coming months."

The New York Times (2/16, A10, Cave, 1.16M) reports, "Questions and accusations continued to swirl about the whereabouts of the militant Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr on Thursday. … Two Shiite leaders stepped forward on Thursday to confirm American reports this week that Mr. Sadr had gone to Iran." But they and a "Parliament member from a different Shiite party" took exception to "suggestions that he had fled because of a crackdown on militias and had permanently moved to Iran. They said that the cleric often visited the country and that it was unclear why he had left or when he would come back." One said he "could return to Iraq on Friday."

On Fox News' Your World (2/15, Cavuto), ex-Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger said of Sadr, "He is a coward. He is not ready to fight it out. And he's not ready to stay around. He has run off when the going gets tough. I happen to know that, a long time ago, when [Paul] Bremer was running that operation in Iraq, he recommended to Washington that they go in and get al-Sadr in his fortress there in Baghdad at the time. And Washington came back and told him no. And, if there is any bad judgment that was involved in this, that was one of them. If they had gotten him back in those early days, we wouldn't have all this mess now."

Schoomaker Says Surge Of 17,500 Just "Tip Of The Iceberg." The Washington Post (2/16, A13, Tyson, 690K) reports outgoing Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker said the "increase of 17,500 Army combat troops in Iraq represents only the 'tip of the iceberg' and will potentially require thousands of additional support troops and trainers, as well as equipment -- further eroding the Army's readiness to respond to other world contingencies."

Peretz Says Iraq Failure Would Be "Huge Defeat" For Both Bush And Liberalism. In a Wall Street Journal (2/16, A15, 2.04M) op-ed, New Republic editor in chief Martin Peretz writes, "Our political imagination of evil is impoverished, and nowhere is it more impoverished than in Iraq. Even today, when the blood of innocents flows so richly and regularly, we do not seem to grasp its origins, or its power. That is, we do not seem to grasp the centrality, and the perdurability, of culture. And in this regard, the president and his party, as well as the Democratic Party, are equally blinded by their respective orthodoxies. … The carnage between Shia and Sunni, and the carnage among other religious and ethnic communions, since the end of Ottoman rule have left deep and bloodied breaches in Iraq. If these cannot be repaired, it will be a huge defeat for George Bush -- and, whatever many liberals think of it, for liberalism as well."

US To Open Doors To As Many As 7,000 Iraqi Refugees. NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 9, , Williams, 9.87M) ran an "In Depth" report on the State Department announcement "that as many as 7,000 refugees from the Iraq war will be allowed to come to this country. There has been criticism that the US government still isn't doing enough to help Iraqis, help those who have risked their lives to help the American war effort in Iraq." NBC (Colt) profiled one Iraqi who acted as an interpreter for American forces, reporting that the State Department will offer "no priority for Iraqis" like him. Sen. Edward Kennedy "says that is not fair." Kennedy: "For those individuals in particular, we have a special responsibility. We have to do everything to protect them."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Prusher, 59K) writes that "only 202 Iraqis were permitted to take refuge in the US in 2006. Since the US-led invasion, 466 Iraqis have been allowed entry to the US as refugees, according to figures given by the State Department at a Senate hearing last month. The numbers are particularly stark in comparison with the scope of a burgeoning refugee problem. The UN High Commissioner for Refugees estimates that there are some 2 million Iraqi refugees, most in the region, with the numbers in Jordan rivaled only by those in Syria. Add to that number another 1.8 million Iraqis who are internally displaced. During the first half of 2006, the UN says, Iraqis became the largest asylum-seeking nationality in Europe."

Iraqi Living In New York Says She Has "Not Left The War." In a New York Times (2/16, A23, 1.16M) op-ed, Ayub Nuri, a former reporter for the Institute for War and Peace Reporting, writes, "I am an Iraqi, and although I love my country, I needed to get out. … But on my first day in New York, I realized that I had not left the war. Rather, it had followed me here, and I had to fight it every day. Every time I talked to someone at a party, in a taxi or at the store, the same chain of questions would follow after I said I was from Iraq. Some people gaped. Others sat silent for a second, then shook my hand differently. 'Wow, so interesting,' they would say. 'So what do you think of the whole situation? What went wrong over there?' Finally, the inevitable: 'Do you think we should pull out?' … No matter how I perceive the war, no matter how many more friends I lose, no matter who is killing whom, as long as there is a war, I have to live with its nightmares and fight them thousands of miles away."

Camp Pendleton Ceremony Honors Fallen Marines. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Perry, 850K) reports that in a Camp Pendleton ceremony "filled with tears and expressions of pride, 100 members of the Regimental Combat Team 5 killed during the recent deployment in Iraq were remembered Thursday as among 'the finest young men our nation has ever produced.'" Regimental commanding officer Col. Larry Nicholson "said the 100 were part of the 'newest greatest generation' who answered their nation's call after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks."

Soldier Discussed His Personal Mission On Web Page. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Watanabe, 850K) also runs a 2,000-word piece on Army 2nd Lt. Mark Jennings Daily, who discussed his reasons for joining the Army and going to Iraq on a MySpace Web page. Daily was killed by a roadside bomb in Mosul last month.

Military Death Gratuity Sometimes Fails To Reach Survivors In Need. In a front-page piece, the Washington Post (2/15, George, 690K) writes about the "$100,000 'death gratuity' that military spouses ordinarily get -- a payment intended to ease the financial strain as families await government survivors' benefits" – and how non-traditional families cope. Susan Jaenke "is not a wife, not a husband, but instead grandmother to the 9-year-old her daughter left behind" when she was killed in Iraq. By law, "the $100,000 benefit goes first to a spouse or a child. So 9-year-old Kayla Jaenke collects the $100,000 -- plus $400,000 in life insurance -- after she turns 18, leaving Susan Jaenke to ask, 'What about the next nine years?' In some other families, the $100,000 death benefit has gone to neither the children nor the grandparents who are raising them."

Post Offices Named After Soldiers Killed In Action. USA Today (2/16, 1A, Zoroya, Hortobagyi, 2.27M) reports, "Federal lawmakers are increasingly naming post offices in their states after troops killed in combat, a tribute traditionally reserved for former members of Congress and famous figures such as Bob Hope and Ronald Reagan. Since 2003, the gesture has honored 26 servicemembers who died in Iraq and Afghanistan: 17 soldiers, seven Marines, a Navy SEAL and an Air National Guardsman. … Democrats and Republicans alike push the bills."

Former White House Counsel Linked To US Attorney Dismissal. The New York Times (2/16, Johnston) reports, "A United States attorney in Arkansas who was dismissed from his job last year by the Justice Department was ousted after Harriet E. Miers, the former White House counsel, intervened on behalf of the man who replaced him, according to Congressional aides briefed on the matter." The Times continues, "Ms. Miers, the aides said, phoned an aide to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales suggesting the appointment of J. Timothy Griffin, a former military and civilian prosecutor who was a political director for the Republican National Committee and a deputy to Karl Rove, the White House political adviser. … Later, the incumbent United States attorney, H. E. Cummins III, was removed without explanation and replaced on an interim basis by Mr. Griffin. Officials at the White House and Justice Department declined to comment on Ms. Miers's role in the matter." The Times adds, "Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, said at a hearing last week that Mr. Cummins had done nothing wrong but was removed to make room for Mr. Griffin. It was not known at the time Mr. McNulty testified that Ms. Miers had intervened on Mr. Griffin's behalf. … Her involvement was disclosed on Wednesday by Justice Department officials led by Mr. McNulty, who held a closed-door briefing for senators on the Judiciary Committee after Democrats criticized the dismissals of 7 to 10 United States attorneys as politically motivated. … Ms. Miers, whose resignation as White House counsel was effective Jan. 31, could not be reached for comment Thursday." The Times notes, "At the briefing, Justice Department officials denied that the White House had been involved in any of the other dismissals, suggesting that the department had acted on its own after advising the White House of its intention to remove incumbents. … Democrats have said the removals represented an effort to make room for rising political favorites of the Bush administration and to be rid of independent-minded prosecutors, all of whom had been appointed by President Bush."

GOP Blocks Bill To Limit DOJ Appointment Power. The AP (2/16, Kellman) reports, "Senate Republicans blocked a bill Thursday that would curb the Justice Department's power to fire and replace federal prosecutors. Democrats had sought to give the courts a role in the appointments of U.S. attorneys, to GOP opposition." The AP continues, "The objection by Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., to the proposal was long anticipated. So Democrats used the occasion to complain anew about the firings of at least seven prosecutors, including John McKay in Seattle, under a little-known part of the Patriot Act." The AP adds, 'Democrats say Attorney General Alberto Gonzales used the law to get around the Senate confirmation process and install Republican allies. … 'I believe that their intent was to bring in people from the outside to give some of their bright people an opportunity,' said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. 'That is wrong.' … Her bill says a replacement U.S. attorney could serve no longer than 120 days without confirmation. After that time, an interim replacement would be named by a U.S. District Court." The AP notes, "Gonzales, Kyl and other Republicans say this approach could lead prosecutors to be appointed for reasons other than their qualifications. … Republican and Democratic leaders tried for a compromise that might lengthen the 120-day period or curb a district court's appointment power, but those efforts were abandoned early Thursday, according to officials on both sides. … A private briefing Wednesday night by Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty did not change any Democrats' minds about the firings of the prosecutors, senators said. … Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., said that if the Justice Department does not provide detailed performance reports on the fired prosecutors, the Senate Judiciary Committee would subpoena them. … 'I am not satisfied with the answers we've gotten. There are just too many holes in too many different places,' Schumer said."

Reasons For McKay's Dismissal Still Unclear. The Seattle Times (2/16, Bowermaster) reports, "Two months after John McKay was fired as U.S. attorney for the Western District of Washington, the reason for his dismissal remains a mystery. … One of the most persistent rumors in Seattle legal circles is that the Justice Department forced McKay, a Republican, to resign to appease Washington state Republicans angry over the 2004 governor's race. Some believe McKay's dismissal was retribution for his failure to convene a federal grand jury to investigate allegations of voter fraud in the race." The Times continues, "The Evergreen Freedom Foundation filed a formal complaint with U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in 2005 about what it considered McKay's lax oversight of the election, in which Democratic Gov. Christine Gregoire defeated Republican Dino Rossi by 129 votes. Many influential Republicans publicly criticized McKay. … But a Justice Department official on Thursday rejected the idea and said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty has repeatedly insisted politics did not influence the controversial firings of McKay and six other U.S. attorneys in December." The Times adds, "McNulty had previously said the firings were 'performance-related' despite the fact McKay received a positive evaluation seven months before he was fired. … McKay said he was not given a reason when he was asked to step down." The Times notes, "McNulty defended the dismissals during private briefings with a handful of senators Wednesday. … The Justice Department official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, accused Democrats of mischaracterizing the briefings because they didn't agree with the department's conclusions. … 'Any suggestion that we were not thorough or forthcoming is just political gamesmanship,' the official said."

Interim California US Attorneys Named. The AP (2/16, Hoffman) reports, "The Justice Department announced temporary replacements Thursday for two recently ousted U.S. attorneys in San Diego and San Francisco." The AP continues, "Outgoing San Diego chief federal prosecutor Carol Lam will be succeeded by Karen Hewitt, a career federal prosecutor who is currently the executive assistant U.S. attorney for the Southern District of California. … In San Francisco, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan will be replaced by Scott Schools, a career federal prosecutor who currently works for the Justice Department overseeing legal guidance and personnel matters for all 94 U.S. attorney's offices across the country." The AP adds, "Hewitt's appointment was announced as staff and local law enforcement personnel gathered for a simple office farewell party just hours before Lam was due to leave her post. Ryan was scheduled to depart on Friday. …

Both Hewitt and Schools will serve on an interim basis until new U.S. attorneys are nominated by the White House and confirmed by the Senate."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/16, Thornton) reports, "Karen P. Hewitt, third-in-command at the San Diego U.S. Attorney's office, has been chosen by Justice Department officials to replace outgoing top prosecutor Carol Lam on a temporary basis while a committee searches for a permanent candidate." The Union-Tribune continues, "Hewitt joined the San Diego office in 2000 and prosecuted civil fraud cases before she was appointed Executive Assistant U.S. attorney a year ago. … Before coming to San Diego, she was a lawyer in the Justice Department's civil division in Washington, where she specialized in constitutional law and civil rights cases for about eight years."

The Oakland Tribune (2/16, Richman) reports, "The Justice Department named an interim replacement today for U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, who'll spend his last day as Northern California's top federal prosecutor Friday." The Tribune continues, "Ryan was one seven U.S. Attorneys across the nation who recently resigned or were forced out by the Bush Administration. U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., spoke today on the Senate floor in favor of a bill protecting her chamber's constitutional power to confirm those appointed to these jobs. … The interim U.S. Attorney for this region -- including coastal counties and a few inland counties from Monterey Bay to the Oregon border -- will be Scott Schools, who has been general counsel to the Justice Department's Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys. That Washington, D.C.-based agency provides legal guidance in ethics and employee matters to federal prosecutors' offices from coast to coast." The Tribune adds, "From 2001 to 2005, Schools was First Assistant U.S. Attorney in South Carolina, overseeing about 125 attorneys and support staff; before that, he'd served as interim U.S. Attorney there for nine months. He was a prosecutor in that office from 1989 to 1992 and from 1997 to 2001; between those periods, he was in private practice."

KPIX-TV, CBS 5, San Francisco (2/16) reports, "United States Attorney Kevin Ryan announced this afternoon that Friday will be his last day on the job, and the Justice Department simultaneously named a former South Carolina federal prosecutor as his interim replacement." KPIX-TV continues, Ryan had announced last month that he was stepping down after more than four years heading the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Northern District of California, which encompasses 14 coastal and Bay Area counties stretching from Big Sur to the Oregon border. … 'I am grateful to have had the opportunity to serve as the United States Attorney. I sincerely thank all of the staff at the office for their hard work to make our community a safer place to live. I also thank all of our partners in law enforcement who have put in countless hours in investigating and prosecuting crimes in Northern California,' Ryan said in a statement."

Lam Heading To Qualcomm. The AP (2/16, Hoffman) reports, "Qualcomm Inc. said Thursday that recently ousted U.S. Attorney Carol Lam will join its legal department as senior vice president and legal counsel, effective Feb. 26." The AP continues, "The San Diego-based wireless technology giant is currently embroiled in a global web of lawsuits with Nokia Corp. and other major equipment makers that claim Qualcomm levies unjust, inflated licensing fees to use its patented technologies in their products. … Regulators in Europe, South Korea and Japan are probing Qualcomm's business practices as the company trades lawsuits with rivals across the U.S. and Europe. … 'From our perspective, she's the ideal person,' said Louis Lupin, Qualcomm's general counsel. 'She's got experience managing large and very complex cases and a very large staff, and she'll be involved on a global basis.'"

Senate Democrats Said To Be Playing Politics With War On Terror. In Wall Street Journal's "Potomac Watch" column (2/16, 14), Kimberley Strassel criticizes Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Majority Leader Harry Reid for their focus on the Bush Justice Department's firing of seven US attorneys. Reid is "labeling the firings 'cronygate,' and accusing the administration of ousting capable U.S. attorneys in order to award political allies with plum posts. Ms. Feinstein went further, suggesting the administration's real goal was to circumvent the Senate confirmation process." The Senate is "lurching back to a pre-9/11 mentality, putting politics and turf ahead of key security issues. If Ms. Feinstein wins this battle, the appointment procedure reverts to the status quo ante. Under that old process, the attorney general can appoint an interim U.S. attorney for 120 days. But if the Senate doesn't get around to confirming a full-time replacement by then, the federal courts get to name a new interim." That "old system was primarily a constitutional oddity, but it also posed a threat to terror investigations."

More Commentary. In an op-ed for the San Diego Union-Tribune (2/16), former Congressman Lionel Van Deerlin writes, "Carol Lam gathers her belongings today, and departs the office of U.S. Attorney in California's Southern District. Because she faithfully honors a Justice Department tradition of silence, no one can be sure why she's leaving. She's not talking about it. … But what an exit line she gave us Tuesday with those eleventh-hour indictments. … Hours before returning to private life, our U.S. attorney took an action widening the net that snared San Diego's Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham. Her swan song racked up three more suspected miscreants. … And so, the question presses ever more urgently – why has the Bush administration sacked Carol Lam and six other trusted U.S. attorneys? No one, it seems, feels required to say. Only one of the seven, New Mexico's David Iglesia, demanded to be told why he was terminated, but got no explanation. … Custom holds that federal prosecutors serve 'at the pleasure of the president,' who is free to appoint or remove them without explanation. Yet the Justice Department has shown itself pretty touchy about these most recent switches. Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty seemed shaken before the Senate Judiciary Committee. New York's hard-charging Sen. Charles E. Schumer had wondered aloud if the hiring and firing of prosecutors reflected politics, rather than prudence. … 'When I hear you talk about the politicizing of the Department of Justice, it's like a knife in my heart,' McNulty stammered. Perhaps this sensitive fellow should seek a gentler assignment, sparing him the hostility he and others will face if we don't get a fuller explanation of what Justice is up to." Van Deerlin adds, "It might seem rash to accuse Bush administration masterminds of pulling political strings, but nothing surfacing thus far discourages skepticism. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' child-like mantra, 'at the pleasure of the president,' rings hollow. Let's nail this idea that the president – any president – handpicks the dozens of lawyers in line for prosecutorial slots across the land. He's not likely to know even the names of most. Recommendation for appointments is usually left to senators of the president's party. Inasmuch as both California senators are presently Democrats, Bush has relied on a selection system said to be headed by the veteran Rancho Santa Fe Republican politico and presidential insider Gerald Parsky. .. Parsky is astute enough to know that the way this switch has been managed so far adds up to abysmally bad politics. It suggests that public corruption, which figured so prominently in last year's election outcome, might no longer concern us. Are we to suppose that Congressman Cunningham was a lone stroller on his path to perdition? … We may soon know better – and only, perhaps, because Carol Lam refused to fold her tent as many expected her to do."

DOJ_NMG_0133131

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former GC For Monster Pleads Guilty In Options Backdating Probe. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Davies) reports, "The former general counsel of Monster Worldwide Inc. pleaded guilty to two criminal charges related to backdating stock options, ensnared in large part because of a series of damaging emails that helped prosecutors build the case against him." The Journal continues, "Myron Olesnyckyj, 45 years old, entered his guilty plea Thursday in Manhattan federal court to conspiracy and securities fraud. He admitted in court that he systematically backdated stock option grant dates, concealed the expense in company financial disclosures, and provided misleading information to auditors." The Journal adds, "In one email filed in court by prosecutors yesterday, Mr. Olesnyckyj instructed a human resources executive not to discuss a company practice of giving new hires options at the lowest stock price in the month after they joined the company, a form of backdating. He wrote: 'no written document should ever state lowest price over next 30 days! The auditorw [sic] will view that as backdating options and we'll have a charge to earning in the amount of the difference between price on day 30 and any lower price which is used.' … Mr. Olesnyckyj, who joined Monster in 1994 and was fired last year, is expected to cooperate with federal prosecutors against Monster founder Andrew McKelvey. Mr. McKelvey, who hasn't been charged, quit rather than be interviewed by company lawyers examining Monster's options problems."

The Washington Post/AP (2/16, D2, Neumeister) reports that Olesnyckyj "faces up to 25 years in prison and fines of more than $5.2 million after pleading guilty to securities fraud and conspiracy to commit securities fraud. His guilty plea was part of an agreement in which he promised to cooperate fully in return for leniency. … Olesnyckyj said his crimes occurred between 1996 and 2006, when he agreed with others at the company to backdate options and hide the action from federal regulatory agencies and investors. He agreed to forfeit $381,000, which he said was the amount he gained from the scheme." The AP adds, 'The Securities and Exchange Commission on Thursday filed a civil complaint against Olesnyckyj for securities fraud in connection to backdating. … The charges were the first for a Monster executive related to the backdating scandal at the company, which overstated the value of its earnings by more than $250 million between 1997 and 2005. Backdating involves issuing stock options retroactively to coincide with low points in the share price, thus boosting payouts. It can be illegal if it is not properly accounted for and disclosed to investors."

USA Today (2/16, 3B, Iwata) reports, "Mark Schonfeld, head of the SEC office in New York, said: 'Olesnyckyj knew that backdating was wrong, but nonetheless went along with the scheme. Any lawyer who works at a public company should do everything possible to thwart fraud — not participate in it.' … The backdating scheme and improper accounting of stock options led Monster to falsely inflate its net income from 1997 to 2005 by $340 million, the charges said. Monster, the parent of the online job service Monster.com, said it was profitable in 1999 and 2000, when it actually lost $40 million, the government charged." USA notes, "The backdating scandal at Monster arose last year when the company announced an internal investigation. The company's investigation led to the ouster of Olesnyckyj and the resignation of former CEO Andrew McKelvey."

Options Backdating Probes Accelerate. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, A1, Bandler, Forelle) reports, "On Jan. 4, 2002, the chief financial officer of Broadcom Corp. tapped out an email about stock options to his chief executive and others. … 'I VERY strongly recommend that these options be priced as of December 24,' he wrote. … They were, and that was fortunate for recipients. Broadcom's share price rose 23% between the two dates. The pretense that the options had been granted on the earlier date made them extra valuable." … It also violated the rationale of stock options. They give recipients a right to buy stock in the future at the price when the options are granted, so that recipients can profit only if the price of their company's stock goes up. Setting a lower 'exercise price' for the options gives recipients a head start on profiting." The Journal adds, "The Broadcom correspondence, found in an internal investigation at the maker of communication chips, is just one of a number of internal documents that have drawn the attention of federal prosecutors and Federal Bureau of Investigation agents in Orange County, Calif. Prosecutors are strongly considering filing criminal charges against the former Broadcom chief financial officer who wrote the email, William J. Ruehle, and at least one other former executive, according to people familiar with the situation. … Mr. Ruehle's lawyer said his client didn't break the law." The Journal notes, "The Broadcom probe is a sign of how long-running investigations of stock-options backdating are heating up. Yesterday, a former general counsel of Monster Worldwide Inc. pleaded guilty to securities fraud in federal court in Manhattan. The day before, the founder of Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. pleaded guilty to a New York State charge in a backdating scheme. … Prosecutors in a half-dozen jurisdictions are zeroing in on other cases. The filing of criminal charges in some of these in coming months would mark a watershed in the scandal, as prosecutors and regulators winnow the roster of some 140 companies with options problems to a tighter list of promising cases. … The government is nearing charges against a former official of computer-security company McAfee Inc., say people familiar with the situation, and is strongly considering bringing cases against ex-executives of Apple Inc. and semiconductor-equipment maker KLA-Tencor Corp. In St. Louis, at least one former executive of Engineered Support Systems Inc., a defense contractor now owned by DRS Technologies Inc. of Parsippany, N.J., has been told of a likely charge, says a person close to the matter."

New Executive Pay Tables Don't Include All Options Data. The Washington Post (2/16, D1, Cho, Johnson) reports, "The first overhaul in 15 years of executive-pay disclosures has been billed as the most transparent window ever into the clubby world of corporate compensation. … But as these filings have begun to roll out publicly, analysts are finding there's a catch." The Post continues, "Due to an accounting loophole for stock options and an eleventh-hour rule change made by securities regulators just before Christmas, some of the biggest names in technology, health care and financial services will be able to cloud what their top executives make. … The anomaly is being discovered by compensation consultants who have been hired by firms to draft these filings. In some cases, it is lowering the compensation figures reported by firms, they said. In others, executives who should be named in the filings as the five highest-paid officers in their companies are being replaced with employees making less." The Post adds, "The Securities and Exchange Commission's first changes to pay disclosures since 1992 were meant to be user-friendly. Shareholders could look at a summary table and easily see what the top executives of a company were taking home in salary, perks, retirement bonuses and stock options. … SEC officials said they had no control over which companies used the stock options loophole. But they said the agency's late December rule change will provide more accurate figures in the long run and will better reflect what an executive is making in a given year. Although the summary table may not provide full information on options, that data will be included elsewhere in the filing, they said."

DOJ Will Not Challenge 5th Circuit Dismissal Of Enron-Related Convictions. The Houston Chronicle (2/16, Hays) reports, "The Justice Department has decided not to challenge an appeals court's decision last year to throw out most of the 2004 convictions against several former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives in an Enron-related case. … But three of those former executives — who each served nearly a year in prison before being released pending the result of their appeals — could still be retried on charges of participating in a sham deal to help Enron book bogus profits." The Chronicle continues, "Justice Department spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch said Thursday that federal prosecutors had decided not to appeal the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals' ruling to the U.S. Supreme Court. The Justice Department had until Friday to make that call. … 'While we review the matter before the district court, we remain committed to holding accountable those responsible for the massive frauds that accompanied the collapse of Enron,' Lesch said." The Chronicle adds, "She declined to say whether prosecutors will retry Daniel Bayly, Merrill's former head of investment banking; James A. Brown, former head of the firm's asset lease group; and Robert Furst, the brokerage's former liaison with Enron. .. .A status hearing in the case is slated for this afternoon. … Last August, the appellate court threw out fraud and conspiracy convictions of Bayly, Brown, Furst and a fourth former Merrill executive, William Fuhs. A jury in 2004 convicted all four of fraud and conspiracy for helping push through a deal in which the brokerage pretended to buy three power barges from Enron so the energy company could appear to have made earnings targets in late 1999."

Two Former Enron Traders Sentenced To Probation For Energy Price Manipulation. The AP (2/16, Kravets) reports, "Two of three former Enron Corp. traders accused of driving up energy prices during California's power crisis were each sentenced in federal court to two years of court-supervised release." The AP continues, "Timothy Belden, the former head of trading in Enron's Portland, Oregon, office, was sentenced Wednesday after pleading guilty in October 2002 to one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud. Belden's plea was the first prosecution of anyone related to the West's energy crisis in 2000 and 2001. He had faced up to five years in prison and must forfeit $2.1 million." The AP adds, "The second defendant, Jeffrey Richter, was a lower-level trading manager in charge of the so-called 'short-term desk' who also pleaded guilty to two counts related to manipulating energy prices. He had faced up to five years and agreed to pay a $410,000 fine. … A third trader, the alleged mastermind behind the scheme, is expected to be sentenced next month for his role in the scam that fraudulently sent California energy prices soaring, causing energy shortages and rolling blackouts." The AP notes, "Internal company memos describe how Belden's trading unit took power out of California at a time of rolling blackouts and shortages and sold it out of state to elude price caps, according to documents obtained by investigators. … Enron bought California power at cheap, capped prices, routed it outside the state, then sold it back into California at vastly inflated prices, authorities said. The sham trades were designed to circumvent the California-only price caps on wholesale energy. … The crisis played a role in Pacific Gas & Electric Co.'s bankruptcy and will leave California consumers paying abnormally high electricity prices for years."

Investment Manager Jailed For Seven Years for Contempt In Fraud Case. The New York Times (2/16, Morgenson) reports, "On Jan. 14, 2000, Martin A. Armstrong, a globe-trotting investment manager, was told to produce $15 million in gold and antiquities, as well as documents, in response to a civil suit by the government accusing him of securities fraud involving hundreds of millions of dollars. … When he said that he did not have the items and could not produce them, a federal judge ordered him jailed for contempt of court." The Times continues, "Seven years later, Mr. Armstrong sits in the Metropolitan Correctional Center in Lower Manhattan. … Imprisoned two years before Enron and WorldCom brought corporate crime to center stage, Mr. Armstrong, 57, is the white-collar defendant whom time forgot. Over the years, the losses of his former clients have been repaid by a bank involved in his trades. … Still, he remains jailed on one of the longest-running charges of contempt. In many cases, a federal law limits to 18 months how long someone can be held under civil contempt while the court tries to coerce compliance with an order. Even in cases of criminal contempt, whose goal is punishment rather than coercion, an individual is entitled to the full protections of due process after six months. … 'A legal proceeding is supposed to be the quest for truth,' Mr. Armstrong said in a phone interview last week from the 12-story building, which is used mostly as a temporary holding site for prisoners. 'But this contempt was used to stop me from going to trial, and it's been nothing but bad faith from the government ever since.'" The Times notes, "How Mr. Armstrong has been held for so many years without a trial is a tangled and bizarre tale. Mr. Armstrong, his lawyers say, has been stuck in a surreal situation in which criminal prosecutors have never had to prove their 24-count indictment at trial while the civil case tied him up. Nevertheless, they have gotten their desired result — a lengthy prison term for Mr. Armstrong."

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Investigating Gibbons' Links With Defense Contractor. Reporting on a story broken yesterday by the Wall Street Journal, the AP (2/16, Riley) says this morning the FBI is investigating Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons' interactions with a defense contractor when Gibbons served in the US House of Representatives. "The newly elected Republican governor denied any wrongdoing and told The Associated Press that 'they can look as deeply as they need to and I encourage them to do so, but there would have been absolutely no influence.' A federal law enforcement official confirmed the FBI probe" and "said the inquiry is focusing on what role Gibbons played in awarding military contracts to eTreppid Technologies LLC in Reno and whether he received any gifts in exchange. Gibbons said he had not been contacted by the FBI regarding his contacts with Warren Trepp, a longtime friend and owner of eTreppid who contributed nearly $100,000 to Gibbons' campaign for governor through different companies he controls."

The Wall Street Journal (2/16, A7, 2.04M) also briefly reports on Gibbons' denial of any wrongdoing, and the Washington Post (2/16, Mosk, Eggen, 690K) notes, "Reporting yesterday on the investigation, the Wall Street Journal published a series of alleged e-mail exchanges about Gibbons's dealings with" Trepp. "Among the dozens of e-mails is one allegedly sent days before Trepp and his wife prepared to set sail on a Caribbean cruise with Gibbons and his wife. In it, Trepp's wife allegedly wrote to her husband: 'Please don't forget to bring the money you promised Jim and Dawn.' Trepp's reply, according to the Journal report, was: 'Don't you ever send this kind of message to me! Erase this message from your computer right now!'" However, Trepp lawyer Steven Peek "said yesterday that his client is unaware of any investigation and questions the authenticity of the e-mails cited in the Journal report."

Libby Defense Said To Have Offered No Evidence To Support Scapegoat Theory. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Schmitt, 850K) reports Lewis "Scooter" Libby's lawyer, Theodore Wells, "dropped a bombshell" in his opening argument. "In dramatic tones, Wells declared that Libby had been the victim of a White House conspiracy to make Libby the fall guy for the CIA leak scandal." However, jurors saw "virtually no evidence to back up the provocative claim. The difference between what Wells promised and delivered, and how it will play with the 12-member panel, is just one of the wild cards as the trial winds up." The Times notes that "the case is hardly a slam-dunk for the government. The defense punched some holes in the stories and memories of government witnesses, including journalists. The biggest worry for the prosecution may be whether the jury will think it fair to convict Libby, the only person charged in the three-year federal probe, when he was neither the first nor the only high-level government official to talk about CIA operative Valerie Plame."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/16, Apuzzo) reports Wells "told jurors…that Libby was the victim of a conspiracy to protect White House political adviser Karl Rove. But like the anticipated testimony from Libby and Vice President Dick Cheney, details of any save-Rove conspiracy were promised but never materialized. That leaves defense attorneys, who will spend the long weekend fine-tuning their closing arguments, to decide how to describe Rove for jurors when summing up their case on Tuesday." The AP adds, "While cross-examining government witnesses," Libby's lawyers "took every opportunity to mention Rove but never elicited details about how the president's top political operative was being protected or why."

Foggo, Wilkes Indictments Suggest Other Lawmakers Could Face Charges. The Hill (2/16, Crabtree) reports that the indictments of Kyle Foggo and Brent Wilkes "provide clues about other evidence and material federal prosecutors are seeking from Congress and which members could face more legal trouble in the wide-ranging bribery investigation. In between the more lurid details about prostitutes, hundreds of thousands in cash payments and luxurious trips to Hawaii and Coeur d'Alene, Idaho included in the indictments…are eight references to letters" former Rep Randy Cunningham "sent members of the Appropriations, Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence and Armed Services committees requesting tens of millions of dollars in contracts for Wilkes' companies. … The indictments do not include the panels' responses to these requests; and that is, in all likelihood, because prosecutors were having a difficult time convincing Congress to hand over the relevant records," but "a Democratic aide said discussions are "still ongoing" and the two sides hope to resolve the matter as soon as possible." The Hill notes Reps. Bill Young, Floyd Spence and Duncan Hunter and then-Rep. Porter Goss were chairmen of committees that received letters from Cunningham.

Small NJ Town Abuzz About FBI Raid On Mayor's Home, Office. Under the headline "F.B.I. Raids On The Mayor Make Him Topic A In A Small Town," the New York Times (2/16, Miller, 1.16M) reports from Guttenberg, N.J., "The whispers were everywhere in this sliver of a town on the Hudson: Federal investigators were here looking for something. Then on Jan. 26, the F.B.I. agents seized several computers, rifles and files from the home of Mayor David Delle Donna, as well as records from Town Hall. Mr. Delle Donna has not been charged with a crime and insists that he has done nothing wrong, though a person close to the investigation said the January raids were connected to a former bar owner and eight others charged in 2005 with running a human trafficking ring." The Times adds that the "raids have left many in this town of 10,800 scratching their heads. … And although no one is suggesting any connection to the trafficking, chatter in this town that measures all of 4 blocks wide and 11 blocks long reached new heights in recent weeks after two fires broke out at the only high-rise apartment building in town, killing one person, and another fire erupted at an abandoned building."

FBI, IRS Search Home, Office Of Former Boy Band Promoter. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/16, Reed) reports, "Federal agents executed search warrants on Thursday at New York native Lou Pearlman's Florida office and home, the latest in a string of legal problems facing the man who built the Backstreet Boys and 'NSYNC. The search came less than two weeks after a state court-appointed receiver took control of three Pearlman companies. A judge issued that order after Florida's Office of Financial Regulation alleged that for 15 years Pearlman has sold unregistered securities through a bogus savings program." The AP notes, "FBI agents and other law enforcement investigators spent hours on Thursday carrying boxes away from Pearlman's offices."

Federal Agents Search Ranbaxy's New Jersey Offices In FDA Probe. Bloomberg (2/16, Larkin) reports, "Ranbaxy Laboratories Ltd., India's biggest drugmaker, said U.S. officials conducted a surprise search of two of its New Jersey offices yesterday, seeking documents on a variety of topics." Bloomberg continues, "Federal agents spent all day at Ranbaxy's administrative office in Princeton and manufacturing facility in New Brunswick, said Chuck Caprariello, a spokesman for the company. He declined to specify which documents were taken and said business operations have continued as usual. … 'The only thing we know right now is that it was an information request and they needed information on a variety of topics,' Caprariello said today in a telephone interview. 'We're trying to open up dialogue now as to why, and what information they wanted.'" Bloomberg adds, "The Trentonian, a New Jersey newspaper, reported today that criminal investigators from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration searched the Princeton facility, saying they were serving a warrant. … The U.S. Attorney's Office in Maryland, part of the Justice Department, is working on the Ranbaxy case and won't comment because there is a pending investigation, spokeswoman Vickie LeDuc said today in a telephone interview from her Baltimore office. Doug Arbesfeld, a spokesman for the FDA, said the Justice Department was handling all media inquiries."

Former Nevada County Official Sentenced To Six Years For Strip Club Bribes. The AP (2/16, Ritter) reports, "A former Clark County commissioner was sentenced to six years in prison Wednesday for delivering bribes to politicians on behalf of a strip club owner." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Larry Hicks branded Lance Malone the 'organizer, manager and leader' of 'probably as gross a case of political corruption in the state of Nevada, certainly, that has ever occurred and been successfully prosecuted.' … Hicks blamed Malone for distributing up to $550,000 in bribes to three former commission colleagues from 2000 to 2003, and said he was imposing three years more than Malone received in a related case in San Diego.

Malone will serve the sentences at the same time; he also was fined $100,000." The AP adds, "Malone pleaded guilty in September to one count of conspiracy under the federal Racketeer Influenced Corrupt Organizations, or RICO Act, for the Nevada case. … In the San Diego case, Malone was convicted on similar charges that he delivered bribes to politicians there on behalf of strip club owner Michael Galardi. … On Wednesday, Malone, 45, told the judge that he had been greedy, and he pleaded for leniency. … Malone becomes the third person sentenced in a case that grew from years of FBI wiretaps and led to indictments against Galardi, Malone, and former Clark County commissioners Dario Herrera, Erin Kenny and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey. The commission wields control over a wide area of southern Nevada, including the Las Vegas Strip."

Pennsylvania Police Officer To Stand Trial On Corruption Charges. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (2/16, Zapf) reports, "In a hearing that lasted almost four hours, seven witnesses testified Thursday about alleged wrongdoing by suspended West Mifflin police Officer Noel Missig. Brookline District Judge Charles McLaughlin held Missig…for trial on charges of perjury, simple assault, obstructing the administration of law or government function, tampering with public records or information, two counts of unsworn falsification to authorities and official oppression. The charges stem from a joint FBI and state police investigation that spanned four years and led to accusations that Missig planted cocaine in a suspect's clothing, assaulted a handcuffed boy and lied about the seizure of video poker machines from a borough business."

ADL Honors FBI Agents, Prosecutors For California Gang Convictions. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, 850K) reports, "The Anti-Defamation League on Thursday honored the federal agents and prosecutors involved in convicting four members of a Latino street gang in Highland Park last year for violating the civil rights of African Americans with a campaign of threats and violence, including murder. The group noted that the case against the Avenues gang 'broke new ground as the first time a street gang was convicted of violating federal hate crime laws.' Honored at a luncheon…were federal prosecutors Bobby Bernstein, Alexander Bustamante and Thomas O'Brien; FBI agents Jerry Fradella and Christian M. Haugen; and federal paralegal Martha Lovejoy," as well as local law enforcement officers.

Chicago Protection Racket Collector Sentenced To Seven Years. The Chicago Tribune (2/16, O'Connor, 617K) reports, "A Russian native, who prosecutors say preyed on Russian businesses in Chicago for 'protection' money, was sentenced Thursday to more than 7 years in prison for extortion." A lawyer for 69-year-old Israil Vengerin, "sought leniency, saying his client is dying in prison from heart problems while he awaits a transplant." However, "U.S. District Judge John Darrah imposed an 87-month prison term, saying Vengerin 'terrorized' some in the Russian community. … If Vengerin's condition becomes terminal, the judge said he would consider reducing his sentence." The Tribune notes that at Vengerin's trial, "Much of the testimony came from secretly recorded tapes of Vengerin made by an associate who helped collect the protection money while working undercover for the FBI. At least two victims also recorded Vengerin with the FBI's cooperation."

Klebnikov Murder Defendants Fail To Appear, Delaying Jury Selection. The AP (2/16, Isachenkov) reports that a Russian "court postponed jury selection Thursday in the retrial of three men linked to the 2004 murder of the American-born editor of Forbes magazine's Russian edition after two of the defendants failed to show up, a court spokeswoman said. Prosecutors had accused two Chechen men of killing Paul Klebnikov, but a jury trial acquitted them last year. The Supreme Court later overturned the acquittal and ordered a new trial. Moscow City Court spokeswoman Anna Usacheva said Thursday's session to choose jurors for the retrial was postponed until March 14 because defendants Kazbek Dukuzov and Musa Vakhayev failed to show up." The New York Times (2/16, Lewis, 1.16M) notes that "the judge postponed the beginning of jury selection for a month. … The prosecutor general's office declined to discuss today's events, which like the previous trial occurred behind closed doors."

The Moscow Times (2/16, Schreck) reports, "Vakhayev's lawyer, Vladimir Gorulkov, said in court that his client had 'valid reasons' for his absence," court spokeswoman Tatyana Zubaryova said. "No one showed up to represent Dukuzov, Zubaryova said. Ruslan Koblev, the lawyer for Moscow notary Fail Sadretdinov, said Dukuzov had received his court summons but was in Chechnya; he said he did not know whether Dukuzov would return to Moscow for the trial. Koblev said Vakhayev was in Moscow but stayed home Thursday because he was ill."

California Police Department Under Misconduct Probe. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Blankstein) reports, "Inglewood interim Police Chief J.I. Davis today confirmed that some members of his department were being investigated for misconduct, but he refused to give specifics." The Times continues, "At an afternoon news conference at Inglewood police headquarters, Davis insisted that his department began its probe after developing its own information of possible police corruption. … 'The investigation was initiated in January 2006, after hearing rumors and developing information about possible misconduct,' he told reporters." The Times adds, "Davis refused to give specifics, but The Times has reported that at least six current or former Inglewood police officers are under investigation for allegedly having sex with female employees of massage parlors and other adult businesses that had been the target of a high-profile law enforcement crackdown. … Davis denied reports that the department's investigation was a result of information gathered by federal officials. .. .'That the information was the result of a federal investigation' is incorrect, he said. 'The department did not receive information from any federal agency.' … But sources familiar with the misconduct allegations said that federal authorities, including the U.S. attorney's office and the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, began hearing about the alleged involvement of police officers last year."

Probe Of Pizza Man's Death By Bomb Collar Nears End. USA Today (2/16, 3A, Johnson) reports, "More than three years after a bank robbery suspect in Erie, Pa., was killed when a bomb locked around his neck exploded, a federal prosecutor has summoned investigators to meet today in Pittsburgh to help her determine whether to file charges in the case." USA continues, "U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan says her meeting with investigators from the FBI, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and the Pennsylvania State Police indicates that the probe into the bizarre death of Brian Wells, 46, is nearly complete. 'The investigation is in its final stages,' she says." USA adds, "A federal grand jury in Erie has heard testimony from "numerous" witnesses, Buchanan says, adding that the probe has been complicated by the deaths of at least two potential witnesses. … The death of Wells, a pizza deliveryman, received national attention because it occurred on live television and because of the many questions it left. No one has been arrested in the case, and it remains unclear whether Wells was a willing participant in a bank robbery plot that went awry or was the unwitting victim of a such a plot. .. .Investigators also have examined other possibilities. Among them: that the intent all along was not to rob the bank, but to send Wells to a torturous death. Or, that Wells was part of a robbery plot but thought the bomb was fake."

Nine Former California School Athletes Arrested For Gang-Style Crimes. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Lin, Abrams) reports, "Nine former football players from Murrieta Valley High School, members of a self-described 'Fight Club,' today were arrested by Murrieta police for an alleged gang-style rash of robberies, burglaries and assaults over two years -- including beating up high school students who 'disrespected' their members, authorities said." The Times continues, "The club was founded in 2004 by a group of football players who allegedly injected anabolic steroids to enhance their performance on the field, police said. … The ex-athletes, only one of whom still attends the high school in the southwest Riverside County suburb, started calling themselves 'Fight Club' and would challenge one another in fighting matches outside of school -- attracting large crowds of juvenile spectators, often at local parks, police said. … 'They essentially started out as bullies in the school and graduated to crimes of violence,' said Lt. Dennis Vrooman of the Murrieta Police Department. … 'Investigators allege that members of the gang would 'case' homes in Murrieta and neighboring Temecula while attending parties, and come back days later to burglarize the residences. Police said members of the gang also allegedly attempted to commit a home-invasion robbery, two car thefts, two cases of arson, multiple armed robberies, false imprisonment and several assaults. … Four of the former football players were arrested on suspicion of participating in a criminal street gang which, when considered with the other allegations, could lead to life sentences if convicted, Vrooman said."

OCS Accused Of Intimidation In Whistleblower Probe. The Washington Post (2/16, A21, Williamson) reports, "A trouble-plagued whistle-blower investigation at the Office of Special Counsel -- whose duties include shielding federal whistle-blowers -- hit another snag this week when employees accused the special counsel of intimidation in the probe." The Post continues, "The Office of Personnel Management's inspector general has been investigating allegations by current and former OSC employees that Special Counsel Scott J. Bloch retaliated against underlings who disagreed with his policies -- by, among other means, transferring them out of state -- and tossed out legitimate whistle-blower cases to reduce the office backlog. Bloch denies the accusations, saying that under his leadership the agency has grown more efficient and receptive to whistle-blowers." The Post adds, "The probe is the most serious of many problems at the agency since Bloch, a Kansas lawyer who served at the Justice Department's Task Force for Faith-based and Community Initiatives, was appointed by President Bush three years ago. Since he took the helm in 2004, staffers at the OSC, a small agency of about 100 lawyers and investigators, have accused him of a range of offenses, from having an anti-gay bias to criticizing employees for wearing short skirts and tight pants to work. … The 16-month investigation has been beset by delays, accusations and counter-accusations. The latest problem began two weeks ago, when Bloch's deputy sent staffers a memo asking them to inform OSC higher-ups when investigators contact them. Further, the memo read, employees should meet with investigators in the office, in a special conference room. Some employees cried foul, saying the recommendations made them afraid to be interviewed in the probe. … This week, Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility, the Project on Government Oversight, the Government Accountability Project and Human Rights Campaign and a lawyer for the OSC employees protested in a letter to legislators and to Clay Johnson III, the Office of Management and Budget deputy who ordered the OSC probe."

NYT Praises Bill To Expand Whistleblower Protections. The New York Times (2/16, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "The plight of federal workers who raise alarms about waste and fraud in government has become a scandal unto itself." In "a vote this week of bipartisan unanimity, the House government reform committee offered whistle-blowers fresh hope with a much needed measure to protect them against official retaliation." The bill, "sponsored by Henry Waxman, Democrat of California, and Tom Davis, Republican of Virginia, would guarantee a worker the right to a court review of a complaint if it lingers beyond six months without action."

FOIA Reform Legislation Expected Soon. The AP (2/16, Kellman) reports, "Congressional Democrats are looking at ways to strengthen open government laws and force the Bush administration to release more documents under the Freedom of Information Act." The AP continues, "Rep. Lacy Clay, D-Mo., said legislation he is considering would be broader than an open government bill last year that sought to reduce the number of disputed FOIA requests and improve reporting requirements to Congress. The legislation never reached a vote in the House or Senate. … Clay said the old bill will be the starting point for a new one that will take direct aim at the administration's practice of using the threat of terrorism to withhold 'nonsensitive information.' … 'I am deeply concerned that this administration appears to be shielding information that ought to be accessible to the public,' said Clay, chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee's subcommittee on information policy." The AP adds, "The American Civil Liberties Union urged the subcommittee on Wednesday to scrap what it said was the White House's 'policy of nondisclosure' outlined in a 2001 memo by then-Attorney General John Ashcroft. … Ashcroft advised against releasing information when there was uncertainty about whether FOIA exemptions applied, such as for national security and law enforcement material. His memo reversed a Clinton administration policy that urged agencies to resolve FOIA requests by erring on the side of releasing, not withholding, government information. … 'To this administration, secrecy is the default response,' ACLU Executive Director Anthony D. Romero said in written testimony prepared for Clay's subcommittee."

Government Executive (2/16, Pulliam) reports, "The bill's introduction likely will coincide with Sunshine Week March 11-16, an initiative led by the American Society of Newspaper Editors to educate the public about the importance of open government. National Freedom of Information Day also happens that week, on March 16." GE adds, "Clay said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, will be heavily involved in crafting the measure. A bill that was approved at the subcommittee level in September 2006 (H.R. 867) will be used as a starting point. … In a statement, Waxman said he looks forward to working with Clay on legislation to strengthen the FOIA, and is pleased, as the law was the focus of the subcommittee's first hearing in the new Congress."

Bankruptcy Judge OKs $145 Million In Delphi Fees. The AP (2/16, Tong) reports, "A federal bankruptcy judge on Thursday approved $145 million in fees to lawyers and financial advisers for the first year of the restructuring of auto parts supplier Delphi." The AP continues, "Troy, Mich.-based Delphi Corp., a former subsidiary of General Motors Corp. until 1999, has incurred nearly $135 million in professional fees and $10 million in expenses for the period from its voluntary bankruptcy protection filing on Oct. 8, 2005, through the end of September 2006. … U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Robert Drain of the Southern District of New York approved the payment applications filed by about 30 law firms, bankers and others." The AP adds, "As part of its bankruptcy case, Delphi has cut labor costs by offering voluntary buyout and early retirement deals to tens of thousands of union workers represented by the United Auto Workers and the International Union of Electronic Workers-Communications Workers of America, the company's biggest and second-biggest unions. … Delphi has made reducing labor and retirement benefit costs one of the highest priorities in its reorganization. … Among Delphi's advisers, the biggest bill comes from the law firm Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom, which recorded fees and expenses of $32.79 million for the year." The AP notes, "Delphi expects to emerge from bankruptcy protection in the first half of this year. It is now negotiating with its unions over collective bargaining agreements and General Motors over legacy retirement costs. Those agreements are needed if Delphi wants to move forward on a proposed plan that has private equity investors making a cash infusion as the company exits bankruptcy."

Bankruptcy Judge Orders Bear Stearns To Pay $125 Million For Lax Oversight Of Hedge Fund. Bloomberg (2/16, Bilodeau, Weidlich) reports, "Bear Stearns must pay at least $125.1 million to a failed hedge fund after a court concluded the securities firm ignored signs that investors were being defrauded and took money to cover its own potential losses." Bloomberg continues, "U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Burton Lifland in New York yesterday ordered that Bear Stearns must return the money to Manhattan Investment Fund, which collapsed in 2000 after regulators accused the manager of sending fake account statements for more than three years." Bloomberg adds, "Bear Stearns, alerted to the fraud as early as 1998, waited a year before scrutinizing the hedge fund's books and learning its true financial condition, Lifland wrote. … The delay allowed Manhattan Investment to continue cheating investors, who lost almost $400 million, according to regulators. The ruling against Bear Stearns, of New York, may spur investment banks to monitor hedge funds, their most lucrative trading clients, more closely. Bear Stearns is one of the biggest brokers to hedge funds."

Bipartisan Legislation Seeks FDA Regulation Of Tobacco. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports, "House and Senate lawmakers of both parties introduced sweeping legislation Thursday to make tobacco subject to the kind of federal safety regulation that now applies to medicines and food, and said prospects for action are the most favorable in years. … Although the White House has not supported similar legislation in the past, it's not clear what position President Bush will take this time. Administration officials took a neutral stance Thursday." Three presidential candidates "signed on to the legislation: Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), and Barack Obama (D-Ill.). Its principal sponsors in the Senate are Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), and John Cornyn (R-Texas)."

The AP (2/16, Bridges) also reports the story, noting a spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said the bill "had the support of the caucus. A spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said she personally supported it." White House spokesman Tony Fratto "declined to comment. The Department of Health and Human Services is reviewing the legislation, spokeswoman Christina Pearson said."

California High Court Approves Tobacco Litigation. The Los Angeles Times (2/15, Dolan) reports, "The California Supreme Court made it possible Thursday for people who become ill from smoking to once again win large judgments from tobacco companies, unanimously rejecting a four-year-old federal court decision that had virtually halted all smoker lawsuits in the state. … 'It reopens tobacco litigation in California,' said Northeastern University Law Professor Richard A. Daynard, who heads a group that promotes lawsuits against the industry. 'The light just went from red to green.'" The Times continues, "Since California began allowing individual lawsuits over smoking damage in 1998, plaintiffs in California had won some of the biggest tobacco awards in the country, including a $28 billion jury verdict in Los Angeles. The awards came to a halt when the federal appeals court in 2002 set a strict deadline, saying smokers should have filed suit years earlier, when it became widely known that smoking was a health hazard and addictive." The Times adds, "Taking advantage of the federal ruling, the tobacco industry had exercised its right to move cases into federal court, which hears disputes between litigants in different states. Lawyers said every single case was dismissed. … In a decision written by Justice Carlos R. Moreno, the California Supreme Court said that although judges and juries can presume that plaintiffs should have known of the dangers and filed their lawsuits earlier, smokers can rebut that presumption by presenting evidence that tobacco companies misrepresented the risks. … 'Although knowledge of smoking addiction has been widespread . . . ,' Moreno wrote, 'tobacco companies' misrepresentation of the danger and addictiveness of smoking were also widespread.'"

CIVIL RIGHTS:

LAPD May Be Allowed To Pursue Alternative Racial Profiling Monitoring Methods. Los Angeles Times (2/16, McGreevy) reports, "Faced with a $25-million price tag to replace aging devices that log the ethnicity of every motorist stopped, the Los Angeles Police Department may be allowed to pursue alternative methods for making sure its officers are not engaging in racial profiling, a federal monitor said Thursday." The Times continues, "In his quarterly report on the department's compliance with a federal consent decree mandating LAPD reforms, Independent Monitor Michael Cherkasky said the agency might be able to meet the requirement for checking on racial profiling by methods other than the one currently used to collect data. … 'It is the monitor's belief that the dollars that would need to be spent in continuing the current method of collection and aggregation can, in fact, be better spent on enhancing the city's ability to detect, investigate and prevent biased policing,' Cherkasky wrote." The Times adds, "That opens the door for the city to propose alternatives such as installing video cameras in all patrol cars, though any change would require final approval from Cherkasky, the Justice Department and a federal judge. … Also, it might cost up to $25 million to put video cameras in all patrol cars. … Still, Police Commission President John Mack welcomed the possibility that the city could find a less costly and more effective way to check for profiling."

Federal Judge Sets Limits On NYPD Videotaping. The New York Times (2/16, Dwyer) reports, "In a rebuke of a surveillance practice greatly expanded by the New York Police Department after the Sept. 11 attacks, a federal judge ruled yesterday that the police must stop the routine videotaping of people at public gatherings unless there is an indication that unlawful activity may occur." The Times continues, "Four years ago, at the request of the city, the same judge, Charles S. Haight Jr., gave the police greater authority to investigate political, social and religious groups. … In yesterday's ruling, Judge Haight, of United States District Court in Manhattan, found that by videotaping people who were exercising their right to free speech and breaking no laws, the Police Department had ignored the milder limits he had imposed on it in 2003." The Times adds, "Citing two events in 2005 — a march in Harlem and a demonstration by homeless people in front of the home of Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg — the judge said the city had offered scant justification for videotaping the people involved. … 'There was no reason to suspect or anticipate that unlawful or terrorist activity might occur,' he wrote, 'or that pertinent information about or evidence of such activity might be obtained by filming the earnest faces of those concerned citizens and the signs by which they hoped to convey their message to a public official.' … While he called the police conduct 'egregious,' Judge Haight also offered an unusual judicial mea culpa, taking responsibility for his own words in a 2003 order that he conceded had not been 'a model of clarity.'"

AirTran Seeks Merger Talks With Midwest. The Milwaukee Business Journal (2/16) reports, "AirTran Holdings Inc. reported Feb. 15 the federal waiting period for its proposed $345 million buyout of Midwest Air Group Inc. has expired." The Journal continues, "AirTran chairman and CEO Joe Leonard called the Justice Department's determination not to challenge the proposed merger a 'milestone' and said he hoped the agency's decision will prompt Midwest management to sit down with AirTran for formal negotiations. … 'As we have frequently said, the combination of AirTran and Midwest is pro-competitive and the merger of our two airlines will create a stronger, more diversified airline, better able to withstand competition from other airlines, offer greater job security to employees and provide more service to the cities currently served by both airlines,' Leonard said in a statement." The Journal adds, "AirTran is trying to buy Oak Creek-based Midwest Air Group Inc. to create a low-fare carrier with revenue of about $3 billion in 2007. However, Midwest on Jan. 25 rejected the unsolicited offer calling it 'opportunistic' and saying it 'undervalues' the company. … Leonard said Thursday he hoped that with the expiration of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act that Midwest will 'consider the benefits to their stakeholders and sit down with us to negotiate a definitive agreement.'"

Judge May Further Delay Caremark-CVS Deal. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (2/16, Feldstein) reports, "A hearing today is expected to determine whether the bid by CVS Corp. to buy Caremark Rx will be further delayed because of alleged misconduct by Caremark executives and board members." The Post-Dispatch continues, "The lawsuit challenging the CVS-Caremark deal was brought by Express Scripts Inc. of Maryland Heights, which also wants to buy Caremark. It alleges that Caremark's executives and directors failed to negotiate in the best interest of its shareholders." The Post-Dispatch adds, "Delaware Chancery Court Chancellor William B. Chandler III already has delayed the Caremark shareholders' vote at least until March 9. He acted after a large group of shareholders said it needed more time to evaluate the CVS offer. … CVS, the nation's No. 2 retail drug chain, in November announced its plan to combine with Caremark, based in Nashville, Tenn. Its bid was a $21 billion, all-stock offer that it said would create a new dynamic in the pharmaceutical industry. Caremark shareholders had been scheduled to vote on the deal Tuesday." The Post-Dispatch notes, "Express Scripts is the nation's No. 3 pharmacy-benefits manager. In December, it countered CVS's bid for Caremark with a cash-and-stock offer valued at $26 billion and a vision of a larger, stronger pharmacy-benefits management company. … Express Scripts later sued Caremark, that company's board and CVS, saying the Caremark—CVS deal should be quashed because of 'extensive fiduciary misconduct.' Chandler isn't expected to rule today."

Bill Would Repeal Antitrust Exemption For Insurance Industry. McClatchy Newspapers (2/16, Recio) reports, "Lawmakers moved to rein in the insurance industry Thursday by introducing legislation in the House of Representatives and Senate to repeal the industry's federal antitrust exemption." McClatchy continues, "Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, R-Miss., a fierce critic of the insurance industry's response to Hurricane Katrina, joined Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and ranking member Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., on the Senate floor to introduce the bill. In the House, Rep. Gene Taylor, D-Miss., Rep. Pete DeFazio, D-Ore., Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-La., Rep. Walter Jones, R-N.C., and others announced the introduction of identical legislation. … 'Federal oversight would provide confidence that the industry is not engaging in the most egregious forms of anti-competitive conduct - price-fixing, agreements not to pay and market allocations,' Leahy said. 'Insurers may object to being subject to the same antitrust laws as everyone else, but if they are operating in an honest and appropriate way, they should have nothing to fear.'" McClatchy adds, "Lott, who lost his home in the hurricane and who's part of a lawsuit that's being settled with State Farm & Casualty Co., said, 'After Hurricane Katrina we learned a lot of lessons.' He said he found out 'to my absolute horror that the insurance industry is not covered by the antitrust laws.' … 'This is wrong,' Lott concluded, 'and the Senate, in a bipartisan way, should, and I believe will, correct it.'" McClatchy notes, "The bill has some heavy hitters behind it, notably Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., who said in a statement, 'If insurers around the country are operating in an honest and appropriate way, they should not object to being answerable under the same federal antitrust laws as virtually all other businesses.'"

WSJournal Warns Democrats Could Over Regulate Telecom Sector. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "If you're wondering where the new Democratic majority in Congress is inclined to steer telecom policy, look no further than Mr. Dorgan's comment" at an Federal Communications Commission, where he "pays lip service to free markets while ultimately favoring more regulation for its own sake. But more regulation is the last thing today's telecom industry needs, at least if empirical evidence is any indication. As FCC Chairman Kevin Martin reported at a Senate hearing earlier this month, the industry is now taking risks in a way it hasn't since the tech bubble burst six years ago." Much of this "growth has been fueled by increased broadband deployment, which makes high-speed Internet services possible." The "one sure way to stop these trends is by bogging down industry players with regulations or price controls that raise the risk that these mammoth investments will never pay off. Yet that seems to be the goal of Senator Dorgan and other Democrats such as Representative Ed Markey, another 'Net neutrality' cheerleader, who is planning his own hearings. Consumers will end up paying for such policies in fewer choices and higher prices."

Lawmakers Ask Gonzales For Answers About Wooldridge Actions. The AP (2/16, Heilprin) reports, "The House Judiciary Committee on Thursday asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to explain how the Justice Department's former top environmental prosecutor could sign consent decrees with the third-largest U.S. oil company after buying a $980,000 vacation home with its top lobbyist." The AP continues, "An Associated Press report a day earlier disclosing the transactions 'suggests potential unethical, if not illegal, conduct by a senior Justice Department official and, even more disturbing, apparent complicity in such behavior by the department,' the committee's chairman, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., said in a letter to Gonzales. … Conyers also asked Gonzales when he and other department officials learned of then-Assistant Attorney General Sue Ellen Wooldridge's 'close relationship with a target of a department public corruption investigation and what action, if any, was taken as a result?'" The AP adds, "A third buyer of the gated community home at Kiawah Island, S.C., was former Deputy Interior Secretary J. Steven Griles, who shares a condominium in northern Virginia with Wooldridge and was told last month he faces possible criminal charges of lying to Congress and fraud in the Jack Abramoff bribery and influence-peddling scandal. … The Justice Department says ethics officials signed off on Wooldridge's purchase of the beach getaway with Griles, now an oil and gas lobbyist, and ConocoPhillips Vice President Donald R. Duncan, before the closing last April. The deed lists Duncan as half owner in the property, with Wooldridge and Griles each owning 25 percent. … Nine months later, the Justice Department sent two proposed consent decrees signed by Wooldridge to a federal judge in Houston for approval. One, sent Jan. 11, would let the company delay the required installation of some of the $525 million in pollution controls at nine refineries; the other dealt with a Superfund toxic waste cleanup. Wooldridge resigned as assistant attorney general effective Jan. 19. ConocoPhillips said Duncan had no involvement in negotiating the consent agreements." The AP notes, "Conyers' letter also was signed by Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, as an expression of broader support for the inquiries within the House. Another House panel, the Oversight and Government Reform Committee chaired by Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., launched an inquiry a day earlier."

Senate Democrats Order GAO Probe Of Royalties Collection. The New York Times (2/16, Andrews) reports, "Top Democrats on the Senate Energy Committee, citing widespread management problems at the Interior Department, ordered a new inquiry on Thursday into the department's fast-growing program to collect billions of dollars worth of oil and gas from companies that drill on public territory." The Times continues, "The inquiry, to be conducted by the Government Accountability Office, will come on top of a criminal investigation by the Justice Department into allegations that the program's director earned money as a consultant to companies that were seeking to resell the government oil. … Other investigations are under way by the Interior Department's inspector general and Congressional committees into complaints about mismanagement, weak enforcement and a leasing blunder in the 1990s that could cost taxpayers $10 billion in lost royalties over the next decade." The Times adds, "The new line of scrutiny comes from Senator Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico, chairman of the Senate Energy Committee, and Senator Ron Wyden of Oregon, chairman of the subcommittee on public lands. … The two senators asked the G.A.O. to analyze the so-called royalty-in-kind program, under which the Interior Department collects a share of the oil and gas that companies produce on federal property and then resells it on the open market to generate cash. … Bush administration officials have called the program a simpler and more efficient way for the government to collect royalties on the vast amounts of oil and gas produced on public lands."

Gore Describes Vision For "Live Earth" Concerts. The Washington Post (2/16, C1, Booth, 690K) reports that at "the news conference Thursday announcing this summer's ambitious 'Live Earth' concerts -- designed as an exercise in 'mass persuasion' about threats of global warming -- Al Gore described his vision: a 24-hour musical extravaganza across seven continents, featuring as many as 150 of the world's top recording artists, introduced by an army of 'celebrities and thought leaders' (think: Cameron Diaz and Richard Branson), playing before a total live audience of a million people, and reaching 2 billion more via television, radio and the Internet on July 7." Asked "yet again if he's running for president ('no'), the former veep was quizzed about lingering skeptics of global warming. Gore sighed, and then joked that the doubters must get together on Saturday nights with the folks who believe the moon landings were staged in the Arizona desert. Said Gore, 'I'm running out of things to say to them.'"

Defense Lawyer Pleads Guilty To Leaking BALCO Grand Jury Documents. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/16, Elias, Kravets) reports the former lawyer for BALCO founder Victor Conte and BALCO vice president James Valente "pleaded guilty Thursday to obstructing justice by leaking secret grand jury documents to two reporters covering the government's probe of steroids in sports. Troy Ellerman could be sent to prison for as long as two years and fined up to $250,000 for the convictions. His sentencing was scheduled for June 14. … Prosecutor Douglas Miller said the plea concludes the government's investigation of the leaks and the subpoenas of the Chronicle's Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams were withdrawn." The AP notes, "Prosecutors said a 'previously unknown witness' approached the FBI and offered to help prove that Ellerman was the source. Larry McCormack, former executive director of the Pro Rodeo Hall of Fame and a private investigator who briefly worked for Conte, told the AP on Wednesday that he tipped off FBI agents."

The New York Daily News (2/16, O'Keeffe, Red, 729K) reports that "Ellerman's daredevil personality dates back to his childhood," but his "maverick ways may land him in jail following his bombshell admission Wednesday that he leaked the BALCO grand jury testimony to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters. … 'I think it was just Troy being Troy,' Larry McCormack, the private investigator who told the FBI in December that Ellerman was the source of the BALCO leaks, told The News yesterday. 'I tried to convince him to straighten this out. I think he just felt this is a way to do it, to get the case dismissed against his client. It was a way to throw something in the mix -- what Troy calls getting people off their game. Did it help his client? Well, his client didn't have to do any jail time.'"

Bloomberg (2/16, Gullo) reports, "Ellerman's motive was to use leaks in the case as a basis for seeking to have the criminal case against his client thrown out, the statement said. Ellerman had access to the transcripts because he was representing the vice president of Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative, known as Balco, a Burlingame, California-based lab at the center of a U.S. criminal probe of steroid distribution, said the statement. … 'Such gamesmanship undermines the integrity of the legal system and demands accountability,' said Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul McNulty, in a statement." Bloomberg notes, "A plea agreement calls for Ellerman of Woodland Park, Colorado, to serve two years in prison; his sentence will be decided by a judge. Sentencing is scheduled for June 14, the statement said. … The U.S. Justice Department is withdrawing subpoenas to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters who used the transcripts in a series of stories about the California lab, the statement said. The reporters had been found in contempt of court for refusing to testify to a separate grand jury about their sources."

Georgia Couple Named As Masterminds Behind $12 Million Marijuana Operation. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/15, Jefcoats) reported a Fayetteville real estate agent and her husband "masterminded a $12 million operation to grow marijuana hydroponically in the basements of vacant $300,000 homes, according to police from at least six Georgia counties. Fayette County sheriff's drug agents said Blanca Botello, 34, is a licensed ReMax Realtor who helped close the sale on at least a dozen homes used in the operation. The homes are owned by Cuban nationals who also may be charged." The investigation, which "originated from the Jones County Sheriff's Office and the Drug Enforcement Agency, is ongoing and more arrests are expected." The AP (2/15) reported a similar story.

The Fayette Daily News (2/15) reported, "Inside each home…were 200 plants -- for a total of nearly 2,100 plants with a value of more than $12 million. 'When we got the tip from Miami, all we had was a name, and information that the master-grower might be living in Fayette County,' said Capt. Mike Pruitt, head of the Fayette County Sheriff's Drug Task Force. … According to Pruitt, [a] name given by DEA agents, Merquides Martinez, turned out to be the mastermind behind the large marijuana operation, although no plants were found in his home in south Fayette County."

Man Accused Of Impersonating DEA Agent Arrested In Staten Island. The New York Sun (2/16) reports a "career criminal who once tried to shoot a New York police officer in the head was charged with impersonating a Drug Enforcement Agency special agent to rob drug dealers around the city. A joint task force of DEA agents and city and state police officers arrested Anthony Clanton, 34, on Tuesday at his apartment…in Staten Island." Investigators said they "found several counterfeit documents, including a DEA badge, a billfold with DEA credentials, two search warrants, and a Metropolitan Transportation Authority parking permit in his home."

The New York Daily News (2/16) reports Clanton "allegedly used the fake DEA badge, search warrants and possibly the real cop's gun to rob drug dealers and finance a luxurious lifestyle. He owns a minifleet of high-end cars." The Daily News says Clanton is a "reputed Bloods gang member who tried to kill an undercover cop a decade ago."

In its Metro briefing, the New York Times (2/16) reports Clanton is said to have "used a high-quality replica of D.E.A. credentials and fake search warrants to gain entrance to homes he intended to rob."

On its Web site, NY1 News (2/15) reports the DEA "says they also took guns, ammunition, crack cocaine, and a police scanner from the home. Clanton's arrest was the result of a joint investigation that began in November of 2006."

On its Web site, AM New York (2/16) reports, "Ten years ago, Anthony Clanton tried to kill an undercover cop, but his gunned jammed three times as the officer was heard on a recording device begging for his life. Clanton served eight years in federal prison, then returned to a life of crime, pulling robberies while posing as a federal agent, authorities said Thursday. … Inside Clanton's Narrows Road home, authorities said they found 300 guns, one stolen from a cop, 300 rounds of ammunition, a bullet proof vest, [and] a realistic-looking photo ID for HIDTA."

Pennsylvania Gun Purchase Sting Examined. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/16, Dribben) reports, "Fifteen years ago, when Raymond Tanner graduated high school, his dad switched careers. … Radically. … He sold his share of a dairy farm stand and opened a gun shop. … But going from butter to guns has its downside. … You have to worry about doing business with the wrong customers. And a Washington lobbying group could post your name on its Web site, naming you as an arms dealer who caters to criminals." The Inquirer continues, "Which is what happened last month when the Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence released a report, 'Shady Dealings: Illegal Gun Trafficking from Licensed Gun Dealers.' Tanner's store was featured as one of the scurrilous. … What the Brady Center didn't know is that the sale had been a sting, arranged in cooperation with the local office of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives." The Inquirer adds, "Lanky and laid-back, a yellow polo shirt tucked loosely into his jeans, Ray Tanner, 33, now manages Tanner's Sport Center in Jamison, Bucks County, for his father. The family prides itself on running an honest operation, he said. … In this small suburban shop, which stocks fishing reels and insect repellent, baseball caps and flashlights, as well as 1,500 firearms - about half of them handguns - spotting bad guys is relatively easy. … About once a month, the sales staff turns away a suspicious customer. Usually, Tanner says, a couple will come in. The man will look at handguns. He'll know just what he's looking for. … While he considers the fine points, the woman will wander around, utterly uninterested. But when they're ready to buy, she'll be the one filling out the paperwork. If it can be proved she bought the guns for the man, it is a 'straw purchase' - a felony." The Inquirer notes, Gun shops that willfully sell to straw purchasers can also lose their license and face prosecution, says John Hageman, special agent for the Philadelphia office of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. … So gun dealers are in a tricky spot, Hageman says. "They are businessmen dealing in a commodity. If they profile people, they risk alienating legitimate customers. But if they aren't suspicious enough and allow criminals to buy guns, they risk not only their credibility and their license, but people's lives."

IMMIGRATION:

Cuban Jetliner Bombing Suspect Posada Carriles Faces Immigration Trial. AFP (2/16, Gilot) reports, "An anti-Castro militant accused of bombing a Cuban jetliner in Venezuela three decades ago will face trial in the United States on May 11 on charges of lying in his citizenship application, a US judge has ruled." AFP continues, "Both Cuba and Venezuela have protested the fact that the United States has not pressed charges against Luis Posada Carriles, 78, for allegedly masterminding the 1976 bombing that killed 73 people. … Posada has denied his involvement in the jetliner bombing, but has reportedly admitted involvement in a string of hotel bombings in Cuba in 1997 and in a plot to kill Cuban leader Fidel Castro in Panama in 2000." AFP adds, "Venezuela and Cuba have also accused the United States of hypocrisy for refusing to extradite Posada to face terrorism charges in Venezuela. … The US government tried to deport Posada after he held a May 2005 press conference in Miami which alerted immigration officers that he had entered the country illegally. .. .But a US judge ruled Posada cannot be deported to Cuba or Venezuela, where he was a naturalized citizen, because he may face torture there. … US authorities have so far been unable to find a country willing to take Posada, a native Cuban and former CIA operative who was trained to participate in the failed Bay of Pigs invasion of Cuba in 1961 and went on to become chief of operations at Venezuela's secret intelligence police, Disip, in the 1970s."

DOJ_NMG_0133145

TAX:

Administration May Go Along With Tax Hike On Wealthy. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, A1, Lueck, 2.04M) reports the new Democratic-controlled Congress "is looking to rein in looming tax increases on the middle class, possibly covering the cost by raising taxes on upper-income households. And the Bush administration may not stand in the way." The possible bargain "centers on the Alternative Minimum Tax, a kind of parallel income tax that hit 3.5 million U.S. taxpayers in the 2006 tax year. Congressional Democrats are eager to keep the AMT from ensnaring millions more middle-class taxpayers. They also must find a way to cover the estimated $50 billion cost of scaling back the tax this year." In "recent days, Bush administration officials have signaled they may not oppose a likely method of covering those costs: raising taxes on the nation's wealthiest citizens. That concession could mark the beginning of a bigger debate on revisiting the Bush tax cuts, which could ultimately lead to reversing at least some of the cuts given to upper-income Americans over the past six years."

Democrats Seek To Impose Economic Agenda. Under the headline "Democrats Push Economic Policy That Benefits Poor, Middle Classes," McClatchy (2/16, Hall) reports congressional Democrats "are moving quickly to impose their economic agenda now that they've returned to power on Capitol Hill. They're shrugging off strong macro-economic indicators to spotlight sluggish wage growth and a rise in mortgage defaults, and they're even pressuring the Federal Reserve to lower interest rates." Democrats are "homing in on narrower issues, such as a rise in mortgage defaults by holders of sub-prime loans, who tend to be minorities and working-class Americans. And they're addressing the job insecurity and general unease many Americans feel over how much the global economy now influences the U.S. economy." Democrats "feel that working Americans aren't fully sharing the benefits. Their agenda was on clear display Thursday." Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., "and a group of freshmen senators introduced a bill promoting what they called middle-class tax cuts. It includes a new tax credit for care of elderly family members and expanding the child tax credit."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Frank Says House Would Probably Reject Doha Trade Deal. The Financial Times (2/16, Guha, Callan) reports, "Unease about globalisation among US legislators is so great that a Doha deal would probably be rejected by Congress, Barney Frank, the Democratic chairman of the House financial services committee, claimed on Thursday. His remarks, at the second day of testimony by Ben Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, come at a moment when the administration is locked in tense negotiations with the Democratic leadership on trade policy." Said Frank, "My own view is that if they were in fact to come to an agreement in the Doha round that the resulting agreement – if they reach it as they are currently talking about – would not pass the House of Representatives."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Trumbull, 59K) reports "worries about the dark side of free trade are surfacing in the United States in ways that could affect the course of globalization worldwide. Don't expect an outright retreat from global commerce just yet," but "it is becoming more likely that the US will act to temper and manage its impact. The reason: Free-trade brush fires have recently erupted on economic and political fronts:"

Portman Memo Directs Agencies To Ignore "Earmarks." The Washington Times (2/16, Dinan, 88K) reports the Bush Administration "no longer will be bound by most congressional pork-barrel spending requests, the director of the White House's Office of Management and Budget said yesterday in a memo on how federal departments and agencies should treat money in the new spending bill the president signed into law." Some Republicans "hailed it as a giant turnaround, while Democrats said they already had taken steps to restrict pork spending this year." More than "95 percent of pork-spending requests, known as earmarks, are never enacted as laws, but rather are written into reports that do not have the force of law. For years, most departments and agencies have honored the requests anyway, fearing that otherwise their funding would be cut the next year." But OMB Director Rob Portman's "memo says the Bush administration will feel free to ignore those requests."

Conrad Says WSJournal Wrong On Bush's Return To "Fiscal Nerve." In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (2/16), Sen. Kent Conrad says, "Your Feb. 6 editorial 'Fiscal Revelation' wrongly praises President Bush's budget and unfairly criticizes me. It is far- fetched to claim that the president has rediscovered his 'fiscal nerve' with this budget. The federal debt burden is certainly not 'falling.' Debt has exploded under this president's watch -- increasing from $5.8 trillion when he took office, to $9 trillion by the end of this year, and to more than $12 trillion by 2012 if the president's policies are continued. The recent drop in the deficit does nothing to change our deteriorating long-term outlook, which has only worsened under this administration. The president could have used his budget as an opportunity to reach out to Democrats and the new Congress to address our long-term imbalances. Instead, he chose to again reject compromise and stay the course." This Administration "has the worst fiscal record in history and its new budget does nothing to change that."

Rangel, Grassley Debate Minimum Wage Bill.

House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel and Senate Finance Committee ranking Republican Charles Grassley discussed the minimum wage issue on PBS' NewsHour (2/15, Suarez). Rangel said, "The House overwhelmingly passed the bill to approve the minimum wage for over 13 million people, and we sent it to the Senate with the understanding that it would have broad support over there. We sent it over. Republicans and Democrats support it. And maybe the distinguished senator from Iowa can share with us, what do they have against increasing the minimum wage for 13 million Americans?" Grassley replied, "Nothing against the increase in the minimum wage. That's why there were only three votes against it. … We're also trying to do what both Republicans and Democrats said in the last election they wanted to do, is close down tax loopholes, and tax schemes, and things of that nature, where people are doing everything they can to avoid taxation to bring in revenue, which offsets. So there's no increase in the deficit, either in our bill or in Chairman Rangel's bill." Rangel: "I think what the eloquent senator said was that they were going to hold the minimum wage bill hostage unless we passed $8 billion tax cuts for business. Is that fair to say?" Grassley: "It's not fair to say. … We can't get anything done in the Senate unless it's bipartisan. So this is what we're trying to do, is to help small business close tax loopholes, and raise the same amount of money so the deficit doesn't go up, and help minimum wage people. It's a win-win-win for everybody."

White House Pastry Chef Recalls Tenure In Book.

USA Today (2/16, 6D, Clark, 2.27M) reports French pastry chef Roland Mesnier has been "churning out desserts to die for from the Carter administration right into George W. Bush's second term." Mesnier says, "I'm one of the few chefs who has left the White House with a good taste in my mouth." USA adds, "Indeed, of the six executive chefs who served during Mesnier's tenure, three were let go, he says. He retired in 2004 but has returned for brief stints since." His new book, "All the Presidents' Pastries: Twenty-Five Years in the White House (Flammarion, $24.95), out in time for Presidents Day, is peppered with reminiscences and insights from those years, plus recipes for presidential favorites such as pecan bourbon pie (Jimmy Carter) and quick chocolate mousse (Ronald Reagan)."

US Mint Releases New Washington Dollar Coin.

ABC World News (2/15, story 8, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The US Mint rolled out the new $1 coin, featuring George Washington. It's the first in a series honoring the presidents. A new presidential $1 coin will be released every three months. The Mint plans on putting over 300 million of the Washington coins in circulation."

NYTimes Says Presidential Coin Series Is "Educational." The New York Times (2/16, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Perhaps the most striking thing about the new presidential coin released yesterday is that Congress has asked the United States Mint to issue one for every president from George Washington to Gerald Ford. With four new coins coming out each year, it will be hard to complain about the 2007 series, which offers a bumper crop of Founding Fathers. Washington, who appeared yesterday, will be followed by John Adams, Thomas Jefferson and James Madison. The down side of this inclusive approach, though, is that not every year will be so glorious." But there is "a real educational value in including every president. At a time when the current occupant of the White House thinks presidential powers should be expanded to new extremes, the series will be a four-times-a-year reminder that not everyone who makes it to the White House belongs on Mount Rushmore."

Neuharth Says Bush Among Worst Of Worst Presidents. In his USA Today column (2/16, 15A), Al Neuharth says, "A year ago I criticized Hillary Clinton for saying 'this (Bush) administration will go down in history as one of the worst.' 'She's wrong,' I wrote. Then I rated these five presidents, in this order, as the worst: Andrew Jackson, James Buchanan, Ulysses Grant, Hoover and Richard Nixon. 'It's very unlikely Bush can crack that list,' I added. I was wrong. This is my mea culpa. Not only has Bush cracked that list, but he is planted firmly at the top. The Iraq war, of course, has become Bush's albatross." Bush "admitting his many mistakes on Iraq and ending that fiasco might make many of us forgive, even though we can never forget the terrible toll in lives and dollars."

Private Structure Of Medicare Part D "Not An Impediment" To Its Success. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (2/16, A15), Daniel McFadden of the University of California, Berkeley, reviews the success of the market-based features of the Medicare Part D program. McFadden says, "My overall conclusion is that, so far, the Part D program has succeeded in getting affordable prescription drugs to the senior population. Its privatized structure has not been a significant impediment to delivery of these services. Competition among insurers seems to have been effective in keeping a lid on costs, and assuring reasonable quality control. We do not have an experiment in which we can determine whether a single-product system could have done as well, or better, along these dimensions, but I think it is reasonable to say that the Part D market has performed as well as its partisans hoped, and far better than its detractors expected."

OTHER NEWS:

Bernanke Says Economy May Be Exceeding Expectations. USA Today (2/16, 2B, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke "said Thursday the economy may be performing better than is currently estimated and said an increase in inflationary pressures would warrant higher interest rates." In his testimony to the House Financial Services Committee, Bernanke said, "We've seen some strong income growth, which suggests that the economy may be stronger than we think." Bernanke also "said the Fed wasn't ready to declare victory against inflation." Said Bernanke, "If inflation becomes higher for some reason, then the Federal Reserve would have to respond to that by raising interest rates."

The Washington Post (2/16, D2, Henderson, 690K) reports Bernanke "rejected a Democratic lawmaker's suggestion that he consider cutting interest rates to bolster the economy." Bernanke "repeated that the Fed is likely to hold rates steady for a while if slower economic growth nudges inflation lower this year and next as expected. But the Fed also thinks inflation is too high and might go higher, Bernanke said. If he and his colleagues adjust borrowing costs in coming months, they are more likely to raise rates than lower them." Chairman Frank "had told Bernanke the Fed's stance was 'troubling' to him because the central bank also forecasts the economy will grow at a moderate rate this year, below its long-term average, and that inflation will drift lower over time."

Fed Hints Lower Unemployment May Not Cause Inflation. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, A2, lp, 2.04M) reports Federal Reserve officials "appear to believe unemployment can go lower than they previously thought without generating inflation, a potentially important shift that some economists think could make interest-rate increases this year less likely." The monetary-policy report "that Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke delivered to Congress this week indicated that members of the policy-setting Federal Open Market Committee now expect a lower unemployment rate this year than they did just seven months ago, but they don't expect that to result in higher inflation." The reduced inflation concerns "at the Fed and weaker economic data, such as a drop in January industrial production reported yesterday, have led financial markets to boost expectations the Fed will lower its short-term interest-rate target, now 5.25%, later this year."

Bernanke Wins Bipartisan Praise From Congress. The Financial Times (2/16, Guha) reports Bernanke's "political stock is rising – a development that could help him push through the changes he wants to make at the Federal Reserve, including the adoption of a flexible inflation target." At Thursday's House hearing, Democratic Chairman Barney Frank, "who raised eyebrows this year by pledging more robust oversight of the Fed, declared himself pleased with Mr Bernanke." Frank said, "You have, I think, over the past months in particular, said some very reason-able things from my standpoint." The Times adds a "day earlier in the Senate, Mr Bernanke was lavished with praise from all sides of the political spectrum for engineering a soft landing for the US economy." Several "common themes have emerged from the hearings. First, Mr Bernanke's decision to halt rate rises in the summer of 2006 has earned him political capital as a Fed chairman who considers seriously the dual mandate to put equal weight on employment and inflation, and not inflict harm lightly on the real economy."

Realtors Predict Upturn In Home Prices. NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 7, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The housing market tonight showing more weakness just at the end of last year. The number of existing homes sold in the fourth quarter fell in forty of our fifty states. Nationwide sales fell by just 10% and from the same time period a year ago prices were down prices were down 2.7%."

USA Today (2/16, Dugas, 2.27M) reports, "Home prices are likely to spring back in the coming months, the National Association of Realtors predicted Thursday after reporting that median prices fell in 73 metro areas in the final three months of 2006." NAR chief economist David Lereah said "last year 'was the year of contraction. … When we get the figures for this spring, I expect to see a discernible improvement in both sales and prices.'" USA adds nationwide, "the median sales price for an existing single-family home fell to $219,300 in the fourth quarter, down 2.7% from the same period in 2005." Several "once-sizzling markets in Florida continued to see price declines. The Sarasota-Bradenton-Venice area was worst hit; prices fell 18% in the fourth quarter." Still, the NAR "pointed out that despite the recent downturn in prices, gains for typical single-family homes the past five years have been robust in many metro areas — and explosive in others. In Riverside-San Bernardino-Ontario, Calif., for example, prices have soared 155.3% in the past five years."

Stock Markets Make Modest Gains, Dow Sets New Record Close. NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 8, :15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street here in New York, the blue chips were modestly higher, but it was enough for a new record close. The Dow finished up just over 23 points to close at that new record of 12,765.01. NASDAQ gained almost 9 points [to close at 2,497.10] on the day."

The Wall Street Journal (2/16, C1, McKay, 2.04M) reports the "pace of the stock rally slowed, but solid rises in shares of Caterpillar and Boeing were enough to spur the Dow Jones Industrial Average to a third straight gain and another record finish." Boeing shares "jumped 2%, helped by the aircraft maker's announcement of an order from United Parcel Service for 27 cargo planes. Caterpillar shares rose 2.2% after the equipment maker said it plans to repurchase $7.5 billion of its stock within the next five years. Both companies are Dow components." The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "inched up 0.1%, or 1.51 points, to 1456.81, up 2.7% on the year and some 70 points from its record set in March 2000."

Virginia Bar Mulls Allowing Lobbying Firms To Hire Legislators. The Washington Post (2/16, A1, Shear) reports, "The organization charged with regulating Virginia attorneys is pushing to erase an ethics rule that for a half-century has prohibited the state's legislators from being employed alongside lobbyists at the commonwealth's largest law firms." The Post continues, "The change, proposed by the Virginia State Bar's standing committee on legal ethics, could spark a bidding war among Richmond's leading law firms, which would be free to hire the speaker of the House of Delegates or the Senate floor leader even as their lobbyists prowl the halls of the General Assembly. … That has outraged some in the legislature, who say the move would create dangerous conflicts of interest for the lawmakers and the lobbyists. And they say it adds to a perception that the General Assembly is a good old boys' club where deals are cut behind closed doors instead of in public committee rooms." The Post adds, "Virginia's existing rule is stronger than in many states, where sitting lawmakers and lobbyists are often allowed to work in the same law firm, according to state bar officials. Arizona, Illinois, Washington and New Hampshire permit the practice, officials said. At least nine other bar associations prohibit firms from having both lobbyists and sitting lawmakers. Maryland does not have any such prohibition, but the state imposes certain restrictions on lawmakers who work for firms with lobbying arms. … Pressure to eliminate the rule in Virginia was sparked in part by Sen. R. Creigh Deeds (D-Bath), who recently joined the law firm of Hirschler Fleischer P.C., a Richmond-based firm with a small lobbying presence. Without the proposed change, Deeds would be violating state ethics rules. … Deeds, who describes himself as a small-town rural lawyer, said his losing bid for attorney general in 2005 made it nearly impossible to keep his small practice alive. His plans to run for governor in 2009 will require a more stable income, he said. But he said there will be a firewall between himself and the firm's lobbyists."

Clinton Campaign Signing Consulting Contract With Key Endorser. The AP (2/15, Schafer) reports South Carolina state Sen. Darrell Jackson, a "key black Democratic leader" in that state, "has negotiated a $10,000 per month consulting contract with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign, a development that came to light when the lawmaker endorsed the presidential hopeful." Clinton spokesman Mo Elleithee "denied there was any deal made for Jackson's endorsement." Jackson's firm "will advise Clinton's campaign on 'political matters in South Carolina, outreach, organizing issues' and purchasing advertising, Elleithee said."

Obama Will Have To Fight For Black Support In The South. Under the headline "Obama's Southern Support Not A Cinch," the Chicago Tribune (2/16, Glanton, 617K) says votes for Sen. Barack Obama "won't come easily" in the South, "home to the nation's largest concentration of African Americans -- one of the Democratic Party's most loyal constituencies and some of the most dedicated supporters of former President Bill Clinton." Black voters will "play a major role in primary elections in states such as South Carolina, Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia. About 50 percent of voters in South Carolina's Democratic primary are black." But black voters "have found themselves in a dilemma. Should they support Obama and possibly make history or should they support Hillary Clinton and bring back a team many feel was the most dedicated to black causes since President John Kennedy?"

Haitian-American Journalist Angered By Obama "Blackness" Debate. In a Washington Post (2/16, A23, 690K) op-ed, Haitian-American journalist Marjorie Valbrun writes, "What does it mean to be black, and who is the arbiter of authentic blackness?" As Obama's "'blackness' has increasingly been discussed on black-oriented radio shows, at political conferences and on Sunday morning news shows, I've grown more dismayed by the day. … At a time when blacks living in this country, whether by birth or by choice, should be harnessing their collective political clout to empower all black people, we're wasting time debating which of us are truly black. … People are asking whether he's black enough to represent them. I ask, black enough by whose standards? Why must Obama's life follow the same track of 'authentic' black folk to pass this litmus test?"

Obama Also Faces Battle With Clinton, Edwards For Internet Edge. In his Washington Post (2/16, A23, 690K) column, E.J. Dionne says the 2008 race is the "election in which Internet campaigning will reach maturity. The 2000 campaign offered the first glimmers of the medium's power when John McCain surprised the political world by raising $6 million to $7 million online in his unsuccessful Republican primary campaign against George W. Bush. Howard Dean rode the Internet from nowhere to a strong early position in the 2004 Democratic presidential race, only to fall to John Kerry." This time, "the question is whether Obama will have an edge as the candidate who talks about his campaign as a participatory mass movement and is trying to embody the word 'new.'" But Obama "faces two obstacles to overwhelming Clinton on the Internet. The first is John Edwards, whose strong stands against the Iraq war and in favor of a broad national health insurance plan have made him popular among the more ideologically committed bloggers and their audiences," the second is the "Clinton campaign's awareness that the Internet matters this year as it never has before."

Gingrich Remains In GOP's Top Tier In Polls. The Washington Times (2/16, Hallow, 88K) says "press accounts seldom name former House Speaker Newt Gingrich in the top tier of aspirants for the Republican presidential nomination, despite polls consistently showing he belongs there." In "every recent poll national poll -- as well as in Iowa" -- Gingrich leads Mitt Romney among Republican likely voters. Gingrich "has said he will wait until September to make a decision on running. Still, in poll after poll, he joins" Rudy Giuliani and Sen. John McCain "in scoring in double digits." But "late starters…may be out of luck this time, with both parties' nominees expected to be known by early February of next year."

Gingrich Again Says No Decision Until December. Asked on Fox News' Your World (2/15, Cavuto) when he will decide on a presidential run, Gingrich again said, "I will decide in late September. … This is February of 2007. The election is November of 2008. And you get an inauguration in January of 2009. Now, these guys are all running around -- and gals, counting Hillary -- raising money, hiring consultants, having polls. We have had more polls in February than you had in 1960 in the entire election."

Brownback Leads Senate Presidential Hopefuls In January Missed Votes. The Politico (2/15) reports Sen. Sam Brownback "has been playing an awful lot of hooky these days. Last month, he missed more than half of his Senate roll call votes," second in the chamber only to hospitalized Sen. Tim Johnson. Brownback "showed up 48 percent of the time. As a presidential hopeful, he probably has his hands full. Yet rival senators who are also moonlighting as '08 contenders have higher attendance records -- though the campaign season remains young." Sen. Barack Obama "has managed to show up for every vote so far," while Sens. Hillary Clinton and John McCain "scored a 94 percent attendance record last month."

Dodd's Banking Panel Role Helps Him Rake In Contributions. In a feature on the front page of its business section entitled "The Banker's Candidate," the Washington Post (2/16, D1, Birnbaum, Johnson, 690K) writes that Sen. Christopher Dodd "has two big jobs. He is a candidate for the Democratic nomination for president, and he chairs the Senate Banking Committee. They are proving to be a lucrative combination. Among Democrats, Dodd's $5 million campaign nest egg is surpassed only" by that of Sen. Hillary Clinton." Dodd's "electoral riches can be traced to the banking panel, whose jurisdiction includes some of the wealthiest industries in America -- banking, insurance and financial services. In addition, Dodd's home state is the hedge fund and insurance capital of the country. But it is Dodd's philosophy, not only his geography, that has made him a cash magnet. Each of these big-money interests applauds his light-handed approach to financial regulation and considers him a reliable friend -- a fact that raises questions about Dodd's viability in a Democratic field even as it bolsters his fundraising prowess." While "in recent presidential polls, Dodd has been little more than an asterisk," the "ample donations those connections have fostered will enable him to make his name more widely known."

WPost Says Romney Has Work To Do To Win Over Social Conservatives. The Washington Post (2/16, A22, 690K) editorializes that Mitt Romney, "having presided over one of the most liberal states in the nation, having made statements on issues such as abortion and gay rights that appealed to the residents" of Massachusetts, "now needs to convince the social conservatives who have a big say in picking the party's nominee that he is not a Massachusetts Republican after all." Romney "has disavowed previous positions backing a federal law to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and calling for an end to the ban on gays in the military; now he emphasizes his opposition to the ruling on same-sex marriage by Massachusetts's highest court. Once he touted his support for abortion rights and backed the use of leftover embryos for stem cell research; now he endorses overturning Roe v. Wade, a position he says he came to during the stem cell debate. Our views are much more in line with the old Romney than the new version; Republican primary voters will have to judge for themselves which is authentic and whether political opportunism, rather than a moral awakening, as he says, played a role in Mr. Romney's transformation."

Coalition Launches Initiative To Change California Term Limit Law. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Vogel, 850K) reports an "unusual coalition of special interests with close ties to lawmakers launched a ballot initiative today that would tweak California's term limits to allow the Legislature's current leaders to stay in office as long as six more years." The measure "would do what Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles) and Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata (D-Oakland) have discussed with increasing urgency as their 2008 ousters approach: Cut the number of years a legislator could hold office from 14 years to 12, but allow that time to be served in a single house."

Malkin Seen As Conservative Firebrand. In his Washington Post column (2/16, C1), Howard Kurtz says conservative blogger Michelle Malkin "arouses strong emotions." Malkin said, "They'll ridicule my looks, ridicule my ethnicity, go after my family. They've attacked my husband relentlessly. There's a strong sexist strain among my liberal critics, who think it isn't possible I could have gotten anywhere without my Svengali husband, or some white man, embedding ideas in my head." The Post adds, "Make no mistake, though: This daughter of Filipino immigrants plays pretty rough herself. Whether on her blog, her Internet talk show or her Fox News appearances, Malkin delights in sticking her finger in the eye of the liberal establishment. And she is convinced that her detractors don't play fair." But "plenty of folks find Malkin's rhetoric overheated as well."

NYTimes Worries About Dislocated Auto Workers. The New York Times (2/16, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "American autoworkers are suffering through another round of layoffs, factory closings and buyouts. This time DaimlerChrysler has announced that it will cut 13,000 jobs in North America. Ford Motor and General Motors offered buyouts to a total of nearly 200,000 hourly workers in 2006." The "plight of the workers who have lost their jobs is real and has to be addressed, but the U.S. manufacturing sector is far more robust than the struggle of the carmakers suggests. According to the United Nations, the United States accounted for 21.2 percent of world manufacturing in 2000." But "pro-trade politicians have to make sure that a lost factory job does not mean a drastic and lasting decline in living standards, with no access to health insurance and no hope for a college education for that worker's children."

Rice Seen As Impetus Behind North Korea Deal. The New York Times (2/16, A3, Sanger, Shanker, 1.16M) reports in order to "win approval of a deal with North Korea that has been assailed by conservatives inside and outside the administration," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "bypassed layers of government policy review that had derailed past efforts to negotiate an agreement, several senior administration officials said this week." After a meeting in Berlin last month with Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, who had just held sessions with his North Korean counterparts, Rice "called back to Washington to describe the outlines of the deal to" national security adviser Stephen Hadley "and then to President Bush. But to some, it seemed the usual procedures were cut short -- vetting the details though an interagency process that ordinarily would have brought in Vice President Dick Cheney's office, the Defense Department and aides at the White House and other agencies who had previously objected to rewarding North Korea before it gives up its weapons." However, White House and other administration officials "dispute that, saying that all relevant agencies were consulted." In lieu of "formal meetings," Hadley "walked it through with concerned people," a senior administration official said, acknowledging that the process was "much more informal, and rapid, than usual." The result has been "an unusual attack on the agreement from the right," starting with former Ambassador John Bolton, who said "bluntly" that it was a "bad deal." Meanwhile, State Department officials said outgoing Under Secretary of State Robert Joseph "vehemently disagreed with the approach, telling associates privately what Mr. Bolton has said in public: that the new agreement was no better, and perhaps worse, than one signed by President Clinton in 1994." For her part, Rice on Thursday "sternly played down the significance of any internal dissent, making it clear that she would not entertain dissent after the president had made up his mind."

Hill Says Agreement Is "Only A First Step." Assistant Secretary Hill said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/15, Blitzer), "This is only a first step. It's not the whole thing. What we have is a 60-day agreement where they will shut down and seal this reactor, the reactor that has been continuing to produce plutonium up to this very day. And then we will begin discussing with them a list and try to run to ground all their other programs and go on from there." Asked about North Korea's "cheating" on a similar agreement reached in 1994, Hill said, "Well, you know, there's always the risk of cheating. … If they cheat in this 60-day process, we will know that pretty soon. So there's always the threat of that. But I will say there's one big difference between this deal and the previous deal, which is this is a multilateral deal. … And that's very different from the past, when it was a bilateral agreement between North Korea and the United States."

Appearing on PBS' NewsHour (2/15, Woodruff), Hill said, "During that 60 days, a few things have to happen, including shutting down the reactor and getting the IAEA inspectors there, beginning to work with us to get a list of all of their nuclear programs, all of their nuclear programs, which will have to be abandoned, pursuant to the agreement in September '05. So, yes, it's a good step forward, but there's a lot of steps to go." Asked about "criticism coming from inside your own Administration," referring to Deputy National Security Adviser Elliot Abrams, Hill said, "There are a lot of people who are going to have a lot of opinions. North Korea is a very emotional issue for many people. … I take my instructions from the Secretary of State."

Under the headline "White House Calms GOP Base On Korea Deal," the AP (2/16, Ben Feller) says the White House Thursday "sought to ease concern among conservatives" that the deal "goes too easy" on Pyongyang. In particular, Abrams "raised alarms" about the possible removal of North Korea from a list of terror-sponsoring states. White House spokesman Tony Snow 'said he spoke with Abrams and assured him North Korea will not be removed from the list unless it changes it behavior."

South Korean Official Warns Pyongyang Must Give Up Weapons Program. In a front page article, the Washington Times (2/16, A1, Sands, 88K) reports "a top contender to be South Korea's next president" Wednesday warned during a visit to Washington "that North Korea must be forced to give up all its nuclear-weapons programs if the new accord to end the peninsula's nuclear crisis is to succeed." Park Guen-hye, daughter of the late South Korean President Park Chung-hee and a former chairman of the leading opposition party, said the deal this week was a "good first step," but said "merely freezing Pyongyang's existing nuclear arsenal…was unacceptable."

Unresolved Status Of North Korea's Enriched Uranium Program Seen As "Shortcoming" Of Deal. In its "Inside The Ring" column, the Washington Times (2/16, Gertz, 88K) reports that "a senior Bush administration official said that one serious shortcoming of the tentative deal on North Korea's nuclear program is that it does not resolve the status of Pyongyang's secret highly enriched uranium (HEU) program." While North Korea "denies making any acquisitions necessary for a production-scale HEU program," the official stated, "We know they made these acquisitions." During talks in October 2002 between State Department official James Kelly and North Korean Deputy Foreign Minister Kang Seok-ju, Pyongyang reportedly "admitted that the uranium program had been under way for several years," but later "reversed course and began denying that they had the uranium program, a position eventually adopted by both China and Russia."

Prospects For Progress In Monday's Mideast Summit Seen As Bleak. AFP (2/16, Millikin) reports that as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice prepares to host a "rare" summit between Israeli and Palestinian leaders, a "political resurrection of the radical Palestinian group Hamas and a flare-up of violence in the disputed city of Jerusalem have cast a shadow over Monday's meeting." In recent months Rice has "heralded the existence of a 'new opening' for progress towards" a settlement. But on Thursday, her spokesman "was lowering expectations for the encounter." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the summit is "not designed as a set of meetings that is going to result in a formal outcome, it is designed to start a series of conversations."

Similarly, the Wall Street Journal (2/16, A8, King, Simpson, 2.04M) says the "budding political alliance" between Hamas and Fatah has "thrown a wrench into Ms. Rice's plans to start peace talks." But she is "sticking to her plans," leaving "skeptics, including some Israeli officials…wondering if Ms. Rice is wise to proceed on this trip." Meanwhile, the US "itself is sending mixed signals over whether it may be willing to interact with a unity government led by Hamas." Rice "said the US wouldn't take a position on this question until the new government is formed, but US officials in Israel have told the Palestinians that the US would shun the government if it doesn't embrace Israel, renounce violence and agree to abide by previous international peace accords."

The New York Times (2/16, A10, Cooper, 1.16M) says that "to some extent," Rice's plan to "jump-start" the peace process, "leap-frogging interim details and squabbles," has "turned the clock back to the closing days of the Clinton administration, when a push toward a final settlement expired." However, "the timing could not be worse." Prospects for "any real breakthrough were already bleak two months ago," when the plan was launched, but last week, "one more giant obstacle emerged: a national unity government of Fatah and Hamas leaders that was worked out in talks brokered by Saudi Arabia in Mecca." Bush administration officials, "publicly lukewarm about the agreement, were angry with" Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, according to the Times. They say the pact "brings him closer to Hamas instead of bringing Hamas." Rice was "angry about the Mecca deal," but "said that she would nonetheless go ahead with the planned summit."

Under the headline "Palestinian Power-Sharing Deal Complicates Rice's Mideast Trip," the Washington Post (2/16, A18, Kessler, 690K) says Abbas' move "has placed the United States in a quandary because, under Rice's formulation, he is a 'mainstream' leader, while Hamas is an 'extremist' group that needs to be isolated." In the interview, Rice "repeatedly defended Abbas," calling him "someone who has devoted his whole life to nonviolence," and said the US will continue to work with him. "It would be a very big mistake to not continue to deal with him," she said. Rice said she is traveling to the region because "it is important to inject energy and confidence" in the dealings between Olmert and Abbas.

The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Richter, 850K) says the summit "is taking place under a cloud of uncertainty" as "hopes for the US mission have dimmed." However, the Administration is seen as "eager to show allied Arab governments that it can make progress on Israeli-Palestinian issues, in hopes of strengthening their cooperation in stabilizing Iraq and resisting the influence of Iran."

Abbas, Haniya Meet To Select New Cabinet. The New York Times (2/16, A10, Myre, 1.16M) reports, "After months of difficult negotiations and bloody Palestinian street fighting, the Hamas-led Palestinian government resigned Thursday to pave the way for a unity government that will include Hamas and the rival Fatah movement." Prime Minister Ismail Haniya submitted his cabinet's resignation on Thursday evening at a meeting with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

The Washington Post (2/16, A18, Wilson, 690K) says Abbas "immediately reappointed Haniyeh to assemble the next cabinet" in accordance with the agreement reached last week in Mecca, "although who will fill some of the key ministries has been a point of debate between the two sides for the past few days."

USA Today (2/16, 10A, Slavin, 2.27M) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday the Bush administration "had not rejected" the Cabinet being formed by the Palestinian factions, but she "said there is no sign the new government would recognize Israel -- as demanded by the Administration and the Israeli government."

The Washington Times (2/16, Gertz, 88K) reports aides to the Palestinian president were quoted by wire reports as saying C. David Welch, assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, "warned Abbas during a telephone conversation yesterday that Washington would not deal with members of the new government -- even those from Fatah -- unless it meets the Quartet conditions." The aides also said that Jacob Walles, the US consul-general in Jerusalem, "delivered the same message to Mr. Abbas in person at a meeting in the West Bank town of Ramallah."

Gates Reiterates US Not Planning Attack On Iran. The New York Times (2/16, A8, Cloud, 1.16M) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates again said Thursday that the United States had no intention of attacking Iran "and that any American military efforts against it would be confined to Iraq to disrupt the smuggling of bomb-making materials over the border." During a Pentagon news conference, Gates said, "For the umpteenth time, we are not looking for an excuse to go to war with Iran. We are not planning a war with Iran." Even if the Bush administration "were able to establish that Iran's top leaders knew and authorized the smuggling," Gates said, there would probably be "no change in the Bush administration's strategy of limiting its military response to actions within Iraq."

Pace Says Comments About Iranian Government Referred To "Top Two Or Three People." Joining Secretary Gates at Thursday's briefing, the Washington Times (2/16, Gertz, 88K) reports Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, sought to "qualif[y] earlier comments that he doubted high-level Iranian government linkage to special armor-piercing bombs and rockets found in Iraq." Pace told reporters, "What I tried to say when I said I didn't know about the Iranian government, I'm talking about the top two or three people in the government." However, he stressed that the level of Iranian government involvement is "secondary to the danger the arms pose to US and coalition forces."

Pelosi: Bush Lacks Power To Invade Iran. The AP (2/16, Espo) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Thursday that President Bush "lacks the authority to invade Iran without specific approval from Congress," in what was seen as "a fresh challenge" to the President "on the eve of a symbolic vote critical of his troop buildup in Iraq." Pelosi said Congress "should assert itself…and make it very clear that there is no previous authority for the president, any president, to go into Iran."

Japan Freezes Iranian Assets. AFP (2/16) reports the Japanese government "has decided to freeze the assets of 10 groups and 12 individuals related to Iran's nuclear and missile programs, under a UN sanction resolution approved in December." Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso told reporters Thursday, "We must execute the measures with a determined will and resolve because (the Iranian nuclear problem) affects the nuclear non-proliferation regime and North Korea's nuclear problem." Aso also called on Iran "to stop its uranium enrichment activities and return to the negotiating table before and after the passage of the resolution."

WSJournal Says Focus Should Be On Troops' Safety, Not Intelligence. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.04M) writes, "Following the weekend intelligence disclosures about Iranian-supplied weapons killing GIs in Iraq, we predicted Tuesday that 'a large part of Washington will pretend the evidence doesn't exist, or suggest the intelligence isn't proven.'" And, "Sure enough, President Bush faced a barrage of questions Wednesday wondering whether senior Iranian leaders were really aware of the weapons transfers, whether he was using 'faulty intelligence,' and whether the disclosures were part of a strategy designed to 'provoke Iran.'" The Journal criticized "the state of our public discourse," where "American military officials present prima facie evidence of Iranian weapons implicated in killing 170 US soldiers and wounding 600 more, and Washington's main concern is not for the GIs but in refighting the last intelligence war."

Egypt Cracks Down On Muslim Brotherhood. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Stack, el Hannawy, 850K) reports the Egyptian government is "seizing upon a moment of regional chaos and US inattention to crack down aggressively on the country's most popular opposition group and shore up its hold on power." In "a bald push" against the Muslim Brotherhood, the government in recent weeks "has arrested hundreds of activists, unveiled new restrictions on political Islam and published a stream of anti-Brotherhood propaganda in the state-run media."

Libyan Official Seeks Closer Ties To US. In its "Embassy Row" column, the Washington Times (2/16, Morrison, 88K) reports Libya "hopes to remove the last irritants blocking" normalization of relations with the United States "very, very soon," according Ahmed Said Fituri, Libya's secretary for American affairs. As the highest-ranking Libyan official to visit Washington since late 2003 when Libya announced that it was giving up its nuclear weapons programs, Fituri gave an off-the-record talk at the Nixon Center Tuesday. Speaking to the Times' David R. Sands after the session, Fituri said Libya "wants some irritants removed from the bilateral relations, including the end of all sanctions and difficulties in obtaining visas to travel to the United States." The official said he planned to spend much of his visit meeting members of Congress to "discuss how we can close the gap."

Russia Threatens To Quit Arms Treaty Over US Missile Shield. The Financial Times (2/16, Sevastopulo, Buckley, Dombey, Cienski) reports Russia Thursday threatened "to pull out of a landmark nuclear arms control treaty unless the US backed away from plans to install its missile defence shield in Eastern Europe." Russian army chief of staff Yury Baluyevsky "said Moscow might unilaterally withdraw from the 1987 Intermediate-range Nuclear Forces treaty" as the Pentagon prepares to start negotiations with Poland and the Czech Republic about hosting missile interceptors and radars. In response, a senior Pentagon official "said the US would 'resist' the Russian move, which he said would have serious implications for American allies in Europe."

Foreign Minister's Promotion Sparks Speculation That He May Replace Putin. The Washington Post (2/16, A16, Finn, 690K) reports, "President Vladimir Putin promoted Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov to the post of first deputy prime minister Thursday, an elevation that immediately intensified speculation that Putin might favor him as his successor." Ivanov "will now be charged with overseeing Russia's military-industrial complex as well as part of the civilian economy. He was recently put in charge of consolidating and revitalizing Russia's aviation industry."

The New York Times (2/16, Myers, 1.16M) notes Ivanov is "a former K.G.B. officer who became the first civilian to lead the country's military in 2001." The Wall Street Journal (2/16, A6, Chazan, White, 2.04M), under the headline "Putin's Succession Gets Murkier," says the "promotion of a hawkish ally has rejiggered the power balance among" Putin's "likely successors, sharpening the competition faced by the more pro-Western candidate who had been considered the front-runner in next year's presidential contest." Ivanov will now have "the same rank as Dmitry Medvedev, the pro-Western first deputy prime minister."

Putin Dismisses Chechen President. The Washington Post (2/16, A19, Finn, 690K) reports Putin "dismissed the president of Chechnya on Thursday, clearing a path to the southern republic's highest office for Ramzan Kadyrov, the controversial prime minister of Chechnya who has been accused of major human rights abuses in his drive to pacify the war-torn region." Putin "appointed Kadyrov as acting president in advance of elections, in which analysts expect the young Kremlin ally to face only token and timid opposition. No election date has been set, and Russian officials insisted there would be more than one candidate."

More Commentary On Putin. Padma Desai, a professor of comparative economic systems at Columbia University, writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/16, A14, 2.04M), "Whatever the West's grave misgivings about…Putin, they are not widely shared by the Russian people, who consistently give their president 70% approval ratings in opinion polls. Even former Presidents Gorbachev and Yeltsin, much admired in the US, have given a nod of approval to Mr. Putin's 'strategic' direction, even though they express reservations about his moves to consolidate federal authority." Desai also says that "if it's correct to say that a prospering middle class -- dare one call it a bourgeoisie? -- inevitably leads to the rise of democracy, then Russia fits the bill admirably. The transformative changes in Russia…are phenomenal. Russians are acquiring private housing, automobiles and fixed and mobile telephones at a dizzying speed. The overall poverty rate has declined from around 35% in the mid-1990s to about 10% today, and 70% of college-age youngsters receive a higher education."

David Ignatius, in the Washington Post (2/16, A23, 690K), writes, "Think of the new Russia as a highway: People used to drive on the left side of the road; now, officially, they are supposed to drive on the right, but the change has been uncomfortable (especially for the authorities). So the country straddles the middle -- which is understandable, but also dangerous. That's a paradox of…Putin's Russia that I have encountered in nearly every conversation here this week. Russian officials insist they don't want to go back to communism," but the country "is wary of full, American-style democracy."

Charles Krauthammer, also in the Washington Post (2/16, A23, 690K), says "Putin's aggressiveness does not signal a return to the Cold War. He is too clever to be burdened by the absurdity of socialist economics or Marxist politics. He is blissfully free of ideology, political philosophy and economic theory. There is no existential dispute with the United States." Putin "is a more modest man: a mere mafia don, seizing the economic resources and political power of a country for himself and his (mostly KGB) cronies."

Friedman Predicts Oil Prices Will Shape Russia's Future. New York Times (2/16, 1.16M) columnist Thomas L. Friedman writes, "Boeing's Moscow Design Center, which employs 1,400 Russian engineers...on various projects, symbolizes Russia's unique potential: Russia is that rare country that not only has a treasure trove of natural resources — oil, gas and mines — but also has a treasure trove of human talent: engineers, mathematicians and other valuable minds." The "meta-question with Russia today is this: Will it become more like Norway, a democracy enriched by oil, or more like Venezuela, a democracy subverted by oil? ... You see signs of both trends." Friedman predicts, "If the price stays at $60 a barrel, [Russia is] going to be more like Venezuela, because its leaders will have plenty of money to indulge their worst instincts, with too few checks and balances. If the price falls to $30, it will be more like Norway. If the price falls to $15 a barrel, it could become more like America — with just enough money to provide a social safety net for its older generation, but with too little money to avoid developing the leaders and institutions to nurture the brainpower of its younger generation."

WPost Critical Of Proposed VOA Programming Cuts. The Washington Post (2/16, A22, 690K) editorializes, "For decades, the Voice of America and its sister broadcasting organizations offered a remarkably balanced alternative to state-controlled media all over the world, buoying dissident movements and undermining anti-American dictatorships for a relatively small investment. Soviet citizens even learned how to reconfigure their radios to break through the jamming signals their government used to interrupt VOA and British Broadcasting Corp. programming." Now, with Putin "bullying his neighbors, manipulating the Russian media and throwing increasingly audacious anti-American tantrums, one would think US policymakers would have the sense at least to maintain relatively modest VOA operations in and around the Russian Federation. Yet President Bush's recently released 2008 budget proposal does just the opposite, cutting VOA programming for a range of post-Soviet states to finance programming expansion in other areas of the world."

Ban Presses Sudan To Allow UN Team To Visit Darfur. The New York Times (2/16, Hoge, A3, 1.16M) reports U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki-moon said Thursday that Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir "had broken a personal pledge he made last month to give entry permits to a United Nations human rights team, and Mr. Ban urged the Sudanese leader to reconsider." Ban also said he had received" no reply from Mr. Bashir to a Jan. 24 letter addressing Sudanese concerns over a combined African Union and United Nations force to curb attacks on villagers in the Darfur region of western Sudan." Ban said the letter "detailed how an advance force would be created, as well as its command structure and financing. "With an affirmative answer, we can pave the way immediately to the introduction of a hybrid A.U./U.N. mission," he said.

US Preparing For Post-Castro Cuban Exodus. In an exclusive report, the Miami Herald (2/16, Bachelet, 286K) says amid concerns of "a possible mass exodus of Cubans," the Department of Defense "plans to spend $18 million to prepare part of the US Navy base at Guantánamo Bay to shelter interdicted migrants," US officials told the newspaper. Fidel Castro's illness and temporary hand-over of power to his brother Raúl last summer "injected a renewed sense of urgency into plans to handle a mass exodus," and the Administration "quietly requested the funds about a month ago and Congress has approved it," officials told The Miami Herald. The $18 million initiative is "part of a broader US government effort to prepare for the death of Castro." According to the Herald, "top Bush Cabinet officials have met at least twice since December to review Cuba contingency plans," and on March 7 and 8, the Department of Homeland Security "will lead an exercise in South Florida involving the Coast Guard and dozens of federal, state and local agencies, focused on stopping US boaters from picking up rafters."

NYTimes Urges WHO To Ensure Supply Of Avian Flu Vaccine. The New York Times (2/16, 1.16M) editorializes, "Indonesia sent a chill through the World Health Organization recently when it refused to supply any more samples of the avian flu virus that has killed scores of its people. The move, which seemed aimed at gaining access to vaccines at an affordable price, threatens the global effort to track the virus and develop vaccines. But Indonesia has raised a valid point that needs to be addressed: if a pandemic should strike, poor countries would be left without protection." The WHO "needs to work much harder to encourage the transfer of vaccine production technology to countries, like Indonesia, that have the technical ability to use it. That will increase the supply of vaccine and presumably bring prices down. Even then, we fear, there still won't be enough."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Holiday Publishing Notice. In observance of the federal Presidents Day holiday, the Attorney General's News Briefing will not be published on Monday, February 19. News from the holiday will be included in your Tuesday, February 20, briefing.

Trial Of March 11, 2004 Conspirators Divides Spaniards. NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 5, :15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "High drama today in a courtroom in Madrid where 29 suspects in what some call Spain's 9/11 went on trial, accused of bombing four crowded commuter trains back in 2004. 191 people were killed in those terrorist attacks."

The Washington Post (2/16, A12, Anderson, Rolfe, 690K) reports, "Twenty-nine suspects went on trial Thursday for the March 11, 2004, bombings of four commuter trains in Madrid, but Spain's political parties and news media have turned the investigation of the attack into a partisan battle, fraying the country's traditional solidarity against terrorism and leaving Spaniards bitterly divided over who launched the attack and why." The "strongest evidence collected by investigators suggests that the bombings -- which killed 191 people and injured 1,824 in the worst terrorist attack ever carried out in continental Europe -- were the work of Islamic radicals inspired by al-Qaeda, principally in retaliation for the stationing of Spanish troops in Iraq." But leaders of the conservative Popular Party "continue to assert that the Basque separatist movement known as ETA had a central role in the bombings. Some independent terrorism experts accuse the Popular Party -- in power at the time of the attack and voted out of office in national elections three days later -- of spinning conspiracy theories to escape blame for the bombings and redeem itself with the public."

Attorneys Say "Torture" Left Padilla Incompetent. The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Richey, 59K) reports suspected Al Qaeda operative Jose Padilla "is facing an April trial in federal court here on charges that he became a willing Al Qaeda recruit in a violent global jihad. But his lawyers complain that Padilla's harsh treatment during nearly four years of military detention and interrogation has left him so psychologically damaged that he is unable to help wage his own defense." In a hearing before US District Judge Marcia Cooke, federal prosecutors "are expected to urge the judge to ignore everything that took place during Padilla's military detention. They say his harsh treatment is irrelevant to whether he is mentally competent to stand trial." Padilla's lawyers "disagree. They say their client was tortured by the military and they are asking the judge to order the government to fully account for its treatment of Padilla." The "issue of the scope of the judge's inquiry into Padilla's mental condition is important because it could open the door to the first detailed examination of torture allegations made by an alleged enemy combatant."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

"Washington Legend" Faced With Difficult Task Of Building DHS Intelligence Unit. The New York Times (2/16, Lipton, 1.16M) profiles "born contrarian" and "Washington legend" Charles E. Allen, who has taken on "a job that virtually no one else wanted, to rescue a fledging intelligence operation that gets little respect and assumes a role doubters say is not even necessary." As he works "to build a credible operation" as head of the intelligence unit at the Department of Homeland Security, "Allen has muscled his way into meetings of the nation's top spy agency chiefs, claimed ground that the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the C.I.A. had already carved up, defended his efforts before Congress and forced rivals to make room — sometimes literally — for his department." Allen has also "met resistance" from some leaders within the Department of Homeland Security, "over whom he has little direct authority." The Times continues to describe Allen's myriad challenges, which, coupled with Congressional demands for progress, have led some friends to "believe his task is almost hopeless."

Accidental Tainted Food Outbreaks Fuel Concern About Agroterror. The CDC yesterday warned of a Peter Pan peanut butter tainted with salmonella – urging consumers to throw out jars with a product code on the lid beginning with "2111" – and the CBS Evening News (2/15, story 7, 3:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported in its "CBS News in Focus" segment that the incident is "presumed to be an accident, but what's to prevent intentional food poisoning by terrorists?" CBS (Orr) added, "Nearly 300 people were sick before the current salmonella outbreak could be tracked to a peanut butter processor in Georgia." It and the recent e. Coli outbreak "underscore a frightening reality -- once a poison or bioagent infects America's food chain, it's hard to detect and even harder to stop, making the US food supply an inviting target for terrorists." John Perren, FBI: "This is the new fight, the new battleground since September 11." Orr: "John Perren, who runs the FBI office handling weapons of mass destruction, says so-called agro-terrorism is a real threat from 'farm to fork.'" Perren: "The food chain, agriculture system is very large. Therefore, we have vulnerabilities. We consider that a soft target." Orr: "The most worrisome agro-weapon is foot-and-mouth," and the "virus could be easily carried into the United States from an infected area by a tourist or terrorist. … CBS News got an exclusive look at a first-of-its-kind, yet-to-be-opened, agriculture bio-security center. Here investigators will work to identify emerging biothreats, handling some of the most lethal pathogens from e. Coli, to anthrax, to foot and mouth." CBS News also posts the story on its Web site.

Lieberman Measure Would Extend Union Rights To TSA Workers. Under the headline, "Effort To Give TSA Screeners Union Rights Advances," the Washington Post's (2/16, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports that the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee "approved a measure that would give collective-bargaining rights to about 43,000 airport screeners at the Transportation Security Administration." The Post adds that if the full Senate also approves the measure, "the issue of union rights for TSA screeners is likely to provoke a rare clash with the White House over federal workplace rules. After the House vote, the Bush administration vowed to oppose the legislation." The Post adds that committee chairman "Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.)," proposed "the union-rights amendment to" a Senate bill to "implement unfinished recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission" and the amendment was approved on a "party-line vote of 9 to 8." The Post adds, "Lieberman said 'personnel management has been troubled at TSA' and concluded that 'it is time to give TSA screeners parity with other security officers within TSA and DHS in terms of their employment rights and protections.'"

Senate Bill Lacks "Radical" Cargo, Port Screening Measures. The Washington Times/UPI (2/16, Waterman) reports the union rights measure came during the committee's mark up of legislation implementing the remaining recommendations of the September 11 commission, which "also mandates a pilot project that would allow new secure driver's licenses to be used instead of passports at the Canadian border. However, it does not contain some of the more radical cargo and port security measures in the House version."

Engineer Calls For Less "Conservative Approach" To Freedom Tower. In a New York Times (2/16, 1.16M) op-ed, structural engineer and author Guy Nordenson faults the current design for the Freedom Tower, the structure scheduled to be built on the site of the World Trade Center, calling it's design "a very conservative approach. The result, a 20-story fortified wall around the base of a 1,776-foot tower, hardly evokes freedom — rather, it embodies fear and anxiety." Nordenson suggests that the original design was altered by former Gov. George Pataki for political and symbolic reasons and says "the alterations, unfortunately, made the design impossible to build, and eventually the entire concept was abandoned." The new design, engineered to meet Pataki's parameters, "is in every way inferior, and those flaws — in terms of aesthetics, economics, security and ethics — are all rooted in the way in which it was conceived." Nordenson details these perceived design flaws, continuing to suggest that there is insufficient demand for tenant space in the new building. He concludes, "The good news is that it is not too late to change things. … The work should continue up to the ground level and stop (this should take about a year) so that the architects and engineers are given another chance to design a Freedom Tower that, like other buildings rising downtown, is financially viable and a secure and welcoming work environment worthy of its place in the skyline."

Couple Drops Katrina Damage Insurance Suit. The AP (2/16, Kunzelman) reports, "The first federal trial in New Orleans in the wave of insurance litigation spawned by Hurricane Katrina ended abruptly Thursday when a couple suing Allstate Indemnity Co. dropped their lawsuit amid allegations they misrepresented their claims." The AP continues, "Lawrence and Elizabeth Tomlinson, who claimed Allstate underpaid them and acted in bad faith in handling their claims, agreed to drop the suit before jurors could hear closing arguments in the case. … The Tomlinsons' attorney, Christy Howley, would not specify why they didn't let a jury decide the case, but Allstate, in court papers, had accused the couple of misrepresenting their claim." The AP adds, "The Northbrook, Ill.-based insurer said it paid the Tomlinsons more than $30,000 for living expenses after they moved into office property that they already owned. Lawrence Tomlinson testified that Allstate knew of their living arrangement when they made the payment. … Allstate paid the Tomlinsons a total of more than $150,000 for damage to their home and its contents, plus living expenses. The couple claimed the company underpaid them after Katrina's winds tore holes in their roof and let rain pour into their home in the New Orleans suburb of Marrero. … The insurer disputed the extent of the damage and suggested that the couple overbilled them for certain renovations to the home. Allstate attorney Judy Barrasso declined to say whether the company has considered taking further legal action against the couple."

WSJournal Blames Mississippi Attorney General For State Farm's Departure. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "State Farm, the nation's largest home insurer, announced this week that it would no longer be writing new homeowner or commercial policies in Mississippi. Magnolia Staters wondering whom to thank for their rising insurance bills, assuming they can get insurance at all, should direct their catcalls at Attorney General Jim Hood." In the "wake of Hurricane Katrina, private insurers began invoking their entirely legal 'flood exclusions' and refusing to pay for any damage that wasn't caused by wind. These exclusions had been clearly written into contracts, yet Mr. Hood declared them 'unconscionable' and sued the industry." He "claimed victory several weeks ago when he bludgeoned State Farm into a settlement, although everyone can now see his triumph comes at a price. State Farm will now be paying at least tens of millions of dollars in claims that it never factored into its risk premiums, and it has reasonably chosen not to make itself vulnerable again to Mr. Hood's extortion." Hood "and his buddies in the tort bar have provided an exquisite illustration of how political and legal predation against business ends up harming the little guy."

Hundreds Of New Orleans' "Best And Brightest" Leaving City. Under the headline "In Setback For New Orleans, Fed-Up Residents Give Up," the New York Times (2/16, Dewan, 1.16M) reports on the hundreds of New Orleans' "best and brightest who, as if finally acknowledging a lover's destructive impulses, have made the wrenching decision to leave at a time when the population is supposed to be rebounding. Their reasons include high crime, high rents, soaring insurance premiums and what many call a lack of leadership, competence, money and progress." The Times adds that many of those deciding to leave describe "a dissipating sense of possibility, a dwindling chance at redemption for a great city that, even before the storm, cried out for great improvement." Meanwhile, though "many poorer residents have moved back to the city, the 'brain drain' of professionals that the city was experiencing before the storm appears to have accelerated."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Orders Additional Troops To Afghanistan. ABC World News (2/15, story 5, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In a speech, today, President Bush focused on the other war, Afghanistan. The US will send 3,000 reinforcements there. And the President urged NATO nations to send more troops, as well. The President also warned that more fighting could come in Afghanistan." ABC (Ross) added that "without directly saying it, the President, today, essentially conceded that Al Qaeda is making a comeback. The comeback is taking place in the mountains of Pakistan, near the border with Afghanistan. Pakistan pulled its troops out five months ago and will not allow US troops to go in." Bush was shown saying, "Taliban, al Qaeda fighters are in remote regions of Pakistan. This is wild country. This is wilder than the Wild West."

The Financial Times (2/16, Daniel, Sevastopulo) reports, "Borrowing the rhetoric of US and Nato commanders, who are preparing to step up their campaign against the Taliban, Mr Bush said: 'This spring there's going to be a new offensive in Afghanistan. It's going to be a Nato offensive, and that's part of our strategy.'" The Pentagon "will send the 173rd Airborne brigade, which was originally scheduled for deployment to Iraq, to Afghanistan to replace another brigade whose tour was recently extended by several months." In a speech to the American Enterprise Institute, Bush "sought to set out a strategy for political and military success, saying troop increases would be sustained." USA Today (2/16, Jackson, 2.27M) notes "the American Enterprise Institute was once home to several members of the Bush administration, such as Vice President Cheney, and has long supported Bush's foreign policy initiatives."

The Washington Times (2/16, Dinan, 88K) reports the President "promised a five-part plan designed to put Afghan President Hamid Karzai's government on more solid footing, including training 26,000 more national police and 48,000 more troops for the military; strengthening NATO's commitment; improving provincial government; reversing last year's growth in heroin-producing poppy, which finances the Taliban; and helping Mr. Karzai fight corruption in the judicial system." Bush's speech "comes as a growing number of Democrats and Republicans say the administration has failed to complete the mission in Afghanistan in part because Mr. Bush has been too preoccupied in Iraq."

NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 4, 1:00, Williams, 9.87M) said the President "acknowledged the 2006 was the most violent year in Afghanistan since the US arrived there in 2001." Bush was shown saying, "We face a thinking enemy. And we face a tough enemy. They watch our actions, they adjust their tactics. And in 2006, this enemy struck back with vengeance."

The AP (2/16, Riechmann) reports, "Calling poppy cultivation a threat to a fragile democracy, Bush implored President Hamid Karzai to address the marked increase in harvests last year, after a decline in 2005. 'I have made my concerns to President Karzai pretty clear -- not pretty clear, very clear -- and that in order for him to gain the confidence of his people, and the confidence of the world, he's got to do something about it, with our help,' Bush said."

The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Reynolds, 850K) notes Bush "mentioned the troop increase as well as the administration's request for congressional approval of an additional $11.8 billion in aid over two years to shore up the government of…Karzai." Frederick D. Barton, "who studies postwar reconstruction at the nonpartisan Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the president's speech appeared aimed at preparing the public for a bloody spring in Afghanistan."

The Washington Post (2/16, A15, Baker, DeYoung, 690K) says "major NATO allies have so far resisted the sort of robust engagement that Bush wants," while McClatchy (2/16, Hutcheson) reports "analysts say that British, Danish and Canadian troops are sharing the burden with American soldiers in Afghanistan. Estonia, Poland and Romania also have helped. Most of the criticism" from the US "is directed at France, Germany, Italy, Spain and Turkey."

The Washington Post (2/15, A21, Kamen, 690K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that Bush "tried to wander off-message a little, to folksify his chat. He hailed prosecutors, judges, police and defense lawyers for going over to Afghanistan to mentor their counterparts. 'And I appreciate our own citizens going over there. It is, must be neat, really -- I guess 'neat' isn't a sophisticated word, but it must be heartening to be somebody who's helping this young democracy develop a judicial system that is worthy.' Or maybe gratifying?"

The New York Times (2/16, Stolberg, 1.16M) reports, "The speech renewed criticism from Democrats that had the United States not been tied down in Iraq, the situation in Afghanistan would not have turned dire. At the same time, some Republican lawmakers said Mr. Bush's new strategy would not do enough to tamp down the Afghan drug trade." And "outside experts criticized the president for painting too rosy a picture." The speech was also "a striking effort by the White House to focus attention back on Afghanistan at a time when Congress is debating resolutions criticizing Mr. Bush's strategy in Iraq and the administration is making a case that Iranian forces are supplying Shiite militants in Iraq with roadside bombs."

The New York Times (2/16, Kifner, 1.16M) reports on the "the 3,200 soldiers of the 10th Mountain Division whose one-year deployment in Afghanistan has been extended by four months." They "were so close to the end of their tour that their uniforms, gear and equipment had been packed into shipping containers and an advance party had already reached Fort Drum, their home in upstate New York. The extension, mentioned in…Bush's speech yesterday, was originally announced on Jan. 25." The Times adds, "About 50 soldiers from the advance party came home in late January, said Benjamin Abel, a Fort Drum spokesman. A group of about 150 were intercepted in Kuwait before they could reach the States, he added. All have since been sent back to Afghanistan as part of a buildup in anticipation of a renewed Taliban offensive in the spring."

Bush's comments on Afghanistan were extensively covered by local TV newscasts, with most stations pointing out that the President wants more assistance from NATO. Some examples: WTXL-TV Tallahassee (2/15, 11:08 pm) reported early on in its 11 o'clock news program that Bush "is asking Congress for nearly $12 billion to keep up the fight in Afghanistan." The President "wants additional troops and says our allies should follow suit. … Mr. Bush called on NATO forces to do more and said the organization will launch a new offensive this spring with the help of more US funds and the extended stay of 3,200 US troops."

KAIT-TV Jonesboro, AR (2/15, 10:13 pm) reported, "For a second day, President Bush tried to re-dedicate the people's will to a battlefield far away." While the President cited "remarkable" progress in Afghanistan, "he also painted a grim picture." The station showed the President saying, "Last year, the number of roadside bomb attacks almost doubled. Suicide bombings grew nearly five-fold. These escalating attacks were part of a Taliban offensive that made 2006 the most violent year in Afghanistan since the liberation of the country." Many other stations ran footage of the President's Afghanistan comments, including KCNC-TV Denver (2/15, 6:37 pm), WNYT-TV Albany (2/15, 5:40 pm), and KTVZ-TV Bend, OR (2/15, 5:06 pm).

Neumann Echoes Bush's Call For More Troops. In its "Embassy Row" column, the Washington Times (2/16, Morrison) reports the US ambassador to Afghanistan, Ronald Neumann, "sounded the call in Kabul for more NATO troops, as President Bush in Washington warned of the dangers of a spring offensive by Taliban forces trying to regain control in the Central Asian nation." In an interview with AFP, Neumann said he would "like to see NATO countries collectively put in place the forces that NATO and its military committee have said are necessary." The ambassador noted that some NATO "partners do a great deal," citing the troops deployments from Britain, Canada, Denmark, the Netherlands and Romania. But "did not criticize the other members of the 37-nation alliance," like Germany, who "restrict their troops from engaging in key areas in the south and east where Taliban fighters are concentrated."

Al Qaeda Releases Video Of Attacks On US Troops In Afghanistan. The AP (2/16) reports al-Qaeda posted a video on the Internet Friday "showing what they claimed to be an insurgent attack on a military position of US and Afghan forces in southern Afghanistan." The video "appears to be an attempt by the terrorist network to disparage US claims that it is winning the war against the Taliban and allied militia in Afghanistan." In the video, al-Qaeda deputy leader, Ayman al-Zawahri, is how "ridiculing President Bush and saying that his claim to have deprived al-Qaeda of a safe haven in Afghanistan" is a "bare-faced lie."

Pentagon Seeks "Rapid Acquisition Fund." USA Today (2/16, Brook, 2.27M) reports, "Fierce fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan has forced the Pentagon to speed new weapons and equipment to troops at faster rates than ever, according to military records and officials." The Pentagon budget proposed by Bush "adds even more money for what military leaders call 'urgent need' requests. For the first time, the budget includes $100 million for a Pentagon 'rapid acquisition fund' aimed at getting vital supplies to troops in the field more quickly."

As House Resolution Vote Nears, Attention Shifts To Murtha Measure. As the House moves toward an expected vote today on a nonbinding resolution criticizing President Bush's Iraq policy, reporting shifts to Rep. Jack Murtha's measure that would, in the words of the CBS Evening News (2/15, story 3, 2:05, Attkisson, 7.66M), "place substantial roadblocks in the way of the President's troop surge." CBS said Murtha, "head of the powerful committee that approves funding for the war, made it clear he plans to go well beyond symbolism." His legislation "would prohibit sending any soldiers back into battle until they've had a full year at home. It would set equipment and training requirements that the military can't currently meet. And it would stop Pentagon from extending current battlefield tours, a practice that has become routine. … At his press conference yesterday, President Bush seemed to see Murtha's tactics coming." Bush: "My hope, however, is this nonbinding resolution doesn't try to turn into a binding policy that prevents our troops from doing that what I asked them to do." Attkisson: "It's not clear yet whether Murtha's proposal can pass the House and Senate but he's clearly putting his muscle behind it."

On its front page, the Washington Post (2/16, Weisman, Murray, 690K) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "linked her support for President Bush's war-funding request to strict standards of resting, training and equipping combat forces, a move that could curtail troop deployments and alter the course of U.S. involvement in Iraq." Murtha, "a Pelosi ally, is rewriting the president's spending request to limit Bush's options in prosecuting the war." Pelosi said, "If we are going to support our troops, we should respect what is considered reasonable for them: their training, their equipment and their time at home." Also on its front page, the Washington Times (2/16, Ward, 88K) reports on the Murtha measure, saying that "some Democrats said the proposal, released on the eve of a symbolic vote against the war in Iraq, does not do enough to stop the war."

USA Today (2/16, 10A, Kiely, 2.27M) says the "showdown votes" over Iraq "may dramatize the breadth of discontent with the White House war strategy, but they also demonstrate the limits of how far Democrats are willing to go to change it." USA Today says Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid were both "cool" toward Murtha's proposal. The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Chaddock, 59K) says the "next move" could create a rift among Democrats, which is what Murtha "hopes to avoid" by opposing "a troop buildup in Iraq, without cutting funds to troops in harm's way." The Politico (2/15, Bresnahan) says Murtha "is not pushing a total cutoff of funds for the war in Iraq. But he is considering measure to limit the military actions Bush can take against Iran." He "also intends to push a provision to bar the creation of permanent U.S. military bases in Iraq and to raze the notorious Abu Ghraib prison." The AP (2/15, Flaherty) says Murtha "is quickly emerging as one of President Bush's most formidable foes in the Iraq war debate."

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (2/16, Rogers, 2.04M) said Pelosi said the nonbinding vote expected today "represents a 'huge statement' that President Bush can't 'completely ignore' even if he is unwilling to change course militarily." The Washington Post (2/16, A3, Kane, 690K) says in a headline that a "broad swath" of House GOP members are "defecting" on the resolution vote, but the article itself tallies them at just "a dozen or more." The Wall Street Journal (2/16, A4, Harwood, 2.04M) "Washington Wire" writes that "predictions range from 20 to 40" on the total number of GOP defectors.

Local TV newscasts across the country devoted widespread coverage to the continuing House debate, with many stations airing reports on the story focused on Rep. Murtha's plan to stop the surge. Some examples: WFMJ-TV Youngstown (2/15, 11:21 pm) reported that "the House moved closer to a non-binding resolution against the Bush surge in Iraq. … To try to stall the surge, a powerful Democrat today proposed cutting off funds. John Murtha, on the website of MoveCongress.org, detailed his plan not to pay to surge in any soldiers who've had too much time in Iraq or too little training." The station showed Rep. Murtha saying, "That stops the surge for all intents and purposes, because, as I said over a year ago, they cannot sustain this deployment."

WINK-TV Ft. Myers (2/15, 11:18 pm) reported, "Murtha wants any future deployments to Iraq tied to two conditions. Troops would have to meet high standards of training and they would have to get enough rest between combat tours. Murtha said that would stop the President's plan since he doesn't think a single army unit meets the standards." KPNX-TV Phoenix (2/15, 10:08 pm) and KGWN-TV Cheyenne (2/18, 10:02 pm) were just two of the many other local TV stations in various parts of the country also taking note of Murtha's anti-surge plan.

Members Of House Air Views On Resolution. USA Today (2/16, 10A, Kiely, Kiely, 2.27M) samples the views of four representatives – all Democrats – who support the resolution, and four – all Republicans – who oppose it. Among the supporters, Rep. Mike McIntyre said, "We cannot continue to increase troop levels in Iraq at the expense of allowing the Taliban to come back into power in Afghanistan." Rep. John Conyers said, "This week, we tell this administration enough is enough; stop ignoring the American people; stop ignoring your generals." Among the opponents,

DOJ_NMG_0133166

Rep. Jack Kingston said, "Here is what the Democrats are up to: Dearest troops, we support you, but your mission is in the tank. … You are on your own." Rep. Dan Burton said, "If we don't deal with this problem now, we will deal with it later, and the costs will be a heck of a lot more than it is today, and it may involve millions and millions of lives."

And on Fox News' Your World (2/15, Cavuto), Rep. Eric Cantor said, "We're at war right now. We have real lives, men and women, on the battlefield, in the arena, in Baghdad, as we speak. … What kind of message is that to them? We have got to give them everything they need right now to fight and win this war."

Iraq Setting Up "Constitutional Clash" Between White House, Congress. The Washington Post (2/16, A5, Abramowitz, 690K) says that while Bush "has not been shy about asserting robust powers for the presidency in waging war," he has recently "seemed to concede that Congress has a role to play as well. Lawmakers, he has indicated, are within their rights to try to cap total deployments or limit where troops can go in Iraq." But as the "debate in Congress shifts from nonbinding resolutions of disapproval for adding troops in Iraq to attaching conditions on funding for the war, a constitutional clash between the legislative and executive branches may be inevitable, say lawmakers and legal scholars with close ties to the administration." The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Hook, 850K) reports that while congressional Democrats "quickly and easily united behind a nonbinding resolution denouncing President Bush's plan to send more U.S. troops to Iraq," the party will next "confront more divisive questions: how to force a determined president to back down from his plan, and whether to push for a complete withdrawal."

Vilsack Says Congress Should Cut Off Funding For Iraq War. Presidential candidate Tom Vilsack said on NBC's Tonight Show With Jay Leno (2/15) that he would end the Iraq war immediately, adding, "I would ask Congress to have the constitutional fortitude and the moral authority to say to the President, 'Mr. President, you've made a serious mistake. We're cutting off funding now. We're going to bring our troops home.'"

Democratic State Legislators Push Resolutions Against Surge. The New York Times (2/16, A14, Steinhauer, 1.16M) reports state legislators across the country, "frustrated by the inability of Democrats in Congress to pass a resolution opposing President Bush's policies in Iraq," are "pushing forward with their own resolutions. Resolutions have passed in chambers of three legislatures, in California, Iowa and Vermont. The Maryland General Assembly sent a letter to its Congressional delegation, signed by a majority of the State Senate and close to a majority of the House, urging opposition to the increase in troops in Iraq. Letters or resolutions are being drafted in at least 19 other states."

Eagleburger Says Resolution Shows "Weakness To Our Enemies." On Fox News' Your World (2/15, Cavuto), ex-Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger said, "It sends a bad message. It sends a bad message to the troops. It sends a bad message -- or a good one, depending on your point of view -- to our enemies. It does everything that I should think some decades of American history would tell us we should never do, and that is show our weakness to our enemies."

Broder Says Bush "Poised For A Political Comeback." In his Washington Post (2/16, A23, 690K) column, headlined "Bush Regains His Footing," David Broder writes, "It may seem perverse to suggest that, at the very moment the House of Representatives is repudiating his policy in Iraq, President Bush is poised for a political comeback. But don't be astonished if that is the case." Bush "now shows signs of renewed energy and is regaining the initiative on several fronts. More important, he is demonstrating political smarts that even his critics have to acknowledge. His reaction to the planned House vote opposing the increase he ordered in US troops deployed to Iraq illustrates the point." Bush "did three things to diminish the impact of that impending defeat," by arguing that the "House was at odds with the Senate," by minimizing the "stakes in the House debate by endorsing the good motives of his critics," and that by "contrasting today's vote on a nonbinding resolution with the pending vote on funding the war in Iraq," shifting "the battleground to a fight he is likely to win."

Reid Schedules Senate Resolution Procedural Vote For Saturday. The Washington Post (2/16, A2, Milbank, 690K) writes that "after four years of fighting in Iraq, and two weeks of trying to force senators to debate the conflict, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid yesterday wheeled out the ultimate weapon. He ordered his colleagues to work on Saturday." The New York Times (2/16, A8, Zeleny, Toner, 1.16M) reports that as the House "prepared to pass a symbolic resolution denouncing President Bush's war policy," in the Senate, Reid "abruptly scheduled a weekend debate on Iraq in an effort to break a stalemate and avoid impressions that partisan bickering was weighing down deliberations over the war." When they convene Saturday afternoon, senators "will not debate the Iraq resolution itself. Instead, they will be taking up a procedural vote required under Senate rules to move forward to the actual debate."

The Washington Times (2/16, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Reid "said he did not take members' 2008 aspirations -- or planned weekend visits to Iowa and New Hampshire -- into consideration" in scheduling the vote." Sen. Joseph Biden "was the first to say he would scrap plans for an Iowa visit to make sure he participated" in the vote, while Sen. Hillary Clinton will pop back to Washington from New Hampshire, then return to the leadoff primary state after the vote. Sen. Sam Brownback "will stay for the vote," but "there was no indication Sen. John McCain…would reschedule his morning town-hall forum in Des Moines." The plans of Sens. Christopher Dodd and Barack Obama remain unclear.

Biden Seeks To Narrow Bush's Iraq Authority. The AP (2/15, Schweid) reports Biden said he would "move to repeal the authority Congress gave President Bush in 2002 to send U.S. troops into Iraq and replace it with a narrower mandate." Biden, who chairs the Foreign Relations Committee, "said the legislation was based on the idea that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction and was designed to oust Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein." He said he is "working to repeal the authorization and to replace it with 'a much narrower mission statement for our troops in Iraq.'"

Asked on CNN's The Situation Room (2/15, Blitzer) about Bush's remark that "this may become the first time in the history of the United States Congress that it has voted to send a new commander into battle and then voted to oppose his plan that is necessary to succeed in that battle," Biden said, "I think that's ridiculous. It's a little bit like saying that because I opposed the war in Iraq that I should be against the military. I mean this is the President of the United States' plan. It's not Petraeus' plan. … I know Gen. Petraeus. He's a fine guy and he's perfectly capable of leading our forces. The policy he's asked to lead on is a mistake. … He's sending 17,500 people into the middle of Baghdad, 6.2 million people, a lot of them without the right armor, without the right vests. We ought to get real here. This is a president who sent our troops to war unprepared. He didn't send enough of them to war. Now he's sending them in the middle of a civil war."

Auditors Say $10 Billion Wasted In Iraq Reconstruction Efforts. The AP (2/16, Yen) reports, "About $10 billion has been squandered by the US government on Iraq reconstruction aid because of contractor overcharges and unsupported expenses, and federal investigators warned Thursday that significantly more taxpayer money is at risk." The "three top auditors overseeing work in Iraq told a House committee" their review "of $57 billion in Iraq contracts found that Defense and State department officials condoned or allowed repeated work delays, bloated expenses and payments for shoddy work or work never done. More than one in six dollars charged by US contractors were questionable or unsupported, nearly triple the amount of waste the Government Accountability Office estimated last fall." David M. Walker, "who heads the auditing arm of Congress," said, "There is no accountability."

The Wall Street Journal (2/16, A4, Paltrow, 2.04M) reports, "Under questioning by the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, Defense Contract Audit Agency chief William Reed confirmed that unsupported and questionable costs found in Iraq reconstruction contracting total more than $10 billion -- nearly three times the previous public estimate." Under Chairman Henry Waxman, "the committee is holding a series of hearings into contracting abuses in Iraq. Staffers confirmed that Mr. Waxman and other committee Democrats likely will take a much wider look at defense contracting after the Iraq hearings conclude."

Al Qaeda In Iraq Head Reportedly Wounded As Security Push Sweep Continues. The CBS Evening News (2/15, story 4, :25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The Iraqi Interior Ministry claims tonight its forces wounded a major terrorist leader. He's Abu Ayyub al-Masri, the head of the group known as Al Qaeda in Iraq. The US military has not confirmed the report, and the Iraqis did not say what his condition is or whether he's in custody. But they do say his top aide was killed in a battle near Balad, north of Baghdad." NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 3, 2:05, Williams, 9.87M) also reported on the "showdown between Al Qaeda and the Iraqi police. And one of Iraq's most wanted was wounded but apparently not captured."

The Washington Post (2/16, A13, Londoño, 690K) reports "US officials have said Masri took over the leadership of the insurgent group following the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who was killed by US forces in a June 2006 airstrike."

USA Today (2/16, 11A, 2.27M) reports, "Meanwhile Thursday, US and Iraqi forces pushed deeper into Sunni militant strongholds in Baghdad as part of a wide-ranging security sweep of the capital." US and Iraqi soldiers "set up dozens of roadway checkpoints around the city and conducted top-to-bottom searches of vehicles as part of their new campaign to disarm militias and pacify the capital. Low-flying fighter jets thundered over the capital. A spokesman for the US military in Baghdad, Maj. Steven Lamb, said 17 suspects were arrested and three weapons caches seized."

The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Daragahi, 850K) reports, "On Thursday, US forces often found themselves back at the small bases they used in the early months after the 2003 invasion. The facilities were abandoned as US commanders under the direction of Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. decided to lower the American profile in neighborhoods and hand security over to Iraqi forces." The Times adds, "Since then, a once-vibrant Baghdad has become a forbidding maze of concrete walls and concertina wire roamed by mysterious gunmen, where petrified residents rush to their homes before dark."

ABC World News (2/15, story 4, 2:05, Gibson, 8.78M) said US and Iraqi troops "have begun a security crackdown in Baghdad, setting up checkpoints and pushing into militant strong holds in Baghdad. We have seen Pentagon documents from almost five years ago that indicate Defense officials in their prewar planning thought that at this point after the war, there would only be a few thousand troops left in Iraq. Obviously, they were way off in their estimate." The CBS Evening News (2/15, story 5, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) was similarly critical, saying the "security crackdown continued today in the capital with US and Iraqi forces moving into a Sunni neighborhood after sweeping three Shiite sections yesterday. For most of the city, the crackdown is not yet stopping the violence."

Iraqi President Says Sadr Has Ordered Top Deputies To Leave Country. The Washington Post (2/16, A13, Londoño, 690K) reports "Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said anti-American Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr has ordered his top deputies to leave Iraq in order to ease the implementation of the Baghdad security plan, which U.S. and Iraqi forces began to roll out this week. Sadr, the leader of the powerful Mahdi Army militia, recently went to Iran, according to US officials." In Washington, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates "said he believed that Sadr's followers were concerned about the new operation to secure Baghdad and suggested that Sadr and his militia would 'go to ground' over the coming months."

The New York Times (2/16, A10, Cave, 1.16M) reports, "Questions and accusations continued to swirl about the whereabouts of the militant Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr on Thursday. … Two Shiite leaders stepped forward on Thursday to confirm American reports this week that Mr. Sadr had gone to Iran." But they and a "Parliament member from a different Shiite party" took exception to "suggestions that he had fled because of a crackdown on militias and had permanently moved to Iran. They said that the cleric often visited the country and that it was unclear why he had left or when he would come back." One said he "could return to Iraq on Friday."

On Fox News' Your World (2/15, Cavuto), ex-Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger said of Sadr, "He is a coward. He is not ready to fight it out. And he's not ready to stay around. He has run off when the going gets tough. I happen to know that, a long time ago, when [Paul] Bremer was running that operation in Iraq, he recommended to Washington that they go in and get al-Sadr in his fortress there in Baghdad at the time. And Washington came back and told him no. And, if there is any bad judgment that was involved in this, that was one of them. If they had gotten him back in those early days, we wouldn't have all this mess now."

Schoomaker Says Surge Of 17,500 Just "Tip Of The Iceberg." The Washington Post (2/16, A13, Tyson, 690K) reports outgoing Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker said the "increase of 17,500 Army combat troops in Iraq represents only the 'tip of the iceberg' and will potentially require thousands of additional support troops and trainers, as well as equipment -- further eroding the Army's readiness to respond to other world contingencies."

Peretz Says Iraq Failure Would Be "Huge Defeat" For Both Bush And Liberalism. In a Wall Street Journal (2/16, A15, 2.04M) op-ed, New Republic editor in chief Martin Peretz writes, "Our political imagination of evil is impoverished, and nowhere is it more impoverished than in Iraq. Even today, when the blood of innocents flows so richly and regularly, we do not seem to grasp its origins, or its power. That is, we do not seem to grasp the centrality, and the perdurability, of culture. And in this regard, the president and his party, as well as the Democratic Party, are equally blinded by their respective orthodoxies. … The carnage between Shia and Sunni, and the carnage among other religious and ethnic communions, since the end of Ottoman rule have left deep and bloodied breaches in Iraq. If these cannot be repaired, it will be a huge defeat for George Bush -- and, whatever many liberals think of it, for liberalism as well."

US To Open Doors To As Many As 7,000 Iraqi Refugees. NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 9, , Williams, 9.87M) ran an "In Depth" report on the State Department announcement "that as many as 7,000 refugees from the Iraq war will be allowed to come to this country. There has been criticism that the US government still isn't doing enough to help Iraqis, help those who have risked their lives to help the American war effort in Iraq." NBC (Colt) profiled one Iraqi who acted as an interpreter for American forces, reporting that the State Department will offer "no priority for Iraqis" like him. Sen. Edward Kennedy "says that is not fair." Kennedy: "For those individuals in particular, we have a special responsibility. We have to do everything to protect them."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Prusher, 59K) writes that "only 202 Iraqis were permitted to take refuge in the US in 2006. Since the US-led invasion, 466 Iraqis have been allowed entry to the US as refugees, according to figures given by the State Department at a Senate hearing last month. The numbers are particularly stark in comparison with the scope of a burgeoning refugee problem. The UN High Commissioner for Refugees estimates that there are some 2 million Iraqi refugees, most in the region, with the numbers in Jordan rivaled only by those in Syria. Add to that number another 1.8 million Iraqis who are internally displaced. During the first half of 2006, the UN says, Iraqis became the largest asylum-seeking nationality in Europe."

Iraqi Living In New York Says She Has "Not Left The War." In a New York Times (2/16, A23, 1.16M) op-ed, Ayub Nuri, a former reporter for the Institute for War and Peace Reporting, writes, "I am an Iraqi, and although I love my country, I needed to get out. … But on my first day in New York, I realized that I had not left the war. Rather, it had followed me here, and I had to fight it every day. Every time I talked to someone at a party, in a taxi or at the store, the same chain of questions would follow after I said I was from Iraq. Some people gaped. Others sat silent for a second, then shook my hand differently. 'Wow, so interesting,' they would say. 'So what do you think of the whole situation? What went wrong over there?' Finally, the inevitable: 'Do you think we should pull out?' … No matter how I perceive the war, no matter how many more friends I lose, no matter who is killing whom, as long as there is a war, I have to live with its nightmares and fight them thousands of miles away."

Camp Pendleton Ceremony Honors Fallen Marines. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Perry, 850K) reports that in a Camp Pendleton ceremony "filled with tears and expressions of pride, 100 members of the Regimental Combat Team 5 killed during the recent deployment in Iraq were remembered Thursday as among 'the finest young men our nation has ever produced.'" Regimental commanding officer Col. Larry Nicholson "said the 100 were part of the 'newest greatest generation' who answered their nation's call after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks."

Soldier Discussed His Personal Mission On Web Page. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Watanabe, 850K) also runs a 2,000-word piece on Army 2nd Lt. Mark Jennings Daily, who discussed his reasons for joining the Army and going to Iraq on a MySpace Web page. Daily was killed by a roadside bomb in Mosul last month.

Military Death Gratuity Sometimes Fails To Reach Survivors In Need. In a front-page piece, the Washington Post (2/15, George, 690K) writes about the "$100,000 'death gratuity' that military spouses ordinarily get -- a payment intended to ease the financial strain as families await government survivors' benefits" – and how non-traditional families cope. Susan Jaenke "is not a wife, not a husband, but instead grandmother to the 9-year-old her daughter left behind" when she was killed in Iraq. By law, "the $100,000 benefit goes first to a spouse or a child. So 9-year-old Kayla Jaenke collects the $100,000 -- plus $400,000 in life insurance -- after she turns 18, leaving Susan Jaenke to ask, 'What about the next nine years?' In some other families, the $100,000 death benefit has gone to neither the children nor the grandparents who are raising them."

Post Offices Named After Soldiers Killed In Action. USA Today (2/16, 1A, Zoroya, Hortobagyi, 2.27M) reports, "Federal lawmakers are increasingly naming post offices in their states after troops killed in combat, a tribute traditionally reserved for former members of Congress and famous figures such as Bob Hope and Ronald Reagan. Since 2003, the gesture has honored 26 servicemembers who died in Iraq and Afghanistan: 17 soldiers, seven Marines, a Navy SEAL and an Air National Guardsman. … Democrats and Republicans alike push the bills."

DOJ:

Former White House Counsel Linked To US Attorney Dismissal. The New York Times (2/16, Johnston) reports, "A United States attorney in Arkansas who was dismissed from his job last year by the Justice Department was ousted after Harriet E. Miers, the former White House counsel, intervened on behalf of the man who replaced him, according to Congressional aides briefed on the matter." The Times continues, "Ms. Miers, the aides said, phoned an aide to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales suggesting the appointment of J. Timothy Griffin, a former military and civilian prosecutor who was a political director for the Republican National Committee and a deputy to Karl Rove, the White House political adviser. … Later, the incumbent United States attorney, H. E. Cummins III, was removed without explanation and replaced on an interim basis by Mr. Griffin. Officials at the White House and Justice Department declined to comment on Ms. Miers's role in the matter." The Times adds, "Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, said at a hearing last week that Mr. Cummins had done nothing wrong but was removed to make room for Mr. Griffin. It was not known at the time Mr. McNulty testified that Ms. Miers had intervened on Mr. Griffin's behalf. … Her involvement was disclosed on Wednesday by Justice Department officials led by Mr. McNulty, who held a closed-door briefing for senators on the Judiciary Committee after Democrats criticized the dismissals of 7 to 10 United States attorneys as politically motivated. … Ms. Miers, whose resignation as White House counsel was effective Jan. 31, could not be reached for comment Thursday." The Times notes, "At the briefing, Justice Department officials denied that the White House had been involved in any of the other dismissals, suggesting that the department had acted on its own after advising the White House of its intention to remove incumbents. … Democrats have said the removals represented an effort to make room for rising political favorites of the Bush administration and to be rid of independent-minded prosecutors, all of whom had been appointed by President Bush."

GOP Blocks Bill To Limit DOJ Appointment Power. The AP (2/16, Kellman) reports, "Senate Republicans blocked a bill Thursday that would curb the Justice Department's power to fire and replace federal prosecutors. Democrats had sought to give the courts a role in the appointments of U.S. attorneys, to GOP opposition." The AP continues, "The objection by Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., to the proposal was long anticipated. So Democrats used the occasion to complain anew about the firings of at least seven prosecutors, including John McKay in Seattle, under a little-known part of the Patriot Act." The AP adds, 'Democrats say Attorney General Alberto Gonzales used the law to get around the Senate confirmation process and install Republican allies. … 'I believe that their intent was to bring in people from the outside to give some of their bright people an opportunity,' said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. 'That is wrong.' … Her bill says a replacement U.S. attorney could serve no longer than 120 days without confirmation. After that time, an interim replacement would be named by a U.S. District Court." The AP notes, "Gonzales, Kyl and other Republicans say this approach could lead prosecutors to be appointed for reasons other than their qualifications. … Republican and Democratic leaders tried for a compromise that might lengthen the 120-day period or curb a district court's appointment power, but those efforts were abandoned early Thursday, according to officials on both sides. … A private briefing Wednesday night by Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty did not change any Democrats' minds about the firings of the prosecutors, senators said. … Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., said that if the Justice Department does not provide detailed performance reports on the fired prosecutors, the Senate Judiciary Committee would subpoena them. … 'I am not satisfied with the answers we've gotten. There are just too many holes in too many different places,' Schumer said."

Reasons For McKay's Dismissal Still Unclear. The Seattle Times (2/16, Bowermaster) reports, "Two months after John McKay was fired as U.S. attorney for the Western District of Washington, the reason for his dismissal remains a mystery. … One of the most persistent rumors in Seattle legal circles is that the Justice Department forced McKay, a Republican, to resign to appease Washington state Republicans angry over the 2004 governor's race. Some believe McKay's dismissal was retribution for his failure to convene a federal grand jury to investigate allegations of voter fraud in the race." The Times continues, "The Evergreen Freedom Foundation filed a formal complaint with U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in 2005 about what it considered McKay's lax oversight of the election, in which Democratic Gov. Christine Gregoire defeated Republican Dino Rossi by 129 votes. Many influential Republicans publicly criticized McKay. … But a Justice Department official on Thursday rejected the idea and said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty has repeatedly insisted politics did not influence the controversial firings of McKay and six other U.S. attorneys in December." The Times adds, "McNulty had previously said the firings were 'performance-related' despite the fact McKay received a positive evaluation seven months before he was fired. … McKay said he was not given a reason when he was asked to step down." The Times notes, "McNulty defended the dismissals during private briefings with a handful of senators Wednesday. … The Justice Department official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, accused Democrats of mischaracterizing the briefings because they didn't agree with the department's conclusions. … 'Any suggestion that we were not thorough or forthcoming is just political gamesmanship,' the official said."

Interim California US Attorneys Named. The AP (2/16, Hoffman) reports, "The Justice Department announced temporary replacements Thursday for two recently ousted U.S. attorneys in San Diego and San Francisco." The AP continues, "Outgoing San Diego chief federal prosecutor Carol Lam will be succeeded by Karen Hewitt, a career federal prosecutor who is currently the executive assistant U.S. attorney for the Southern District of California. … In San Francisco, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan will be replaced by Scott Schools, a career federal prosecutor who currently works for the Justice Department overseeing legal guidance and personnel matters for all 94 U.S. attorney's offices across the country." The AP adds, "Hewitt's appointment was announced as staff and local law enforcement personnel gathered for a simple office farewell party just hours before Lam was due to leave her post. Ryan was scheduled to depart on Friday. … Both Hewitt and Schools will serve on an interim basis until new U.S. attorneys are nominated by the White House and confirmed by the Senate."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/16, Thornton) reports, "Karen P. Hewitt, third-in-command at the San Diego U.S. Attorney's office, has been chosen by Justice Department officials to replace outgoing top prosecutor Carol Lam on a temporary basis while a committee searches for a permanent candidate." The Union-Tribune continues, "Hewitt joined the San Diego office in 2000 and prosecuted civil fraud cases before she was appointed Executive Assistant U.S. attorney a year ago. … Before coming to San Diego, she was a lawyer in the Justice Department's civil division in Washington, where she specialized in constitutional law and civil rights cases for about eight years."

The Oakland Tribune (2/16, Richman) reports, "The Justice Department named an interim replacement today for U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, who'll spend his last day as Northern California's top federal prosecutor Friday." The Tribune continues, "Ryan was one seven U.S. Attorneys across the nation who recently resigned or were forced out by the Bush Administration. U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., spoke today on the Senate floor in favor of a bill protecting her chamber's constitutional power to confirm those appointed to these jobs. … The interim U.S. Attorney for this region -- including coastal counties and a few inland counties from Monterey Bay to the Oregon border -- will be Scott Schools, who has been general counsel to the Justice Department's Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys. That Washington, D.C.-based agency provides legal guidance in ethics and employee matters to federal prosecutors' offices from coast to coast." The Tribune adds, "From 2001 to 2005,

Schools was First Assistant U.S. Attorney in South Carolina, overseeing about 125 attorneys and support staff; before that, he'd served as interim U.S. Attorney there for nine months. He was a prosecutor in that office from 1989 to 1992 and from 1997 to 2001; between those periods, he was in private practice."

KPIX-TV, CBS 5, San Francisco (2/16) reports, "United States Attorney Kevin Ryan announced this afternoon that Friday will be his last day on the job, and the Justice Department simultaneously named a former South Carolina federal prosecutor as his interim replacement." KPIX-TV continues, Ryan had announced last month that he was stepping down after more than four years heading the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Northern District of California, which encompasses 14 coastal and Bay Area counties stretching from Big Sur to the Oregon border. … 'I am grateful to have had the opportunity to serve as the United States Attorney. I sincerely thank all of the staff at the office for their hard work to make our community a safer place to live. I also thank all of our partners in law enforcement who have put in countless hours in investigating and prosecuting crimes in Northern California,' Ryan said in a statement."

Lam Heading To Qualcomm. The AP (2/16, Hoffman) reports, "Qualcomm Inc. said Thursday that recently ousted U.S. Attorney Carol Lam will join its legal department as senior vice president and legal counsel, effective Feb. 26." The AP continues, "The San Diego-based wireless technology giant is currently embroiled in a global web of lawsuits with Nokia Corp. and other major equipment makers that claim Qualcomm levies unjust, inflated licensing fees to use its patented technologies in their products. … Regulators in Europe, South Korea and Japan are probing Qualcomm's business practices as the company trades lawsuits with rivals across the U.S. and Europe. … 'From our perspective, she's the ideal person,' said Louis Lupin, Qualcomm's general counsel. 'She's got experience managing large and very complex cases and a very large staff, and she'll be involved on a global basis.'"

Senate Democrats Said To Be Playing Politics With War On Terror. In Wall Street Journal's "Potomac Watch" column (2/16, 14), Kimberley Strassel criticizes Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Majority Leader Harry Reid for their focus on the Bush Justice Department's firing of seven US attorneys. Reid is "labeling the firings 'cronygate,' and accusing the administration of ousting capable U.S. attorneys in order to award political allies with plum posts. Ms. Feinstein went further, suggesting the administration's real goal was to circumvent the Senate confirmation process." The Senate is "lurching back to a pre-9/11 mentality, putting politics and turf ahead of key security issues. If Ms. Feinstein wins this battle, the appointment procedure reverts to the status quo ante. Under that old process, the attorney general can appoint an interim U.S. attorney for 120 days. But if the Senate doesn't get around to confirming a full-time replacement by then, the federal courts get to name a new interim." That "old system was primarily a constitutional oddity, but it also posed a threat to terror investigations."

More Commentary. In an op-ed for the San Diego Union-Tribune (2/16), former Congressman Lionel Van Deerlin writes, "Carol Lam gathers her belongings today, and departs the office of U.S. Attorney in California's Southern District. Because she faithfully honors a Justice Department tradition of silence, no one can be sure why she's leaving. She's not talking about it. … But what an exit line she gave us Tuesday with those eleventh-hour indictments. … Hours before returning to private life, our U.S. attorney took an action widening the net that snared San Diego's Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham. Her swan song racked up three more suspected miscreants. … And so, the question presses ever more urgently – why has the Bush administration sacked Carol Lam and six other trusted U.S. attorneys? No one, it seems, feels required to say. Only one of the seven, New Mexico's David Iglesia, demanded to be told why he was terminated, but got no explanation. … Custom holds that federal prosecutors serve 'at the pleasure of the president,' who is free to appoint or remove them without explanation. Yet the Justice Department has shown itself pretty touchy about these most recent switches. Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty seemed shaken before the Senate Judiciary Committee. New York's hard-charging Sen. Charles E. Schumer had wondered aloud if the hiring and firing of prosecutors reflected politics, rather than prudence. … 'When I hear you talk about the politicizing of the Department of Justice, it's like a knife in my heart,' McNulty stammered. Perhaps this sensitive fellow should seek a gentler assignment, sparing him the hostility he and others will face if we don't get a fuller explanation of what Justice is up to." Van Deerlin adds, "It might seem rash to accuse Bush administration masterminds of pulling political strings, but nothing surfacing thus far discourages skepticism. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' child-like mantra, 'at the pleasure of the president,' rings hollow. Let's nail this idea that the president – any president – handpicks the dozens of lawyers in line for prosecutorial slots across the land. He's not likely to know even the names of most. Recommendation for appointments is usually left to senators of the president's party. Inasmuch as both California senators are presently Democrats, Bush has relied on a selection system said to be headed by the veteran Rancho Santa Fe Republican politico and presidential insider Gerald Parsky. .. Parsky is astute enough to know that the way this switch has been managed so far adds up to abysmally bad politics. It suggests that public corruption, which figured so prominently in last year's election outcome, might no longer concern us. Are we to suppose that Congressman Cunningham was a lone stroller on his path to perdition? … We may soon know better – and only, perhaps, because Carol Lam refused to fold her tent as many expected her to do."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former GC For Monster Pleads Guilty In Options Backdating Probe. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Davies) reports, "The former general counsel of Monster Worldwide Inc. pleaded guilty to two criminal charges related to backdating stock options, ensnared in large part because of a series of damaging emails that helped prosecutors build the case against him." The Journal continues, "Myron Olesnyckyj, 45 years old, entered his guilty plea Thursday in Manhattan federal court to conspiracy and securities fraud. He admitted in court that he systematically backdated stock option grant dates, concealed the expense in company financial disclosures, and provided misleading information to auditors." The Journal adds, "In one email filed in court by prosecutors yesterday, Mr. Olesnyckyj instructed a human resources executive not to discuss a company practice of giving new hires options at the lowest stock price in the month after they joined the company, a form of backdating. He wrote: 'no written document should ever state lowest price over next 30 days! The auditorw [sic] will view that as backdating options and we'll have a charge to earning in the amount of the difference between price on day 30 and any lower price which is used.' … Mr. Olesnyckyj, who joined Monster in 1994 and was fired last year, is expected to cooperate with federal prosecutors against Monster founder Andrew McKelvey. Mr. McKelvey, who hasn't been charged, quit rather than be interviewed by company lawyers examining Monster's options problems."

The Washington Post/AP (2/16, D2, Neumeister) reports that Olesnyckyj "faces up to 25 years in prison and fines of more than $5.2 million after pleading guilty to securities fraud and conspiracy to commit securities fraud. His guilty plea was part of an agreement in which he promised to cooperate fully in return for leniency. … Olesnyckyj said his crimes occurred between 1996 and 2006, when he agreed with others at the company to backdate options and hide the action from federal regulatory agencies and investors. He agreed to forfeit $381,000, which he said was the amount he gained from the scheme." The AP adds, 'The Securities and Exchange Commission on Thursday filed a civil complaint against Olesnyckyj for securities fraud in connection to backdating. … The charges were the first for a Monster executive related to the backdating scandal at the company, which overstated the value of its earnings by more than $250 million between 1997 and 2005. Backdating involves issuing stock options retroactively to coincide with low points in the share price, thus boosting payouts. It can be illegal if it is not properly accounted for and disclosed to investors."

USA Today (2/16, 3B, Iwata) reports, "Mark Schonfeld, head of the SEC office in New York, said: 'Olesnyckyj knew that backdating was wrong, but nonetheless went along with the scheme. Any lawyer who works at a public company should do everything possible to thwart fraud — not participate in it.' … The backdating scheme and improper accounting of stock options led Monster to falsely inflate its net income from 1997 to 2005 by $340 million, the charges said. Monster, the parent of the online job service Monster.com, said it was profitable in 1999 and 2000, when it actually lost $40 million, the government charged." USA notes, "The backdating scandal at Monster arose last year when the company announced an internal investigation. The company's investigation led to the ouster of Olesnyckyj and the resignation of former CEO Andrew McKelvey."

Options Backdating Probes Accelerate. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, A1, Bandler, Forelle) reports, "On Jan. 4, 2002, the chief financial officer of Broadcom Corp. tapped out an email about stock options to his chief executive and others. … 'I VERY strongly recommend that these options be priced as of December 24,' he wrote. … They were, and that was fortunate for recipients. Broadcom's share price rose 23% between the two dates. The pretense that the options had been granted on the earlier date made them extra valuable." … It also violated the rationale of stock options. They give recipients a right to buy stock in the future at the price when the options are granted, so that recipients can profit only if the price of their company's stock goes up. Setting a lower 'exercise price' for the options gives recipients a head start on profiting." The Journal adds, "The Broadcom correspondence, found in an internal investigation at the maker of communication chips, is just one of a number of internal documents that have drawn the attention of federal prosecutors and Federal Bureau of Investigation agents in Orange County, Calif. Prosecutors are strongly considering filing criminal charges against the former Broadcom chief financial officer who wrote the email, William J. Ruehle, and at least one other former executive, according to people familiar with the situation. … Mr. Ruehle's lawyer said his client didn't break the law." The Journal notes, "The Broadcom probe is a sign of how long-running investigations of stock-options backdating are heating up. Yesterday, a former general counsel of Monster Worldwide Inc. pleaded guilty to securities fraud in federal court in Manhattan. The day before, the founder of Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. pleaded guilty to a New York State charge in a backdating scheme. … Prosecutors in a half-dozen jurisdictions are zeroing in on other cases. The filing of criminal charges in some of these in coming months would mark a watershed in the scandal, as prosecutors and regulators winnow the roster of some 140 companies with options problems to a tighter list of promising cases. … The government is nearing charges against a former official of computer-security company McAfee Inc., say people familiar with the situation, and is strongly considering bringing cases against ex-executives of Apple Inc. and semiconductor-equipment maker KLA-Tencor Corp. In St. Louis, at least one former executive of Engineered Support Systems Inc., a defense contractor now owned by DRS Technologies Inc. of Parsippany, N.J., has been told of a likely charge, says a person close to the matter."

New Executive Pay Tables Don't Include All Options Data. The Washington Post (2/16, D1, Cho, Johnson) reports, "The first overhaul in 15 years of executive-pay disclosures has been billed as the most transparent window ever into the clubby world of corporate compensation. … But as these filings have begun to roll out publicly, analysts are finding there's a catch." The Post continues, "Due to an accounting loophole for stock options and an eleventh-hour rule change made by securities regulators just before Christmas, some of the biggest names in technology, health care and financial services will be able to cloud what their top executives make. … The anomaly is being discovered by compensation consultants who have been hired by firms to draft these filings. In some cases, it is lowering the compensation figures reported by firms, they said. In others, executives who should be named in the filings as the five highest-paid officers in their companies are being replaced with employees making less." The Post adds, "The Securities and Exchange Commission's first changes to pay disclosures since 1992 were meant to be user-friendly. Shareholders could look at a summary table and easily see what the top executives of a company were taking home in salary, perks, retirement bonuses and stock options. … SEC officials said they had no control over which companies used the stock options loophole. But they said the agency's late December rule change will provide more accurate figures in the long run and will better reflect what an executive is making in a given year. Although the summary table may not provide full information on options, that data will be included elsewhere in the filing, they said."

DOJ Will Not Challenge 5th Circuit Dismissal Of Enron-Related Convictions. The Houston Chronicle (2/16, Hays) reports, "The Justice Department has decided not to challenge an appeals court's decision last year to throw out most of the 2004 convictions against several former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives in an Enron-related case. … But three of those former executives — who each served nearly a year in prison before being released pending the result of their appeals — could still be retried on charges of participating in a sham deal to help Enron book bogus profits." The Chronicle continues, "Justice Department spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch said Thursday that federal prosecutors had decided not to appeal the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals' ruling to the U.S. Supreme Court. The Justice Department had until Friday to make that call. … 'While we review the matter before the district court, we remain committed to holding accountable those responsible for the massive frauds that accompanied the collapse of Enron,' Lesch said." The Chronicle adds, "She declined to say whether prosecutors will retry Daniel Bayly, Merrill's former head of investment banking; James A. Brown, former head of the firm's asset lease group; and Robert Furst, the brokerage's former liaison with Enron. .. .A status hearing in the case is slated for this afternoon. … Last August, the appellate court threw out fraud and conspiracy convictions of Bayly, Brown, Furst and a fourth former Merrill executive, William Fuhs. A jury in 2004 convicted all four of fraud and conspiracy for helping push through a deal in which the brokerage pretended to buy three power barges from Enron so the energy company could appear to have made earnings targets in late 1999."

Two Former Enron Traders Sentenced To Probation For Energy Price Manipulation. The AP (2/16, Kravets) reports, "Two of three former Enron Corp. traders accused of driving up energy prices during California's power crisis were each sentenced in federal court to two years of court-supervised release." The AP continues, "Timothy Belden, the former head of trading in Enron's Portland, Oregon, office, was sentenced Wednesday after pleading guilty in October 2002 to one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud. Belden's plea was the first prosecution of anyone related to the West's energy crisis in 2000 and 2001. He had faced up to five years in prison and must forfeit $2.1 million." The AP adds, "The second defendant, Jeffrey Richter, was a lower-level trading manager in charge of the so-called 'short-term desk' who also pleaded guilty to two counts related to manipulating energy prices. He had faced up to five years and agreed to pay a $410,000 fine. … A third trader, the alleged mastermind behind the scheme, is expected to be sentenced next month for his role in the scam that fraudulently sent California energy prices soaring, causing energy shortages and rolling blackouts." The AP notes, "Internal company memos describe how Belden's trading unit took power out of California at a time of rolling blackouts and shortages and sold it out of state to elude price caps, according to documents obtained by investigators. … Enron bought California power at cheap, capped prices, routed it outside the state, then sold it back into California at vastly inflated prices, authorities said. The sham trades were designed to circumvent the California-only price caps on wholesale energy. … The crisis played a role in Pacific Gas & Electric Co.'s bankruptcy and will leave California consumers paying abnormally high electricity prices for years."

Investment Manager Jailed For Seven Years for Contempt In Fraud Case. The New York Times (2/16, Morgenson) reports, "On Jan. 14, 2000, Martin A. Armstrong, a globe-trotting investment manager, was told to produce $15 million in gold and antiquities, as well as documents, in response to a civil suit by the government accusing him of securities fraud involving hundreds of millions of dollars. … When he said that he did not have the items and could not produce them, a federal judge ordered him jailed for contempt of court." The Times continues, "Seven years later, Mr. Armstrong sits in the Metropolitan Correctional Center in Lower Manhattan. … Imprisoned two years before Enron and WorldCom brought corporate crime to center stage, Mr. Armstrong, 57, is the white-collar defendant whom time forgot. Over the years, the losses of his former clients have been repaid by a bank involved in his trades. … Still, he remains jailed on one of the longest-running charges of contempt. In many cases, a federal law limits to 18 months how long someone can be held under civil contempt while the court tries to coerce compliance with an order. Even in cases of criminal contempt, whose goal is punishment rather than coercion, an individual is entitled to the full protections of due process after six months. … 'A legal proceeding is supposed to be the quest for truth,' Mr. Armstrong said in a phone interview last week from the 12-story building, which is used mostly as a temporary holding site for prisoners. 'But this contempt was used to stop me from going to trial, and it's been nothing but bad faith from the government ever since.'" The Times notes, "How Mr. Armstrong has been held for so many years without a trial is a tangled and bizarre tale. Mr. Armstrong, his lawyers say, has been stuck in a surreal situation in which criminal prosecutors have never had to prove their 24-count indictment at trial while the civil case tied him up. Nevertheless, they have gotten their desired result — a lengthy prison term for Mr. Armstrong."

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Investigating Gibbons' Links With Defense Contractor. Reporting on a story broken yesterday by the Wall Street Journal, the AP (2/16, Riley) says this morning the FBI is investigating Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons' interactions with a defense contractor when Gibbons served in the US House of Representatives. "The newly elected Republican governor denied any wrongdoing and told The Associated Press that 'they can look as deeply as they need to and I encourage them to do so, but there would have been absolutely no influence.' A federal law enforcement official confirmed the FBI probe" and "said the inquiry is focusing on what role Gibbons played in awarding military contracts to eTreppid Technologies LLC in Reno and whether he received any gifts in exchange. Gibbons said he had not been contacted by the FBI regarding his contacts with Warren Trepp, a longtime friend and owner of eTreppid who contributed nearly $100,000 to Gibbons' campaign for governor through different companies he controls."

The Wall Street Journal (2/16, A7, 2.04M) also briefly reports on Gibbons' denial of any wrongdoing, and the Washington Post (2/16, Mosk, Eggen, 690K) notes, "Reporting yesterday on the investigation, the Wall Street Journal published a series of alleged e-mail exchanges about Gibbons's dealings with" Trepp. "Among the dozens of e-mails is one allegedly sent days before Trepp and his wife prepared to set sail on a Caribbean cruise with Gibbons and his wife. In it, Trepp's wife allegedly wrote to her husband: 'Please don't forget to bring the money you promised Jim and Dawn.' Trepp's reply, according to the Journal report, was: 'Don't you ever send this kind of message to me! Erase this message from your computer right now!'" However, Trepp lawyer Steven Peek "said yesterday that his client is unaware of any investigation and questions the authenticity of the e-mails cited in the Journal report."

Libby Defense Said To Have Offered No Evidence To Support Scapegoat Theory. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Schmitt, 850K) reports Lewis "Scooter" Libby's lawyer, Theodore Wells, "dropped a bombshell" in his opening argument. "In dramatic tones, Wells declared that Libby had been the victim of a White House conspiracy to make Libby the fall guy for the CIA leak scandal." However, jurors saw "virtually no evidence to back up the provocative claim. The difference between what Wells promised and delivered, and how it will play with the 12-member panel, is just one of the wild cards as the trial winds up." The Times notes that "the case is hardly a slam-dunk for the government. The defense punched some holes in the stories and memories of government witnesses, including journalists. The biggest worry for the prosecution may be whether the jury will think it fair to convict Libby, the only person charged in the three-year federal probe, when he was neither the first nor the only high-level government official to talk about CIA operative Valerie Plame."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/16, Apuzzo) reports Wells "told jurors…that Libby was the victim of a conspiracy to protect White House political adviser Karl Rove. But like the anticipated testimony from Libby and Vice President Dick Cheney, details of any save-Rove conspiracy were promised but never materialized. That leaves defense attorneys, who will spend the long weekend fine-tuning their closing arguments, to decide how to describe Rove for jurors when summing up their case on Tuesday." The AP adds, "While cross-examining government witnesses," Libby's lawyers "took every opportunity to mention Rove but never elicited details about how the president's top political operative was being protected or why."

Foggo, Wilkes Indictments Suggest Other Lawmakers Could Face Charges. The Hill (2/16, Crabtree) reports that the indictments of Kyle Foggo and Brent Wilkes "provide clues about other evidence and material federal prosecutors are seeking from Congress and which members could face more legal trouble in the wide-ranging bribery investigation. In between the more lurid details about prostitutes, hundreds of thousands in cash payments and luxurious trips to Hawaii and Coeur d'Alene, Idaho included in the indictments…are eight references to letters" former Rep Randy Cunningham "sent members of the Appropriations, Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence and Armed Services committees requesting tens of millions of dollars in contracts for Wilkes' companies. … The indictments do not include the panels' responses to these requests; and that is, in all likelihood, because prosecutors were having a difficult time convincing Congress to hand over the relevant records," but "a Democratic aide said discussions are "still ongoing" and the two sides hope to resolve the matter as soon as possible." The Hill notes Reps. Bill Young, Floyd Spence and Duncan Hunter and then-Rep. Porter Goss were chairmen of committees that received letters from Cunningham.

Small NJ Town Abuzz About FBI Raid On Mayor's Home, Office. Under the headline "F.B.I. Raids On The Mayor Make Him Topic A In A Small Town," the New York Times (2/16, Miller, 1.16M) reports from Guttenberg, N.J., "The whispers were everywhere in this sliver of a town on the Hudson: Federal investigators were here looking for something. Then on Jan. 26, the F.B.I. agents seized several computers, rifles and files from the home of Mayor David Delle Donna, as well as records from Town Hall. Mr. Delle Donna has not been charged with a crime and insists that he has done nothing wrong, though a person close to the investigation said the January raids were connected to a former bar owner and eight others charged in 2005 with running a human trafficking ring." The Times adds that the "raids have left many in this town of 10,800 scratching their heads. … And although no one is suggesting any connection to the trafficking, chatter in this town that measures all of 4 blocks wide and 11 blocks long reached new heights in recent weeks after two fires broke out at the only high-rise apartment building in town, killing one person, and another fire erupted at an abandoned building."

FBI, IRS Search Home, Office Of Former Boy Band Promoter. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/16, Reed) reports, "Federal agents executed search warrants on Thursday at New York native Lou Pearlman's Florida office and home, the latest in a string of legal problems facing the man who built the Backstreet Boys and 'NSYNC. The search came less than two weeks after a state court-appointed receiver took control of three Pearlman companies. A judge issued that order after Florida's Office of Financial Regulation alleged that for 15 years Pearlman has sold unregistered securities through a bogus savings program." The AP notes, "FBI agents and other law enforcement investigators spent hours on Thursday carrying boxes away from Pearlman's offices."

Federal Agents Search Ranbaxy's New Jersey Offices In FDA Probe. Bloomberg (2/16, Larkin) reports, "Ranbaxy Laboratories Ltd., India's biggest drugmaker, said U.S. officials conducted a surprise search of two of its New Jersey offices yesterday, seeking documents on a variety of topics." Bloomberg continues, "Federal agents spent all day at Ranbaxy's administrative office in Princeton and manufacturing facility in New Brunswick, said Chuck Caprariello, a spokesman for the company. He declined to specify which documents were taken and said business operations have continued as usual. … 'The only thing we know right now is that it was an information request and they needed information on a variety of topics,' Caprariello said today in a telephone interview. 'We're trying to open up dialogue now as to why, and what information they wanted.'" Bloomberg adds, "The Trentonian, a New Jersey newspaper, reported today that criminal investigators from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration searched the Princeton facility, saying they were serving a warrant. … The U.S. Attorney's Office in Maryland, part of the Justice Department, is working on the Ranbaxy case and won't comment because there is a pending investigation, spokeswoman Vickie LeDuc said today in a telephone interview from her Baltimore office. Doug Arbesfeld, a spokesman for the FDA, said the Justice Department was handling all media inquiries."

Former Nevada County Official Sentenced To Six Years For Strip Club Bribes. The AP (2/16, Ritter) reports, "A former Clark County commissioner was sentenced to six years in prison Wednesday for delivering bribes to politicians on behalf of a strip club owner." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Larry Hicks branded Lance Malone the 'organizer, manager and leader' of 'probably as gross a case of political corruption in the state of Nevada, certainly, that has ever occurred and been successfully prosecuted.' … Hicks blamed Malone for distributing up to $550,000 in bribes to three former commission colleagues from 2000 to 2003, and said he was imposing three years more than Malone received in a related case in San Diego. Malone will serve the sentences at the same time; he also was fined $100,000." The AP adds, "Malone pleaded guilty in September to one count of conspiracy under the federal Racketeer Influenced Corrupt Organizations, or RICO Act, for the Nevada case. … In the San Diego case, Malone was convicted on similar charges that he delivered bribes to politicians there on behalf of strip club owner Michael Galardi. … On Wednesday, Malone, 45, told the judge that he had been greedy, and he pleaded for leniency. … Malone becomes the third person sentenced in a case that grew from years of FBI wiretaps and led to indictments against Galardi, Malone, and former Clark County commissioners Dario Herrera, Erin Kenny and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey. The commission wields control over a wide area of southern Nevada, including the Las Vegas Strip."

Pennsylvania Police Officer To Stand Trial On Corruption Charges. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (2/16, Zapf) reports, "In a hearing that lasted almost four hours, seven witnesses testified Thursday about alleged wrongdoing by suspended West Mifflin police Officer Noel Missig. Brookline District Judge Charles McLaughlin held Missig…for trial on charges of perjury, simple assault, obstructing the administration of law or government function, tampering with public records or information, two counts of unsworn falsification to authorities and official oppression. The charges stem from a joint FBI and state police investigation that spanned four years and led to accusations that Missig planted cocaine in a suspect's clothing, assaulted a handcuffed boy and lied about the seizure of video poker machines from a borough business."

ADL Honors FBI Agents, Prosecutors For California Gang Convictions. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, 850K) reports, "The Anti-Defamation League on Thursday honored the federal agents and prosecutors involved in convicting four members of a Latino street gang in Highland Park last year for violating the civil rights of African Americans with a campaign of threats and violence, including murder. The group noted that the case against the Avenues gang 'broke new ground as the first time a street gang was convicted of violating federal hate crime laws.' Honored at a luncheon…were federal prosecutors Bobby Bernstein, Alexander Bustamante and Thomas O'Brien; FBI agents Jerry Fradella and Christian M. Haugen; and federal paralegal Martha Lovejoy," as well as local law enforcement officers.

Chicago Protection Racket Collector Sentenced To Seven Years. The Chicago Tribune (2/16, O'Connor, 617K) reports, "A Russian native, who prosecutors say preyed on Russian businesses in Chicago for 'protection' money, was sentenced Thursday to more than 7 years in prison for extortion." A lawyer for 69-year-old Israil Vengerin, "sought leniency, saying his client is dying in prison from heart problems while he awaits a transplant." However, "U.S. District Judge John Darrah imposed an 87-month prison term, saying Vengerin 'terrorized' some in the Russian community. … If Vengerin's condition becomes terminal, the judge said he would consider reducing his sentence." The Tribune notes that at Vengerin's trial, "Much of the testimony came from secretly recorded tapes of Vengerin made by an associate who helped collect the protection money while working undercover for the FBI. At least two victims also recorded Vengerin with the FBI's cooperation."

Klebnikov Murder Defendants Fail To Appear, Delaying Jury Selection. The AP (2/16, Isachenkov) reports that a Russian "court postponed jury selection Thursday in the retrial of three men linked to the 2004 murder of the American-born editor of Forbes magazine's Russian edition after two of the defendants failed to show up, a court spokeswoman said. Prosecutors had accused two Chechen men of killing Paul Klebnikov, but a jury trial acquitted them last year. The Supreme Court later overturned the acquittal and ordered a new trial. Moscow City Court spokeswoman Anna Usacheva said Thursday's session to choose jurors for the retrial was postponed until March 14 because defendants Kazbek Dukuzov and Musa Vakhayev failed to show up." The New York Times (2/16, Lewis, 1.16M) notes that "the judge postponed the beginning of jury selection for a month. … The prosecutor general's office declined to discuss today's events, which like the previous trial occurred behind closed doors."

The Moscow Times (2/16, Schreck) reports, "Vakhayev's lawyer, Vladimir Gorulkov, said in court that his client had 'valid reasons' for his absence," court spokeswoman Tatyana Zubaryova said. "No one showed up to represent Dukuzov, Zubaryova said. Ruslan Koblev, the lawyer for Moscow notary Fail Sadretdinov, said Dukuzov had received his court summons but was in Chechnya; he said he did not know whether Dukuzov would return to Moscow for the trial. Koblev said Vakhayev was in Moscow but stayed home Thursday because he was ill."

California Police Department Under Misconduct Probe. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Blankstein) reports, "Inglewood interim Police Chief J.I. Davis today confirmed that some members of his department were being investigated for misconduct, but he refused to give specifics." The Times continues, "At an afternoon news conference at Inglewood police headquarters, Davis insisted that his department began its probe after developing its own information of possible police corruption. … 'The investigation was initiated in January 2006, after hearing rumors and developing information about possible misconduct,' he told reporters." The Times adds, "Davis refused to give specifics, but The Times has reported that at least six current or former Inglewood police officers are under investigation for allegedly having sex with female employees of massage parlors and other adult businesses that had been the target of a high-profile law enforcement crackdown. … Davis denied reports that the department's investigation was a result of information gathered by federal officials. .. .'That the information was the result of a federal investigation' is incorrect, he said. 'The department did not receive information from any federal agency.' … But sources familiar with the misconduct allegations said that federal authorities, including the U.S. attorney's office and the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, began hearing about the alleged involvement of police officers last year."

Probe Of Pizza Man's Death By Bomb Collar Nears End. USA Today (2/16, 3A, Johnson) reports, "More than three years after a bank robbery suspect in Erie, Pa., was killed when a bomb locked around his neck exploded, a federal prosecutor has summoned investigators to meet today in Pittsburgh to help her determine whether to file charges in the case." USA continues, "U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan says her meeting with investigators from the FBI, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and the Pennsylvania State Police indicates that the probe into the bizarre death of Brian Wells, 46, is nearly complete. 'The investigation is in its final stages,' she says." USA adds, "A federal grand jury in Erie has heard testimony from "numerous" witnesses, Buchanan says, adding that the probe has been complicated by the deaths of at least two potential witnesses. … The death of Wells, a pizza deliveryman, received national attention because it occurred on live television and because of the many questions it left. No one has been arrested in the case, and it remains unclear whether Wells was a willing participant in a bank robbery plot that went awry or was the unwitting victim of a such a plot. .. .Investigators also have examined other possibilities. Among them: that the intent all along was not to rob the bank, but to send Wells to a torturous death. Or, that Wells was part of a robbery plot but thought the bomb was fake."

Nine Former California School Athletes Arrested For Gang-Style Crimes. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Lin, Abrams) reports, "Nine former football players from Murrieta Valley High School, members of a self-described 'Fight Club,' today were arrested by Murrieta police for an alleged gang-style rash of robberies, burglaries and assaults over two years -- including beating up high school students who 'disrespected' their members, authorities said." The Times continues, "The club was founded in 2004 by a group of football players who allegedly injected anabolic steroids to enhance their performance on the field, police said. … The ex-athletes, only one of whom still attends the high school in the southwest Riverside County suburb, started calling themselves 'Fight Club' and would challenge one another in fighting matches outside of school -- attracting large crowds of juvenile spectators, often at local parks, police said. … 'They essentially started out as bullies in the school and graduated to crimes of violence,' said Lt. Dennis Vrooman of the Murrieta Police Department. … 'Investigators allege that members of the gang would 'case' homes in Murrieta and neighboring Temecula while attending parties, and come back days later to burglarize the residences. Police said members of the gang also allegedly attempted to commit a home-invasion robbery, two car thefts, two cases of arson, multiple armed robberies, false imprisonment and several assaults. … Four of the former football players were arrested on suspicion of participating in a criminal street gang which, when considered with the other allegations, could lead to life sentences if convicted, Vrooman said."

CIVIL LAW:

OCS Accused Of Intimidation In Whistleblower Probe. The Washington Post (2/16, A21, Williamson) reports, "A trouble-plagued whistle-blower investigation at the Office of Special Counsel -- whose duties include shielding federal whistle-blowers -- hit another snag this week when employees accused the special counsel of intimidation in the probe." The Post continues, "The Office of Personnel Management's inspector general has been investigating allegations by current and former OSC employees that Special Counsel Scott J. Bloch retaliated against underlings who disagreed with his policies -- by, among other means, transferring them out of state -- and tossed out legitimate whistle-blower cases to reduce the office backlog. Bloch denies the accusations, saying that under his leadership the agency has grown more efficient and receptive to whistle-blowers." The Post adds, "The probe is the most serious of many problems at the agency since Bloch, a Kansas lawyer who served at the Justice Department's Task Force for Faith-based and Community Initiatives, was appointed by President Bush three years ago. Since he took the helm in 2004, staffers at the OSC, a small agency of about 100 lawyers and investigators, have accused him of a range of offenses, from having an anti-gay bias to criticizing employees for wearing short skirts and tight pants to work. … The 16-month investigation has been beset by delays, accusations and counter-accusations. The latest problem began two weeks ago, when Bloch's deputy sent staffers a memo asking them to inform OSC higher-ups when investigators contact them. Further, the memo read, employees should meet with investigators in the office, in a special conference room. Some employees cried foul, saying the recommendations made them afraid to be interviewed in the probe. … This week, Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility, the Project on Government Oversight, the Government Accountability Project and Human Rights Campaign and a lawyer for the OSC employees protested in a letter to legislators and to Clay Johnson III, the Office of Management and Budget deputy who ordered the OSC probe."

NYT Praises Bill To Expand Whistleblower Protections. The New York Times (2/16, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "The plight of federal workers who raise alarms about waste and fraud in government has become a scandal unto itself." In "a vote this week of bipartisan unanimity, the House government reform committee offered whistle-blowers fresh hope with a much needed measure to protect them against official retaliation." The bill, "sponsored by Henry Waxman, Democrat of California, and Tom Davis, Republican of Virginia, would guarantee a worker the right to a court review of a complaint if it lingers beyond six months without action."

FOIA Reform Legislation Expected Soon. The AP (2/16, Kellman) reports, "Congressional Democrats are looking at ways to strengthen open government laws and force the Bush administration to release more documents under the Freedom of Information Act." The AP continues, "Rep. Lacy Clay, D-Mo., said legislation he is considering would be broader than an open government bill last year that sought to reduce the number of disputed FOIA requests and improve reporting requirements to Congress. The legislation never reached a vote in the House or Senate. … Clay said the old bill will be the starting point for a new one that will take direct aim at the administration's practice of using the threat of terrorism to withhold 'nonsensitive information.' … 'I am deeply concerned that this administration appears to be shielding information that ought to be accessible to the public,' said Clay, chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee's subcommittee on information policy." The AP adds, "The American Civil Liberties Union urged the subcommittee on Wednesday to scrap what it said was the White House's 'policy of nondisclosure' outlined in a 2001 memo by then-Attorney General John Ashcroft. … Ashcroft advised against releasing information when there was uncertainty about whether FOIA exemptions applied, such as for national security and law enforcement material. His memo reversed a Clinton administration policy that urged agencies to resolve FOIA requests by erring on the side of releasing, not withholding, government information. … 'To this administration, secrecy is the default response,' ACLU Executive Director Anthony D. Romero said in written testimony prepared for Clay's subcommittee."

Government Executive (2/16, Pulliam) reports, "The bill's introduction likely will coincide with Sunshine Week March 11-16, an initiative led by the American Society of Newspaper Editors to educate the public about the importance of open government. National Freedom of Information Day also happens that week, on March 16." GE adds, "Clay said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, will be heavily involved in crafting the measure. A bill that was approved at the subcommittee level in September 2006 (H.R. 867) will be used as a starting point. … In a statement, Waxman said he looks forward to working with Clay on legislation to strengthen the FOIA, and is pleased, as the law was the focus of the subcommittee's first hearing in the new Congress."

Bankruptcy Judge OKs $145 Million In Delphi Fees. The AP (2/16, Tong) reports, "A federal bankruptcy judge on Thursday approved $145 million in fees to lawyers and financial advisers for the first year of the restructuring of auto parts supplier Delphi." The AP continues, "Troy, Mich.-based Delphi Corp., a former subsidiary of General Motors Corp. until 1999, has incurred nearly $135 million in professional fees and $10 million in expenses for the period from its voluntary bankruptcy protection filing on Oct. 8, 2005, through the end of September 2006. … U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Robert Drain of the Southern District of New York approved the payment applications filed by about 30 law firms, bankers and others." The AP adds, "As part of its bankruptcy case, Delphi has cut labor costs by offering voluntary buyout and early retirement deals to tens of thousands of union workers represented by the United Auto Workers and the International Union of Electronic Workers-Communications Workers of America, the company's biggest and second-biggest unions. … Delphi has made reducing labor and retirement benefit costs one of the highest priorities in its reorganization. … Among Delphi's advisers, the biggest bill comes from the law firm Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom, which recorded fees and expenses of $32.79 million for the year." The AP notes, "Delphi expects to emerge from bankruptcy protection in the first half of this year. It is now negotiating with its unions over collective bargaining agreements and General Motors over legacy retirement costs. Those agreements are needed if Delphi wants to move forward on a proposed plan that has private equity investors making a cash infusion as the company exits bankruptcy."

Bankruptcy Judge Orders Bear Stearns To Pay $125 Million For Lax Oversight Of Hedge Fund. Bloomberg (2/16, Bilodeau, Weidlich) reports, "Bear Stearns must pay at least $125.1 million to a failed hedge fund after a court concluded the securities firm ignored signs that investors were being defrauded and took money to cover its own potential losses." Bloomberg continues, "U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Burton Lifland in New York yesterday ordered that Bear Stearns must return the money to Manhattan Investment Fund, which collapsed in 2000 after regulators accused the manager of sending fake account statements for more than three years." Bloomberg adds, "Bear Stearns, alerted to the fraud as early as 1998, waited a year before scrutinizing the hedge fund's books and learning its true financial condition, Lifland wrote. … The delay allowed Manhattan Investment to continue cheating investors, who lost almost $400 million, according to regulators. The ruling against Bear Stearns, of New York, may spur investment banks to monitor hedge funds, their most lucrative trading clients, more closely. Bear Stearns is one of the biggest brokers to hedge funds."

Bipartisan Legislation Seeks FDA Regulation Of Tobacco. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports, "House and Senate lawmakers of both parties introduced sweeping legislation Thursday to make tobacco subject to the kind of federal safety regulation that now applies to medicines and food, and said prospects for action are the most favorable in years. … Although the White House has not supported similar legislation in the past, it's not clear what position President Bush will take this time. Administration officials took a neutral stance Thursday." Three presidential candidates "signed on to the legislation: Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), and Barack Obama (D-Ill.). Its principal sponsors in the Senate are Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), and John Cornyn (R-Texas)."

The AP (2/16, Bridges) also reports the story, noting a spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said the bill "had the support of the caucus. A spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said she personally supported it." White House spokesman Tony Fratto "declined to comment. The Department of Health and Human Services is reviewing the legislation, spokeswoman Christina Pearson said."

California High Court Approves Tobacco Litigation. The Los Angeles Times (2/15, Dolan) reports, "The California Supreme Court made it possible Thursday for people who become ill from smoking to once again win large judgments from tobacco companies, unanimously rejecting a four-year-old federal court decision that had virtually halted all smoker lawsuits in the state. … 'It reopens tobacco litigation in California,' said Northeastern University Law Professor Richard A. Daynard, who heads a group that promotes lawsuits against the industry. 'The light just went from red to green.'" The Times continues, "Since California began allowing individual lawsuits over smoking damage in 1998, plaintiffs in California had won some of the biggest tobacco awards in the country, including a $28 billion jury verdict in Los Angeles. The awards came to a halt when the federal appeals court in 2002 set a strict deadline, saying smokers should have filed suit years earlier, when it became widely known that smoking was a health hazard and addictive." The Times adds, "Taking advantage of the federal ruling, the tobacco industry had exercised its right to move cases into federal court, which hears disputes between litigants in different states. Lawyers said every single case was dismissed. … In a decision written by Justice Carlos R. Moreno, the California Supreme Court said that although judges and juries can presume that plaintiffs should have known of the dangers and filed their lawsuits earlier, smokers can rebut that presumption by presenting evidence that tobacco companies misrepresented the risks. … 'Although knowledge of smoking addiction has been widespread . . . ,' Moreno wrote, 'tobacco companies' misrepresentation of the danger and addictiveness of smoking were also widespread.'"

LAPD May Be Allowed To Pursue Alternative Racial Profiling Monitoring Methods. Los Angeles Times (2/16, McGreevy) reports, "Faced with a $25-million price tag to replace aging devices that log the ethnicity of every motorist stopped, the Los Angeles Police Department may be allowed to pursue alternative methods for making sure its officers are not engaging in racial profiling, a federal monitor said Thursday." The Times continues, "In his quarterly report on the department's compliance with a federal consent decree mandating LAPD reforms, Independent Monitor Michael Cherkasky said the agency might be able to meet the requirement for checking on racial profiling by methods other than the one currently used to collect data. … 'It is the monitor's belief that the dollars that would need to be spent in continuing the current method of collection and aggregation can, in fact, be better spent on enhancing the city's ability to detect, investigate and prevent biased policing,' Cherkasky wrote." The Times adds, "That opens the door for the city to propose alternatives such as installing video cameras in all patrol cars, though any change would require final approval from Cherkasky, the Justice Department and a federal judge. … Also, it might cost up to $25 million to put video cameras in all patrol cars. … Still, Police Commission President John Mack welcomed the possibility that the city could find a less costly and more effective way to check for profiling."

Federal Judge Sets Limits On NYPD Videotaping. The New York Times (2/16, Dwyer) reports,

"In a rebuke of a surveillance practice greatly expanded by the New York Police Department after the Sept. 11 attacks, a federal judge ruled yesterday that the police must stop the routine videotaping of people at public gatherings unless there is an indication that unlawful activity may occur." The Times continues, "Four years ago, at the request of the city, the same judge, Charles S. Haight Jr., gave the police greater authority to investigate political, social and religious groups. … In yesterday's ruling, Judge Haight, of United States District Court in Manhattan, found that by videotaping people who were exercising their right to free speech and breaking no laws, the Police Department had ignored the milder limits he had imposed on it in 2003." The Times adds, "Citing two events in 2005 — a march in Harlem and a demonstration by homeless people in front of the home of Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg — the judge said the city had offered scant justification for videotaping the people involved. … 'There was no reason to suspect or anticipate that unlawful or terrorist activity might occur,' he wrote, 'or that pertinent information about or evidence of such activity might be obtained by filming the earnest faces of those concerned citizens and the signs by which they hoped to convey their message to a public official.' … While he called the police conduct 'egregious,' Judge Haight also offered an unusual judicial mea culpa, taking responsibility for his own words in a 2003 order that he conceded had not been 'a model of clarity.'"

AirTran Seeks Merger Talks With Midwest. The Milwaukee Business Journal (2/16) reports, "AirTran Holdings Inc. reported Feb. 15 the federal waiting period for its proposed $345 million buyout of Midwest Air Group Inc. has expired." The Journal continues, "AirTran chairman and CEO Joe Leonard called the Justice Department's determination not to challenge the proposed merger a 'milestone' and said he hoped the agency's decision will prompt Midwest management to sit down with AirTran for formal negotiations. … 'As we have frequently said, the combination of AirTran and Midwest is pro-competitive and the merger of our two airlines will create a stronger, more diversified airline, better able to withstand competition from other airlines, offer greater job security to employees and provide more service to the cities currently served by both airlines,' Leonard said in a statement." The Journal adds, "AirTran is trying to buy Oak Creek-based Midwest Air Group Inc. to create a low-fare carrier with revenue of about $3 billion in 2007. However, Midwest on Jan. 25 rejected the unsolicited offer calling it 'opportunistic' and saying it 'undervalues' the company. … Leonard said Thursday he hoped that with the expiration of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act that Midwest will 'consider the benefits to their stakeholders and sit down with us to negotiate a definitive agreement.'"

Judge May Further Delay Caremark-CVS Deal. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (2/16, Feldstein) reports, "A hearing today is expected to determine whether the bid by CVS Corp. to buy Caremark Rx will be further delayed because of alleged misconduct by Caremark executives and board members." The Post-Dispatch continues, "The lawsuit challenging the CVS-Caremark deal was brought by Express Scripts Inc. of Maryland Heights, which also wants to buy Caremark. It alleges that Caremark's executives and directors failed to negotiate in the best interest of its shareholders." The Post-Dispatch adds, "Delaware Chancery Court Chancellor William B. Chandler III already has delayed the Caremark shareholders' vote at least until March 9. He acted after a large group of shareholders said it needed more time to evaluate the CVS offer. … CVS, the nation's No. 2 retail drug chain, in November announced its plan to combine with Caremark, based in Nashville, Tenn. Its bid was a $21 billion, all-stock offer that it said would create a new dynamic in the pharmaceutical industry. Caremark shareholders had been scheduled to vote on the deal Tuesday." The Post-Dispatch notes, "Express Scripts is the nation's No. 3 pharmacy-benefits manager. In December, it countered CVS's bid for Caremark with a cash-and-stock offer valued at $26 billion and a vision of a larger, stronger pharmacy-benefits management company. … Express Scripts later sued Caremark, that company's board and CVS, saying the Caremark—CVS deal should be quashed because of 'extensive fiduciary misconduct.' Chandler isn't expected to rule today."

Bill Would Repeal Antitrust Exemption For Insurance Industry. McClatchy Newspapers (2/16, Recio) reports, "Lawmakers moved to rein in the insurance industry Thursday by introducing legislation in the House of Representatives and Senate to repeal the industry's federal antitrust exemption." McClatchy continues, "Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, R-Miss., a fierce critic of the insurance industry's response to Hurricane Katrina, joined Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and ranking member Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., on the Senate floor to introduce the bill. In the House, Rep. Gene Taylor, D-Miss., Rep. Pete DeFazio, D-Ore., Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-La., Rep. Walter Jones, R-N.C., and others announced the introduction of identical legislation. … 'Federal oversight would provide confidence that the industry is not engaging in the most egregious forms of anti-competitive conduct - price-fixing, agreements not to pay and market allocations,' Leahy said. 'Insurers may object to being subject to the same antitrust laws as everyone else, but if they are operating in an honest and appropriate way, they should have nothing to fear.'" McClatchy adds, "Lott, who lost his home in the hurricane and who's part of a lawsuit that's being settled with State Farm & Casualty Co., said, 'After Hurricane Katrina we learned a lot of lessons.' He said he found out 'to my absolute horror that the insurance industry is not covered by the antitrust laws.' … 'This is wrong,' Lott concluded, 'and the Senate, in a bipartisan way, should, and I believe will, correct it.'" McClatchy notes, "The bill has some heavy hitters behind it, notably Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., who said in a statement, 'If insurers around the country are operating in an honest and appropriate way, they should not object to being answerable under the same federal antitrust laws as virtually all other businesses.'"

WSJournal Warns Democrats Could Over Regulate Telecom Sector. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "If you're wondering where the new Democratic majority in Congress is inclined to steer telecom policy, look no further than Mr. Dorgan's comment" at an Federal Communications Commission, where he "pays lip service to free markets while ultimately favoring more regulation for its own sake. But more regulation is the last thing today's telecom industry needs, at least if empirical evidence is any indication. As FCC Chairman Kevin Martin reported at a Senate hearing earlier this month, the industry is now taking risks in a way it hasn't since the tech bubble burst six years ago." Much of this "growth has been fueled by increased broadband deployment, which makes high-speed Internet services possible." The "one sure way to stop these trends is by bogging down industry players with regulations or price controls that raise the risk that these mammoth investments will never pay off. Yet that seems to be the goal of Senator Dorgan and other Democrats such as Representative Ed Markey, another 'Net neutrality' cheerleader, who is planning his own hearings. Consumers will end up paying for such policies in fewer choices and higher prices."

Lawmakers Ask Gonzales For Answers About Wooldridge Actions. The AP (2/16, Heilprin) reports, "The House Judiciary Committee on Thursday asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to explain how the Justice Department's former top environmental prosecutor could sign consent decrees with the third-largest U.S. oil company after buying a $980,000 vacation home with its top lobbyist." The AP continues, "An Associated Press report a day earlier disclosing the transactions 'suggests potential unethical, if not illegal, conduct by a senior Justice Department official and, even more disturbing, apparent complicity in such behavior by the department,' the committee's chairman, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., said in a letter to Gonzales. … Conyers also asked Gonzales when he and other department officials learned of then-Assistant Attorney General Sue Ellen Wooldridge's 'close relationship with a target of a department public corruption investigation and what action, if any, was taken as a result?'" The AP adds, "A third buyer of the gated community home at Kiawah Island, S.C., was former Deputy Interior Secretary J. Steven Griles, who shares a condominium in northern Virginia with Wooldridge and was told last month he faces possible criminal charges of lying to Congress and fraud in the Jack Abramoff bribery and influence-peddling scandal. … The Justice Department says ethics officials signed off on Wooldridge's purchase of the beach getaway with Griles, now an oil and gas lobbyist, and ConocoPhillips Vice President Donald R. Duncan, before the closing last April. The deed lists Duncan as half owner in the property, with Wooldridge and Griles each owning 25 percent. … Nine months later, the Justice Department sent two proposed consent decrees signed by Wooldridge to a federal judge in Houston for approval. One, sent Jan. 11, would let the company delay the required installation of some of the $525 million in pollution controls at nine refineries; the other dealt with a Superfund toxic waste cleanup. Wooldridge resigned as assistant attorney general effective Jan. 19. ConocoPhillips said Duncan had no involvement in negotiating the consent agreements." The AP notes, "Conyers' letter also was signed by Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, as an expression of broader support for the inquiries within the House. Another House panel, the Oversight and Government Reform Committee chaired by Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., launched an inquiry a day earlier."

Senate Democrats Order GAO Probe Of Royalties Collection. The New York Times (2/16, Andrews) reports, "Top Democrats on the Senate Energy Committee, citing widespread management problems at the Interior Department, ordered a new inquiry on Thursday into the department's fast-growing program to collect billions of dollars worth of oil and gas from companies that drill on public territory." The Times continues, "The inquiry, to be conducted by the Government Accountability Office, will come on top of a criminal investigation by the Justice Department into allegations that the program's director earned money as a consultant to companies that were seeking to resell the government oil. … Other investigations are under way by the Interior Department's inspector general and Congressional committees into complaints about mismanagement, weak enforcement and a leasing blunder in the 1990s that could cost taxpayers $10 billion in lost royalties over the next decade." The Times adds, "The new line of scrutiny comes from Senator Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico, chairman of the Senate Energy Committee, and Senator Ron Wyden of Oregon, chairman of the subcommittee on public lands. … The two senators asked the G.A.O. to analyze the so-called royalty-in-kind program, under which the Interior Department collects a share of the oil and gas that companies produce on federal property and then resells it on the open market to generate cash. … Bush administration officials have called the program a simpler and more efficient way for the government to collect royalties on the vast amounts of oil and gas produced on public lands."

Gore Describes Vision For "Live Earth" Concerts. The Washington Post (2/16, C1, Booth, 690K) reports that at "the news conference Thursday announcing this summer's ambitious 'Live Earth' concerts -- designed as an exercise in 'mass persuasion' about threats of global warming -- Al Gore described his vision: a 24-hour musical extravaganza across seven continents, featuring as many as 150 of the world's top recording artists, introduced by an army of 'celebrities and thought leaders' (think: Cameron Diaz and Richard Branson), playing before a total live audience of a million people, and reaching 2 billion more via television, radio and the Internet on July 7." Asked "yet again if he's running for president ('no'), the former veep was quizzed about lingering skeptics of global warming. Gore sighed, and then joked that the doubters must get together on Saturday nights with the folks who believe the moon landings were staged in the Arizona desert. Said Gore, 'I'm running out of things to say to them.'"

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Defense Lawyer Pleads Guilty To Leaking BALCO Grand Jury Documents. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/16, Elias, Kravets) reports the former lawyer for BALCO founder Victor Conte and BALCO vice president James Valente "pleaded guilty Thursday to obstructing justice by leaking secret grand jury documents to two reporters covering the government's probe of steroids in sports. Troy Ellerman could be sent to prison for as long as two years and fined up to $250,000 for the convictions. His sentencing was scheduled for June 14. … Prosecutor Douglas Miller said the plea concludes the government's investigation of the leaks and the subpoenas of the Chronicle's Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams were withdrawn." The AP notes, "Prosecutors said a 'previously unknown witness' approached the FBI and offered to help prove that Ellerman was the source. Larry McCormack, former executive director of the Pro Rodeo Hall of Fame and a private investigator who briefly worked for Conte, told the AP on Wednesday that he tipped off FBI agents."

The New York Daily News (2/16, O'Keeffe, Red, 729K) reports that "Ellerman's daredevil personality dates back to his childhood," but his "maverick ways may land him in jail following his bombshell admission Wednesday that he leaked the BALCO grand jury testimony to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters. … 'I think it was just Troy being Troy,' Larry McCormack, the private investigator who told the FBI in December that Ellerman was the source of the BALCO leaks, told The News yesterday. 'I tried to convince him to straighten this out. I think he just felt this is a way to do it, to get the case dismissed against his client. It was a way to throw something in the mix -- what Troy calls getting people off their game. Did it help his client? Well, his client didn't have to do any jail time.'"

Bloomberg (2/16, Gullo) reports, "Ellerman's motive was to use leaks in the case as a basis for seeking to have the criminal case against his client thrown out, the statement said. Ellerman had access to the transcripts because he was representing the vice president of Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative, known as Balco, a Burlingame, California-based lab at the center of a U.S. criminal probe of steroid distribution, said the statement. … 'Such gamesmanship undermines the integrity of the legal system and demands accountability,' said Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul McNulty, in a statement." Bloomberg notes, "A plea agreement calls for Ellerman of Woodland Park, Colorado, to serve two years in prison; his sentence will be decided by a judge. Sentencing is scheduled for June 14, the statement said. … The U.S. Justice Department is withdrawing subpoenas to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters who used the transcripts in a series of stories about the California lab, the statement said. The reporters had been found in contempt of court for refusing to testify to a separate grand jury about their sources."

Georgia Couple Named As Masterminds Behind $12 Million Marijuana Operation. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/15, Jefcoats) reported a Fayetteville real estate agent and her husband "masterminded a $12 million operation to grow marijuana hydroponically in the basements of vacant $300,000 homes, according to police from at least six Georgia counties. Fayette County sheriff's drug agents said Blanca Botello, 34, is a licensed ReMax Realtor who helped close the sale on at least a dozen homes used in the operation. The homes are owned by Cuban nationals who also may be charged." The investigation, which "originated from the Jones County Sheriff's Office and the Drug Enforcement Agency, is ongoing and more arrests are expected." The AP (2/15) reported a similar story.

The Fayette Daily News (2/15) reported, "Inside each home…were 200 plants -- for a total of nearly 2,100 plants with a value of more than $12 million. 'When we got the tip from Miami, all we had was a name, and information that the master-grower might be living in Fayette County,' said Capt. Mike Pruitt, head of the Fayette County Sheriff's Drug Task Force. … According to Pruitt, [a] name given by DEA agents, Merquides Martinez, turned out to be the mastermind behind the large marijuana operation, although no plants were found in his home in south Fayette County."

Man Accused Of Impersonating DEA Agent Arrested In Staten Island. The New York Sun (2/16) reports a "career criminal who once tried to shoot a New York police officer in the head was charged with impersonating a Drug Enforcement Agency special agent to rob drug dealers around the city. A joint task force of DEA agents and city and state police officers arrested Anthony Clanton, 34, on Tuesday at his apartment…in Staten Island." Investigators said they "found several counterfeit documents, including a DEA badge, a billfold with DEA credentials, two search warrants, and a Metropolitan Transportation Authority parking permit in his home."

The New York Daily News (2/16) reports Clanton "allegedly used the fake DEA badge, search warrants and possibly the real cop's gun to rob drug dealers and finance a luxurious lifestyle. He owns a minifleet of high-end cars." The Daily News says Clanton is a "reputed Bloods gang member who tried to kill an undercover cop a decade ago."

In its Metro briefing, the New York Times (2/16) reports Clanton is said to have "used a high-quality replica of D.E.A. credentials and fake search warrants to gain entrance to homes he intended to rob."

On its Web site, NY1 News (2/15) reports the DEA "says they also took guns, ammunition, crack cocaine, and a police scanner from the home. Clanton's arrest was the result of a joint investigation that began in November of 2006."

On its Web site, AM New York (2/16) reports, "Ten years ago, Anthony Clanton tried to kill an undercover cop, but his gunned jammed three times as the officer was heard on a recording device begging for his life. Clanton served eight years in federal prison, then returned to a life of crime, pulling robberies while posing as a federal agent, authorities said Thursday. … Inside Clanton's Narrows Road home, authorities said they found 300 guns, one stolen from a cop, 300 rounds of ammunition, a bullet proof vest, [and] a realistic-looking photo ID for HIDTA."

Pennsylvania Gun Purchase Sting Examined. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/16, Dribben) reports, "Fifteen years ago, when Raymond Tanner graduated high school, his dad switched careers. … Radically. … He sold his share of a dairy farm stand and opened a gun shop. … But going from butter to guns has its downside. … You have to worry about doing business with the wrong customers. And a Washington lobbying group could post your name on its Web site, naming you as an arms dealer who caters to criminals." The Inquirer continues, "Which is what happened last month when the Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence released a report, 'Shady Dealings: Illegal Gun Trafficking from Licensed Gun Dealers.' Tanner's store was featured as one of the scurrilous. … What the Brady Center didn't know is that the sale had been a sting, arranged in cooperation with the local office of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives." The Inquirer adds, "Lanky and laid-back, a yellow polo shirt tucked loosely into his jeans, Ray Tanner, 33, now manages Tanner's Sport Center in Jamison, Bucks County, for his father. The family prides itself on running an honest operation, he said. … In this small suburban shop, which stocks fishing reels and insect repellent, baseball caps and flashlights, as well as 1,500 firearms - about half of them handguns - spotting bad guys is relatively easy. … About once a month, the sales staff turns away a suspicious customer. Usually, Tanner says, a couple will come in. The man will look at handguns. He'll know just what he's looking for. … While he considers the fine points, the woman will wander around, utterly uninterested. But when they're ready to buy, she'll be the one filling out the paperwork. If it can be proved she bought the guns for the man, it is a 'straw purchase' - a felony." The Inquirer notes, Gun shops that willfully sell to straw purchasers can also lose their license and face prosecution, says John Hageman, special agent for the Philadelphia office of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. … So gun dealers are in a tricky spot, Hageman says. "They are businessmen dealing in a commodity. If they profile people, they risk alienating legitimate customers. But if they aren't suspicious enough and allow criminals to buy guns, they risk not only their credibility and their license, but people's lives."

IMMIGRATION:

Cuban Jetliner Bombing Suspect Posada Carriles Faces Immigration Trial. AFP (2/16, Gilot) reports, "An anti-Castro militant accused of bombing a Cuban jetliner in Venezuela three decades ago will face trial in the United States on May 11 on charges of lying in his citizenship application, a US judge has ruled." AFP continues, "Both Cuba and Venezuela have protested the fact that the United States has not pressed charges against Luis Posada Carriles, 78, for allegedly masterminding the 1976 bombing that killed 73 people. … Posada has denied his involvement in the jetliner bombing, but has reportedly admitted involvement in a string of hotel bombings in Cuba in 1997 and in a plot to kill Cuban leader Fidel Castro in Panama in 2000." AFP adds, "Venezuela and Cuba have also accused the United States of hypocrisy for refusing to extradite Posada to face terrorism charges in Venezuela. … The US government tried to deport Posada after he held a May 2005 press conference in Miami which alerted immigration officers that he had entered the country illegally. .. .But a US judge ruled Posada cannot be deported to Cuba or Venezuela, where he was a naturalized citizen, because he may face torture there. … US authorities have so far been unable to find a country willing to take Posada, a native Cuban and former CIA operative who was trained to participate in the failed Bay of Pigs invasion of Cuba in 1961 and went on to become chief of operations at Venezuela's secret intelligence police, Disip, in the 1970s."

TAX:

Administration May Go Along With Tax Hike On Wealthy. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, A1, Lueck, 2.04M) reports the new Democratic-controlled Congress "is looking to rein in looming tax increases on the middle class, possibly covering the cost by raising taxes on upper-income households. And the Bush administration may not stand in the way." The possible bargain "centers on the Alternative Minimum Tax, a kind of parallel income tax that hit 3.5 million U.S. taxpayers in the 2006 tax year. Congressional Democrats are eager to keep the AMT from ensnaring millions more middle-class taxpayers. They also must find a way to cover the estimated $50 billion cost of scaling back the tax this year." In "recent days, Bush administration officials have signaled they may not oppose a likely method of covering those costs: raising taxes on the nation's wealthiest citizens. That concession could mark the beginning of a bigger debate on revisiting the Bush tax cuts, which could ultimately lead to reversing at least some of the cuts given to upper-income Americans over the past six years."

Democrats Seek To Impose Economic Agenda. Under the headline "Democrats Push Economic Policy That Benefits Poor, Middle Classes," McClatchy (2/16, Hall) reports congressional Democrats "are moving quickly to impose their economic agenda now that they've returned to power on Capitol Hill. They're shrugging off strong macro-economic indicators to spotlight sluggish wage growth and a rise in mortgage defaults, and they're even pressuring the Federal Reserve to lower interest rates." Democrats are "homing in on narrower issues, such as a rise in mortgage defaults by holders of sub-prime loans, who tend to be minorities and working-class Americans. And they're addressing the job insecurity and general unease many Americans feel over how much the global economy now influences the U.S. economy." Democrats "feel that working Americans aren't fully sharing the benefits. Their agenda was on clear display Thursday." Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., "and a group of freshmen senators introduced a bill promoting what they called middle-class tax cuts. It includes a new tax credit for care of elderly family members and expanding the child tax credit."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Frank Says House Would Probably Reject Doha Trade Deal. The Financial Times (2/16, Guha, Callan) reports, "Unease about globalisation among US legislators is so great that a Doha deal would probably be rejected by Congress, Barney Frank, the Democratic chairman of the House financial services committee, claimed on Thursday. His remarks, at the second day of testimony by Ben Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, come at a moment when the administration is locked in tense negotiations with the Democratic leadership on trade policy." Said Frank, "My own view is that if they were in fact to come to an agreement in the Doha round that the resulting agreement – if they reach it as they are currently talking about – would not pass the House of Representatives."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Trumbull, 59K) reports "worries about the dark side of free trade are surfacing in the United States in ways that could affect the course of globalization worldwide. Don't expect an outright retreat from global commerce just yet," but "it is becoming more likely that the US will act to temper and manage its impact. The reason: Free-trade brush fires have recently erupted on economic and political fronts:"

Portman Memo Directs Agencies To Ignore "Earmarks." The Washington Times (2/16, Dinan, 88K) reports the Bush Administration "no longer will be bound by most congressional pork-barrel spending requests, the director of the White House's Office of Management and Budget said yesterday in a memo on how federal departments and agencies should treat money in the new spending bill the president signed into law." Some Republicans "hailed it as a giant turnaround, while Democrats said they already had taken steps to restrict pork spending this year." More than "95 percent of pork-spending requests, known as earmarks, are never enacted as laws, but rather are written into reports that do not have the force of law. For years, most departments and agencies have honored the requests anyway, fearing that otherwise their funding would be cut the next year." But OMB Director Rob Portman's "memo says the Bush administration will feel free to ignore those requests."

Conrad Says WSJournal Wrong On Bush's Return To "Fiscal Nerve." In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (2/16), Sen. Kent Conrad says, "Your Feb. 6 editorial 'Fiscal Revelation' wrongly praises President Bush's budget and unfairly criticizes me. It is far- fetched to claim that the president has rediscovered his 'fiscal nerve' with this budget. The federal debt burden is certainly not 'falling.' Debt has exploded under this president's watch -- increasing from $5.8 trillion when he took office, to $9 trillion by the end of this year, and to more than $12 trillion by 2012 if the president's policies are continued. The recent drop in the deficit does nothing to change our deteriorating long-term outlook, which has only worsened under this administration. The president could have used his budget as an opportunity to reach out to Democrats and the new Congress to address our long-term imbalances. Instead, he chose to again reject compromise and stay the course." This Administration "has the worst fiscal record in history and its new budget does nothing to change that."

Rangel, Grassley Debate Minimum Wage Bill. House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel and Senate Finance Committee ranking Republican Charles Grassley discussed the minimum wage issue on PBS' NewsHour (2/15, Suarez). Rangel said, "The House overwhelmingly passed the bill to approve the minimum wage for over 13 million people, and we sent it to the Senate with the understanding that it would have broad support over there. We sent it over. Republicans and Democrats support it. And maybe the distinguished senator from Iowa can share with us, what do they have against increasing the minimum wage for 13 million Americans?" Grassley replied, "Nothing against the increase in the minimum wage. That's why there were only three votes against it. … We're also trying to do what both Republicans and Democrats said in the last election they wanted to do, is close down tax loopholes, and tax schemes, and things of that nature, where people are doing everything they can to avoid taxation to bring in revenue, which offsets. So there's no increase in the deficit, either in our bill or in Chairman Rangel's bill." Rangel: "I think what the eloquent senator said was that they were going to hold the minimum wage bill hostage unless we passed $8 billion tax cuts for business. Is that fair to say?" Grassley: "It's not fair to say. … We can't get anything done in the Senate unless it's bipartisan. So this is what we're trying to do, is to help small business close tax loopholes, and raise the same amount of money so the deficit doesn't go up, and help minimum wage people. It's a win-win-win for everybody."

White House Pastry Chef Recalls Tenure In Book. USA Today (2/16, 6D, Clark, 2.27M) reports French pastry chef Roland Mesnier has been "churning out desserts to die for from the Carter administration right into George W. Bush's second term." Mesnier says, "I'm one of the few chefs who has left the White House with a good taste in my mouth." USA adds, "Indeed, of the six executive chefs who served during Mesnier's tenure, three were let go, he says. He retired in 2004 but has returned for brief stints since." His new book, "All the Presidents' Pastries: Twenty-Five Years in the White House (Flammarion, $24.95), out in time for Presidents Day, is peppered with reminiscences and insights from those years, plus recipes for presidential favorites such as pecan bourbon pie (Jimmy Carter) and quick chocolate mousse (Ronald Reagan)."

US Mint Releases New Washington Dollar Coin. ABC World News (2/15, story 8, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The US Mint rolled out the new $1 coin, featuring George Washington. It's the first in a series honoring the presidents. A new presidential $1 coin will be released every three months. The Mint plans on putting over 300 million of the Washington coins in circulation."

NYTimes Says Presidential Coin Series Is "Educational." The New York Times (2/16, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Perhaps the most striking thing about the new presidential coin released yesterday is that Congress has asked the United States Mint to issue one for every president from George Washington to Gerald Ford. With four new coins coming out each year, it will be hard to complain about the 2007 series, which offers a bumper crop of Founding Fathers. Washington, who appeared yesterday, will be followed by John Adams, Thomas Jefferson and James Madison. The down side of this inclusive approach, though, is that not every year will be so glorious." But there is "a real educational value in including every president. At a time when the current occupant of the White House thinks presidential powers should be expanded to new extremes, the series will be a four-times-a-year reminder that not everyone who makes it to the White House belongs on Mount Rushmore."

Neuharth Says Bush Among Worst Of Worst Presidents. In his USA Today column (2/16, 15A), Al Neuharth says, "A year ago I criticized Hillary Clinton for saying 'this (Bush) administration will go down in history as one of the worst.' 'She's wrong,' I wrote. Then I rated these five presidents, in this order, as the worst: Andrew Jackson, James Buchanan, Ulysses Grant, Hoover and Richard Nixon. 'It's very unlikely Bush can crack that list,' I added. I was wrong. This is my mea culpa. Not only has Bush cracked that list, but he is planted firmly at the top. The Iraq war, of course, has become Bush's albatross." Bush "admitting his many mistakes on Iraq and ending that fiasco might make many of us forgive, even though we can never forget the terrible toll in lives and dollars."

Private Structure Of Medicare Part D "Not An Impediment" To Its Success. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (2/16, A15), Daniel McFadden of the University of California, Berkeley, reviews the success of the market-based features of the Medicare Part D program. McFadden says, "My overall conclusion is that, so far, the Part D program has succeeded in getting affordable prescription drugs to the senior population. Its privatized structure has not been a significant impediment to delivery of these services. Competition among insurers seems to have been effective in keeping a lid on costs, and assuring reasonable quality control. We do not have an experiment in which we can determine whether a single-product system could have done as well, or better, along these dimensions, but I think it is reasonable to say that the Part D market has performed as well as its partisans hoped, and far better than its detractors expected."

OTHER NEWS:

Bernanke Says Economy May Be Exceeding Expectations. USA Today (2/16, 2B, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke "said Thursday the economy may be performing better than is currently estimated and said an increase in inflationary pressures would warrant higher interest rates." In his testimony to the House Financial Services Committee, Bernanke said, "We've seen some strong income growth, which suggests that the economy may be stronger than we think." Bernanke also "said the Fed wasn't ready to declare victory against inflation." Said Bernanke, "If inflation becomes higher for some reason, then the Federal Reserve would have to respond to that by raising interest rates."

The Washington Post (2/16, D2, Henderson, 690K) reports Bernanke "rejected a Democratic lawmaker's suggestion that he consider cutting interest rates to bolster the economy." Bernanke "repeated that the Fed is likely to hold rates steady for a while if slower economic growth nudges inflation lower this year and next as expected. But the Fed also thinks inflation is too high and might go higher, Bernanke said. If he and his colleagues adjust borrowing costs in coming months, they are more likely to raise rates than lower them." Chairman Frank "had told Bernanke the Fed's stance was 'troubling' to him because the central bank also forecasts the economy will grow at a moderate rate this year, below its long-term average, and that inflation will drift lower over time."

Fed Hints Lower Unemployment May Not Cause Inflation. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, A2, Ip, 2.04M) reports Federal Reserve officials "appear to believe unemployment can go lower than they previously thought without generating inflation, a potentially important shift that some economists think could make interest-rate increases this year less likely." The monetary-policy report "that Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke delivered to Congress this week indicated that members of the policy-setting Federal Open Market Committee now expect a lower unemployment rate this year than they did just seven months ago, but they don't expect that to result in higher inflation." The reduced inflation concerns "at the Fed and weaker economic data, such as a drop in January industrial production reported yesterday, have led financial markets to boost expectations the Fed will lower its short-term interest-rate target, now 5.25%, later this year."

Bernanke Wins Bipartisan Praise From Congress. The Financial Times (2/16, Guha) reports Bernanke's "political stock is rising – a development that could help him push through the changes he wants to make at the Federal Reserve, including the adoption of a flexible inflation target." At Thursday's House hearing, Democratic Chairman Barney Frank, "who raised eyebrows this year by pledging more robust oversight of the Fed, declared himself pleased with Mr Bernanke." Frank said, "You have, I think, over the past months in particular, said some very reason-able things from my standpoint." The Times adds a "day earlier in the Senate, Mr Bernanke was lavished with praise from all sides of the political spectrum for engineering a soft landing for the US economy." Several "common themes have emerged from the hearings. First, Mr Bernanke's decision to halt rate rises in the summer of 2006 has earned him political capital as a Fed chairman who considers seriously the dual mandate to put equal weight on employment and inflation, and not inflict harm lightly on the real economy."

Realtors Predict Upturn In Home Prices. NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 7, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The housing market tonight showing more weakness just at the end of last year. The number of existing homes sold in the fourth quarter fell in forty of our fifty states. Nationwide sales fell by just 10% and from the same time period a year ago prices were down prices were down 2.7%."

USA Today (2/16, Dugas, 2.27M) reports, "Home prices are likely to spring back in the coming months, the National Association of Realtors predicted Thursday after reporting that median prices fell in 73 metro areas in the final three months of 2006." NAR chief economist David Lereah said "last year 'was the year of contraction. … When we get the figures for this spring, I expect to see a discernible improvement in both sales and prices.'" USA adds nationwide, "the median sales price for an existing single-family home fell to $219,300 in the fourth quarter, down 2.7% from the same period in 2005." Several "once-sizzling markets in Florida continued to see price declines. The Sarasota-Bradenton-Venice area was worst hit; prices fell 18% in the fourth quarter." Still, the NAR "pointed out that despite the recent downturn in prices, gains for typical single-family homes the past five years have been robust in many metro areas — and explosive in others. In Riverside-San Bernardino-Ontario, Calif., for example, prices have soared 155.3% in the past five years."

Stock Markets Make Modest Gains, Dow Sets New Record Close. NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 8, :15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street here in New York, the blue chips were modestly higher, but it was enough for a new record close. The Dow finished up just over 23 points to close at that new record of 12,765.01. NASDAQ gained almost 9 points [to close at 2,497.10] on the day."

The Wall Street Journal (2/16, C1, McKay, 2.04M) reports the "pace of the stock rally slowed, but solid rises in shares of Caterpillar and Boeing were enough to spur the Dow Jones Industrial Average to a third straight gain and another record finish." Boeing shares "jumped 2%, helped by the aircraft maker's announcement of an order from United Parcel Service for 27 cargo planes. Caterpillar shares rose 2.2% after the equipment maker said it plans to repurchase $7.5 billion of its stock within the next five years. Both companies are Dow components." The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "inched up 0.1%, or 1.51 points, to 1456.81, up 2.7% on the year and some 70 points from its record set in March 2000."

Virginia Bar Mulls Allowing Lobbying Firms To Hire Legislators. The Washington Post (2/16, A1, Shear) reports, "The organization charged with regulating Virginia attorneys is pushing to erase an ethics rule that for a half-century has prohibited the state's legislators from being employed alongside lobbyists at the commonwealth's largest law firms." The Post continues, "The change, proposed by the Virginia State Bar's standing committee on legal ethics, could spark a bidding war among Richmond's leading law firms, which would be free to hire the speaker of the House of Delegates or the Senate floor leader even as their lobbyists prowl the halls of the General Assembly. … That has outraged some in the legislature, who say the move would create dangerous conflicts of interest for the lawmakers and the lobbyists. And they say it adds to a perception that the General Assembly is a good old boys' club where deals are cut behind closed doors instead of in public committee rooms." The Post adds, "Virginia's existing rule is stronger than in many states, where sitting lawmakers and lobbyists are often allowed to work in the same law firm, according to state bar officials. Arizona, Illinois, Washington and New Hampshire permit the practice, officials said. At least nine other bar associations prohibit firms from having both lobbyists and sitting lawmakers. Maryland does not have any such prohibition, but the state imposes certain restrictions on lawmakers who work for firms with lobbying arms. … Pressure to eliminate the rule in Virginia was sparked in part by Sen. R. Creigh Deeds (D-Bath), who recently joined the law firm of Hirschler Fleischer P.C., a Richmond-based firm with a small lobbying presence. Without the proposed change, Deeds would be violating state ethics rules. … Deeds, who describes himself as a small-town rural lawyer, said his losing bid for attorney general in 2005 made it nearly impossible to keep his small practice alive. His plans to run for governor in 2009 will require a more stable income, he said. But he said there will be a firewall between himself and the firm's lobbyists."

Clinton Campaign Signing Consulting Contract With Key Endorser. The AP (2/15, Schafer) reports South Carolina state Sen. Darrell Jackson, a "key black Democratic leader" in that state, "has negotiated a $10,000 per month consulting contract with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign, a development that came to light when the lawmaker endorsed the presidential hopeful." Clinton spokesman Mo Elleithee "denied there was any deal made for Jackson's endorsement." Jackson's firm "will advise Clinton's campaign on 'political matters in South Carolina, outreach, organizing issues' and purchasing advertising, Elleithee said."

Obama Will Have To Fight For Black Support In The South. Under the headline "Obama's Southern Support Not A Cinch," the Chicago Tribune (2/16, Glanton, 617K) says votes for Sen. Barack Obama "won't come easily" in the South, "home to the nation's largest concentration of African Americans -- one of the Democratic Party's most loyal constituencies and some of the most dedicated supporters of former President Bill Clinton." Black voters will "play a major role in primary elections in states such as South Carolina, Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia. About 50 percent of voters in South Carolina's Democratic primary are black." But black voters "have found themselves in a dilemma. Should they support Obama and possibly make history or should they support Hillary Clinton and bring back a team many feel was the most dedicated to black causes since President John Kennedy?"

Haitian-American Journalist Angered By Obama "Blackness" Debate. In a Washington Post (2/16, A23, 690K) op-ed, Haitian-American journalist Marjorie Valbrun writes, "What does it mean to be black, and who is the arbiter of authentic blackness?" As Obama's "'blackness' has increasingly been discussed on black-oriented radio shows, at political conferences and on Sunday morning news shows, I've grown more dismayed by the day. … At a time when blacks living in this country, whether by birth or by choice, should be harnessing their collective political clout to empower all black people, we're wasting time debating which of us are truly black. … People are asking whether he's black enough to represent them. I ask, black enough by whose standards? Why must Obama's life follow the same track of 'authentic' black folk to pass this litmus test?"

Obama Also Faces Battle With Clinton, Edwards For Internet Edge. In his Washington Post (2/16, A23, 690K) column, E.J. Dionne says the 2008 race is the "election in which Internet campaigning will reach maturity. The 2000 campaign offered the first glimmers of the medium's power when John McCain surprised the political world by raising $6 million to $7 million online in his unsuccessful Republican primary campaign against George W. Bush. Howard Dean rode the Internet from nowhere to a strong early position in the 2004 Democratic presidential race, only to fall to John Kerry." This time, "the question is whether Obama will have an edge as the candidate who talks about his campaign as a participatory mass movement and is trying to embody the word 'new.'" But Obama "faces two obstacles to overwhelming Clinton on the Internet. The first is John Edwards, whose strong stands against the Iraq war and in favor of a broad national health insurance plan have made him popular among the more ideologically committed bloggers and their audiences," the second is the "Clinton campaign's awareness that the Internet matters this year as it never has before."

Gingrich Remains In GOP's Top Tier In Polls. The Washington Times (2/16, Hallow, 88K) says "press accounts seldom name former House Speaker Newt Gingrich in the top tier of aspirants for the Republican presidential nomination, despite polls consistently showing he belongs there." In "every recent poll national poll -- as well as in Iowa" -- Gingrich leads Mitt Romney among Republican likely voters. Gingrich "has said he will wait until September to make a decision on running. Still, in poll after poll, he joins" Rudy Giuliani and Sen. John McCain "in scoring in double digits." But "late starters…may be out of luck this time, with both parties' nominees expected to be known by early February of next year."

Gingrich Again Says No Decision Until December. Asked on Fox News' Your World (2/15, Cavuto) when he will decide on a presidential run, Gingrich again said, "I will decide in late September. … This is February of 2007. The election is November of 2008. And you get an inauguration in January of 2009. Now, these guys are all running around -- and gals, counting Hillary -- raising money, hiring consultants, having polls. We have had more polls in February than you had in 1960 in the entire election."

Brownback Leads Senate Presidential Hopefuls In January Missed Votes. The Politico (2/15) reports Sen. Sam Brownback "has been playing an awful lot of hooky these days. Last month, he missed more than half of his Senate roll call votes," second in the chamber only to hospitalized Sen. Tim Johnson. Brownback "showed up 48 percent of the time. As a presidential hopeful, he probably has his hands full. Yet rival senators who are also moonlighting as '08 contenders have higher attendance records -- though the campaign season remains young." Sen. Barack Obama "has managed to show up for every vote so far," while Sens. Hillary Clinton and John McCain "scored a 94 percent attendance record last month."

Dodd's Banking Panel Role Helps Him Rake In Contributions. In a feature on the front page of its business section entitled "The Banker's Candidate," the Washington Post (2/16, D1, Birnbaum, Johnson, 690K) writes that Sen. Christopher Dodd "has two big jobs. He is a candidate for the Democratic nomination for president, and he chairs the Senate Banking Committee. They are proving to be a lucrative combination. Among Democrats, Dodd's $5 million campaign nest egg is surpassed only" by that of Sen. Hillary Clinton." Dodd's "electoral riches can be traced to the banking panel, whose jurisdiction includes some of the wealthiest industries in America -- banking, insurance and financial services. In addition, Dodd's home state is the hedge fund and insurance capital of the country. But it is Dodd's philosophy, not only his geography, that has made him a cash magnet. Each of these big-money interests applauds his light-handed approach to financial regulation and considers him a reliable friend -- a fact that raises questions about Dodd's viability in a Democratic field even as it bolsters his fundraising prowess." While "in recent presidential polls, Dodd has been little more than an asterisk," the "ample donations those connections have fostered will enable him to make his name more widely known."

WPost Says Romney Has Work To Do To Win Over Social Conservatives. The Washington Post (2/16, A22, 690K) editorializes that Mitt Romney, "having presided over one of the most liberal states in the nation, having made statements on issues such as abortion and gay rights that appealed to the residents" of Massachusetts, "now needs to convince the social conservatives who have a big say in picking the party's nominee that he is not a Massachusetts Republican after all." Romney "has disavowed previous positions backing a federal law to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and calling for an end to the ban on gays in the military; now he emphasizes his opposition to the ruling on same-sex marriage by Massachusetts's highest court. Once he touted his support for abortion rights and backed the use of leftover embryos for stem cell research; now he endorses overturning Roe v. Wade, a position he says he came to during the stem cell debate. Our views are much more in line with the old Romney than the new version; Republican primary voters will have to judge for themselves which is authentic and whether political opportunism, rather than a moral awakening, as he says, played a role in Mr. Romney's transformation."

Coalition Launches Initiative To Change California Term Limit Law. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Vogel, 850K) reports an "unusual coalition of special interests with close ties to lawmakers launched a ballot initiative today that would tweak California's term limits to allow the Legislature's current leaders to stay in office as long as six more years." The measure "would do what Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles) and Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata (D-Oakland) have discussed with increasing urgency as their 2008 ousters approach: Cut the number of years a legislator could hold office from 14 years to 12, but allow that time to be served in a single house."

Malkin Seen As Conservative Firebrand. In his Washington Post column (2/16, C1), Howard Kurtz says conservative blogger Michelle Malkin "arouses strong emotions." Malkin said, "They'll ridicule my looks, ridicule my ethnicity, go after my family. They've attacked my husband relentlessly. There's a strong sexist strain among my liberal critics, who think it isn't possible I could have gotten anywhere without my Svengali husband, or some white man, embedding ideas in my head." The Post adds, "Make no mistake, though: This daughter of Filipino immigrants plays pretty rough herself. Whether on her blog, her Internet talk show or her Fox News appearances, Malkin delights in sticking her finger in the eye of the liberal establishment. And she is convinced that her detractors don't play fair." But "plenty of folks find Malkin's rhetoric overheated as well."

NYTimes Worries About Dislocated Auto Workers. The New York Times (2/16, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "American autoworkers are suffering through another round of layoffs, factory closings and buyouts. This time DaimlerChrysler has announced that it will cut 13,000 jobs in North America. Ford Motor and General Motors offered buyouts to a total of nearly 200,000 hourly workers in 2006." The "plight of the workers who have lost their jobs is real and has to be addressed, but the U.S. manufacturing sector is far more robust than the struggle of the carmakers suggests. According to the United Nations, the United States accounted for 21.2 percent of world manufacturing in 2000." But "pro-trade politicians have to make sure that a lost factory job does not mean a drastic and lasting decline in living standards, with no access to health insurance and no hope for a college education for that worker's children."

Rice Seen As Impetus Behind North Korea Deal. The New York Times (2/16, A3, Sanger, Shanker, 1.16M) reports in order to "win approval of a deal with North Korea that has been assailed by conservatives inside and outside the administration," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "bypassed layers of government policy review that had derailed past efforts to negotiate an agreement, several senior administration officials said this week." After a meeting in Berlin last month with Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, who had just held sessions with his North Korean counterparts, Rice "called back to Washington to describe the outlines of the deal to" national security adviser Stephen Hadley "and then to President Bush. But to some, it seemed the usual procedures were cut short -- vetting the details though an interagency process that ordinarily would have brought in Vice President Dick Cheney's office, the Defense Department and aides at the White House and other agencies who had previously objected to rewarding North Korea before it gives up its weapons." However, White House and other administration officials "dispute that, saying that all relevant agencies were consulted." In lieu of "formal meetings," Hadley "walked it through with concerned people," a senior administration official said, acknowledging that the process was "much more informal, and rapid, than usual." The result has been "an unusual attack on the agreement from the right," starting with former Ambassador John Bolton, who said "bluntly" that it was a "bad deal." Meanwhile, State Department officials said outgoing Under Secretary of State Robert Joseph "vehemently disagreed with the approach, telling associates privately what Mr. Bolton has said in public: that the new agreement was no better, and perhaps worse, than one signed by President Clinton in 1994." For her part, Rice on Thursday "sternly played down the significance of any internal dissent, making it clear that she would not entertain dissent after the president had made up his mind."

Hill Says Agreement Is "Only A First Step." Assistant Secretary Hill said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/15, Blitzer), "This is only a first step. It's not the whole thing. What we have is a 60-day agreement where they will shut down and seal this reactor, the reactor that has been continuing to produce plutonium up to this very day. And then we will begin discussing with them a list and try to run to ground all their other programs and go on from there." Asked about North Korea's "cheating" on a similar agreement reached in 1994, Hill said, "Well, you know, there's always the risk of cheating. … If they cheat in this 60-day process, we will know that pretty soon. So there's always the threat of that. But I will say there's one big difference between this deal and the previous deal, which is this is a multilateral deal. … And that's very different from the past, when it was a bilateral agreement between North Korea and the United States."

Appearing on PBS' NewsHour (2/15, Woodruff), Hill said, "During that 60 days, a few things have to happen, including shutting down the reactor and getting the IAEA inspectors there, beginning to work with us to get a list of all of their nuclear programs, all of their nuclear programs, which will have to be abandoned, pursuant to the agreement in September '05. So, yes, it's a good step forward, but there's a lot of steps to go." Asked about "criticism coming from inside your own Administration," referring to Deputy National Security Adviser Elliot Abrams, Hill said, "There are a lot of people who are going to have a lot of opinions. North Korea is a very emotional issue for many people. … I take my instructions from the Secretary of State."

Under the headline "White House Calms GOP Base On Korea Deal," the AP (2/16, Ben Feller) says the White House Thursday "sought to ease concern among conservatives" that the deal "goes too easy" on Pyongyang. In particular, Abrams "raised alarms" about the possible removal of North Korea from a list of terror-sponsoring states. White House spokesman Tony Snow 'said he spoke with Abrams and assured him North Korea will not be removed from the list unless it changes it behavior."

South Korean Official Warns Pyongyang Must Give Up Weapons Program. In a front page article, the Washington Times (2/16, A1, Sands, 88K) reports "a top contender to be South Korea's next president" Wednesday warned during a visit to Washington "that North Korea must be forced to give up all its nuclear-weapons programs if the new accord to end the peninsula's nuclear crisis is to succeed." Park Guen-hye, daughter of the late South Korean President Park Chung-hee and a former chairman of the leading opposition party, said the deal this week was a "good first step," but said "merely freezing Pyongyang's existing nuclear arsenal…was unacceptable."

Unresolved Status Of North Korea's Enriched Uranium Program Seen As "Shortcoming" Of Deal. In its "Inside The Ring" column, the Washington Times (2/16, Gertz, 88K) reports that "a senior Bush administration official said that one serious shortcoming of the tentative deal on North Korea's nuclear program is that it does not resolve the status of Pyongyang's secret highly enriched uranium (HEU) program." While North Korea "denies making any acquisitions necessary for a production-scale HEU program," the official stated, "We know they made these acquisitions." During talks in October 2002 between State Department official James Kelly and North Korean Deputy Foreign Minister Kang Seok-ju, Pyongyang reportedly "admitted that the uranium program had been under way for several years," but later "reversed course and began denying that they had the uranium program, a position eventually adopted by both China and Russia."

Prospects For Progress In Monday's Mideast Summit Seen As Bleak. AFP (2/16, Millikin) reports that as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice prepares to host a "rare" summit between Israeli and Palestinian leaders, a "political resurrection of the radical Palestinian group Hamas and a flare-up of violence in the disputed city of Jerusalem have cast a shadow over Monday's meeting." In recent months Rice has "heralded the existence of a 'new opening' for progress towards" a settlement. But on Thursday, her spokesman "was lowering expectations for the encounter." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the summit is "not designed as a set of meetings that is going to result in a formal outcome, it is designed to start a series of conversations."

Similarly, the Wall Street Journal (2/16, A8, King, Simpson, 2.04M) says the "budding political alliance" between Hamas and Fatah has "thrown a wrench into Ms. Rice's plans to start peace talks." But she is "sticking to her plans," leaving "skeptics, including some Israeli officials…wondering if Ms. Rice is wise to proceed on this trip." Meanwhile, the US "itself is sending mixed signals over whether it may be willing to interact with a unity government led by Hamas." Rice "said the US wouldn't take a position on this question until the new government is formed, but US officials in Israel have told the Palestinians that the US would shun the government if it doesn't embrace Israel, renounce violence and agree to abide by previous international peace accords."

The New York Times (2/16, A10, Cooper, 1.16M) says that "to some extent," Rice's plan to "jump-start" the peace process, "leap-frogging interim details and squabbles," has "turned the clock back to the closing days of the Clinton administration, when a push toward a final settlement expired." However, "the timing could not be worse." Prospects for "any real breakthrough were already bleak two months ago," when the plan was launched, but last week, "one more giant obstacle emerged: a national unity government of Fatah and Hamas leaders that was worked out in talks brokered by Saudi Arabia in Mecca." Bush administration officials, "publicly lukewarm about the agreement, were angry with" Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, according to the Times. They say the pact "brings him closer to Hamas instead of bringing Hamas." Rice was "angry about the Mecca deal," but "said that she would nonetheless go ahead with the planned summit."

Under the headline "Palestinian Power-Sharing Deal Complicates Rice's Mideast Trip," the Washington Post (2/16, A18, Kessler, 690K) says Abbas' move "has placed the United States in a quandary because, under Rice's formulation, he is a 'mainstream' leader, while Hamas is an 'extremist' group that needs to be isolated." In the interview, Rice "repeatedly defended Abbas," calling him "someone who has devoted his whole life to nonviolence," and said the US will continue to work with him. "It would be a very big mistake to not continue to deal with him," she said. Rice said she is traveling to the region because "it is important to inject energy and confidence" in the dealings between Olmert and Abbas.

The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Richter, 850K) says the summit "is taking place under a cloud of uncertainty" as "hopes for the US mission have dimmed." However, the

Administration is seen as "eager to show allied Arab governments that it can make progress on Israeli-Palestinian issues, in hopes of strengthening their cooperation in stabilizing Iraq and resisting the influence of Iran."

Abbas, Haniya Meet To Select New Cabinet. The New York Times (2/16, A10, Myre, 1.16M) reports, "After months of difficult negotiations and bloody Palestinian street fighting, the Hamas-led Palestinian government resigned Thursday to pave the way for a unity government that will include Hamas and the rival Fatah movement." Prime Minister Ismail Haniya submitted his cabinet's resignation on Thursday evening at a meeting with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

The Washington Post (2/16, A18, Wilson, 690K) says Abbas "immediately reappointed Haniyeh to assemble the next cabinet" in accordance with the agreement reached last week in Mecca, "although who will fill some of the key ministries has been a point of debate between the two sides for the past few days."

USA Today (2/16, 10A, Slavin, 2.27M) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday the Bush administration "had not rejected" the Cabinet being formed by the Palestinian factions, but she "said there is no sign the new government would recognize Israel -- as demanded by the Administration and the Israeli government."

The Washington Times (2/16, Gertz, 88K) reports aides to the Palestinian president were quoted by wire reports as saying C. David Welch, assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, "warned Abbas during a telephone conversation yesterday that Washington would not deal with members of the new government -- even those from Fatah -- unless it meets the Quartet conditions." The aides also said that Jacob Walles, the US consul-general in Jerusalem, "delivered the same message to Mr. Abbas in person at a meeting in the West Bank town of Ramallah."

Gates Reiterates US Not Planning Attack On Iran. The New York Times (2/16, A8, Cloud, 1.16M) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates again said Thursday that the United States had no intention of attacking Iran "and that any American military efforts against it would be confined to Iraq to disrupt the smuggling of bomb-making materials over the border." During a Pentagon news conference, Gates said, "For the umpteenth time, we are not looking for an excuse to go to war with Iran. We are not planning a war with Iran." Even if the Bush administration "were able to establish that Iran's top leaders knew and authorized the smuggling," Gates said, there would probably be "no change in the Bush administration's strategy of limiting its military response to actions within Iraq."

Pace Says Comments About Iranian Government Referred To "Top Two Or Three People." Joining Secretary Gates at Thursday's briefing, the Washington Times (2/16, Gertz, 88K) reports Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, sought to "qualif[y] earlier comments that he doubted high-level Iranian government linkage to special armor-piercing bombs and rockets found in Iraq." Pace told reporters, "What I tried to say when I said I didn't know about the Iranian government, I'm talking about the top two or three people in the government." However, he stressed that the level of Iranian government involvement is "secondary to the danger the arms pose to US and coalition forces."

Pelosi: Bush Lacks Power To Invade Iran. The AP (2/16, Espo) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Thursday that President Bush "lacks the authority to invade Iran without specific approval from Congress," in what was seen as "a fresh challenge" to the President "on the eve of a symbolic vote critical of his troop buildup in Iraq." Pelosi said Congress "should assert itself…and make it very clear that there is no previous authority for the president, any president, to go into Iran."

Japan Freezes Iranian Assets. AFP (2/16) reports the Japanese government "has decided to freeze the assets of 10 groups and 12 individuals related to Iran's nuclear and missile programs, under a UN sanction resolution approved in December." Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso told reporters Thursday, "We must execute the measures with a determined will and resolve because (the Iranian nuclear problem) affects the nuclear non-proliferation regime and North Korea's nuclear problem." Aso also called on Iran "to stop its uranium enrichment activities and return to the negotiating table before and after the passage of the resolution."

WSJournal Says Focus Should Be On Troops' Safety, Not Intelligence. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.04M) writes, "Following the weekend intelligence disclosures about Iranian-supplied weapons killing GIs in Iraq, we predicted Tuesday that 'a large part of Washington will pretend the evidence doesn't exist, or suggest the intelligence isn't proven.'" And, "Sure enough, President Bush faced a barrage of questions Wednesday wondering whether senior Iranian leaders were really aware of the weapons transfers, whether he was using 'faulty intelligence,' and whether the disclosures were part of a strategy designed to 'provoke Iran.'" The Journal criticized "the state of our public discourse," where "American military officials present prima facie evidence of Iranian weapons implicated in killing 170 US soldiers and wounding 600 more, and Washington's main concern is not for the GIs but in refighting the last intelligence war."

Egypt Cracks Down On Muslim Brotherhood. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Stack, el Hannawy, 850K) reports the Egyptian government is "seizing upon a moment of regional chaos and US inattention to crack down aggressively on the country's most popular opposition group and shore up its hold on power." In "a bald push" against the Muslim Brotherhood, the government in recent weeks "has arrested hundreds of activists, unveiled new restrictions on political Islam and published a stream of anti-Brotherhood propaganda in the state-run media."

Libyan Official Seeks Closer Ties To US. In its "Embassy Row" column, the Washington Times (2/16, Morrison, 88K) reports Libya "hopes to remove the last irritants blocking" normalization of relations with the United States "very, very soon," according Ahmed Said Fituri, Libya's secretary for American affairs. As the highest-ranking Libyan official to visit Washington since late 2003 when Libya announced that it was giving up its nuclear weapons programs, Fituri gave an off-the-record talk at the Nixon Center Tuesday. Speaking to the Times' David R. Sands after the session, Fituri said Libya "wants some irritants removed from the bilateral relations, including the end of all sanctions and difficulties in obtaining visas to travel to the United States." The official said he planned to spend much of his visit meeting members of Congress to "discuss how we can close the gap."

Russia Threatens To Quit Arms Treaty Over US Missile Shield. The Financial Times (2/16, Sevastopulo, Buckley, Dombey, Cienski) reports Russia Thursday threatened "to pull out of a landmark nuclear arms control treaty unless the US backed away from plans to install its missile defence shield in Eastern Europe." Russian army chief of staff Yury Baluyevsky "said Moscow might unilaterally withdraw from the 1987 Intermediate-range Nuclear Forces treaty" as the Pentagon prepares to start negotiations with Poland and the Czech Republic about hosting missile interceptors and radars. In response, a senior Pentagon official "said the US would 'resist' the Russian move, which he said would have serious implications for American allies in Europe."

Foreign Minister's Promotion Sparks Speculation That He May Replace Putin. The Washington Post (2/16, A16, Finn, 690K) reports, "President Vladimir Putin promoted Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov to the post of first deputy prime minister Thursday, an elevation that immediately intensified speculation that Putin might favor him as his successor." Ivanov "will now be charged with overseeing Russia's military-industrial complex as well as part of the civilian economy. He was recently put in charge of consolidating and revitalizing Russia's aviation industry."

The New York Times (2/16, Myers, 1.16M) notes Ivanov is "a former K.G.B. officer who became the first civilian to lead the country's military in 2001." The Wall Street Journal (2/16, A6, Chazan, White, 2.04M), under the headline "Putin's Succession Gets Murkier," says the "promotion of a hawkish ally has rejiggered the power balance among" Putin's "likely successors, sharpening the competition faced by the more pro-Western candidate who had been considered the front-runner in next year's presidential contest." Ivanov will now have "the same rank as Dmitry Medvedev, the pro-Western first deputy prime minister."

Putin Dismisses Chechen President. The Washington Post (2/16, A19, Finn, 690K) reports Putin "dismissed the president of Chechnya on Thursday, clearing a path to the southern republic's highest office for Ramzan Kadyrov, the controversial prime minister of Chechnya who has been accused of major human rights abuses in his drive to pacify the war-torn region." Putin "appointed Kadyrov as acting president in advance of elections, in which analysts expect the young Kremlin ally to face only token and timid opposition. No election date has been set, and Russian officials insisted there would be more than one candidate."

More Commentary On Putin. Padma Desai, a professor of comparative economic systems at Columbia University, writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/16, A14, 2.04M), "Whatever the West's grave misgivings about…Putin, they are not widely shared by the Russian people, who consistently give their president 70% approval ratings in opinion polls. Even former Presidents Gorbachev and Yeltsin, much admired in the US, have given a nod of approval to Mr. Putin's 'strategic' direction, even though they express reservations about his moves to consolidate federal authority." Desai also says that "if it's correct to say that a prospering middle class -- dare one call it a bourgeoisie? -- inevitably leads to the rise of democracy, then Russia fits the bill admirably. The transformative changes in Russia…are phenomenal. Russians are acquiring private housing, automobiles and fixed and mobile telephones at a dizzying speed. The overall poverty rate has declined from around 35% in the mid-1990s to about 10% today, and 70% of college-age youngsters receive a higher education."

David Ignatius, in the Washington Post (2/16, A23, 690K), writes, "Think of the new Russia as a highway: People used to drive on the left side of the road; now, officially, they are supposed to drive on the right, but the change has been uncomfortable (especially for the authorities). So the country straddles the middle -- which is understandable, but also dangerous. That's a paradox of…Putin's Russia that I have encountered in nearly every conversation here this week. Russian officials insist they don't want to go back to communism," but the country "is wary of full, American-style democracy."

Charles Krauthammer, also in the Washington Post (2/16, A23, 690K), says "Putin's aggressiveness does not signal a return to the Cold War. He is too clever to be burdened by the absurdity of socialist economics or Marxist politics. He is blissfully free of ideology, political philosophy and economic theory. There is no existential dispute with the United States." Putin "is a more modest man: a mere mafia don, seizing the economic resources and political power of a country for himself and his (mostly KGB) cronies."

Friedman Predicts Oil Prices Will Shape Russia's Future. New York Times (2/16, 1.16M) columnist Thomas L. Friedman writes, "Boeing's Moscow Design Center, which employs 1,400 Russian engineers...on various projects, symbolizes Russia's unique potential: Russia is that rare country that not only has a treasure trove of natural resources — oil, gas and mines — but also has a treasure trove of human talent: engineers, mathematicians and other valuable minds." The "meta-question with Russia today is this: Will it become more like Norway, a democracy enriched by oil, or more like Venezuela, a democracy subverted by oil? ... You see signs of both trends." Friedman predicts, "If the price stays at $60 a barrel, [Russia is] going to be more like Venezuela, because its leaders will have plenty of money to indulge their worst instincts, with too few checks and balances. If the price falls to $30, it will be more like Norway. If the price falls to $15 a barrel, it could become more like America — with just enough money to provide a social safety net for its older generation, but with too little money to avoid developing the leaders and institutions to nurture the brainpower of its younger generation."

WPost Critical Of Proposed VOA Programming Cuts. The Washington Post (2/16, A22, 690K) editorializes, "For decades, the Voice of America and its sister broadcasting organizations offered a remarkably balanced alternative to state-controlled media all over the world, buoying dissident movements and undermining anti-American dictatorships for a relatively small investment. Soviet citizens even learned how to reconfigure their radios to break through the jamming signals their government used to interrupt VOA and British Broadcasting Corp. programming." Now, with Putin "bullying his neighbors, manipulating the Russian media and throwing increasingly audacious anti-American tantrums, one would think US policymakers would have the sense at least to maintain relatively modest VOA operations in and around the Russian Federation. Yet President Bush's recently released 2008 budget proposal does just the opposite, cutting VOA programming for a range of post-Soviet states to finance programming expansion in other areas of the world."

Ban Presses Sudan To Allow UN Team To Visit Darfur. The New York Times (2/16, Hoge, A3, 1.16M) reports U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki-moon said Thursday that Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir "had broken a personal pledge he made last month to give entry permits to a United Nations human rights team, and Mr. Ban urged the Sudanese leader to reconsider." Ban also said he had received" no reply from Mr. Bashir to a Jan. 24 letter addressing Sudanese concerns over a combined African Union and United Nations force to curb attacks on villagers in the Darfur region of western Sudan." Ban said the letter "detailed how an advance force would be created, as well as its command structure and financing. "With an affirmative answer, we can pave the way immediately to the introduction of a hybrid A.U./U.N. mission," he said.

US Preparing For Post-Castro Cuban Exodus. In an exclusive report, the Miami Herald (2/16, Bachelet, 286K) says amid concerns of "a possible mass exodus of Cubans," the Department of Defense "plans to spend $18 million to prepare part of the US Navy base at Guantánamo Bay to shelter interdicted migrants," US officials told the newspaper. Fidel Castro's illness and temporary hand-over of power to his brother Raúl last summer "injected a renewed sense of urgency into plans to handle a mass exodus," and the Administration "quietly requested the funds about a month ago and Congress has approved it," officials told The Miami Herald. The $18 million initiative is "part of a broader US government effort to prepare for the death of Castro." According to the Herald, "top Bush Cabinet officials have met at least twice since December to review Cuba contingency plans," and on March 7 and 8, the Department of Homeland Security "will lead an exercise in South Florida involving the Coast Guard and dozens of federal, state and local agencies, focused on stopping US boaters from picking up rafters."

NYTimes Urges WHO To Ensure Supply Of Avian Flu Vaccine. The New York Times (2/16, 1.16M) editorializes, "Indonesia sent a chill through the World Health Organization recently when it refused to supply any more samples of the avian flu virus that has killed scores of its people. The move, which seemed aimed at gaining access to vaccines at an affordable price, threatens the global effort to track the virus and develop vaccines. But Indonesia has raised a valid point that needs to be addressed: if a pandemic should strike, poor countries would be left without protection." The WHO "needs to work much harder to encourage the transfer of vaccine production technology to countries, like Indonesia, that have the technical ability to use it. That will increase the supply of vaccine and presumably bring prices down. Even then, we fear, there still won't be enough."

May trial set for anti-Castro Cuban militant Posada

EL PASO, Texas · An anti-Castro Cuban militant accused of lying to immigration officials to become a U.S. citizen should stand trial in May, a federal judge ruled Thursday.

U.S. District Judge Kathleen Cardone set May 11 for jury selection in the case against Luis Posada

Carriles, who has been in U.S. immigration custody since May 2005 after surfacing in Miami.

Posada, a former CIA operative and U.S. Army soldier, is accused of lying about how he illegally entered the United States from Mexico in 2005 and several other details in interviews and on an application to become a naturalized U.S. citizen.

According to a seven-count indictment handed down last month, Posada told investigators he paid a smuggler to drive him across the border into Texas but really entered the country aboard a boat with several men he had denied seeing.

He also is accused of lying about using an alias.

Posada was arrested on a charge that he illegally entered the country.

Since then, an immigration judge has ruled that he should be deported.

But the judge ordered that he could not be sent to Cuba, where he was born, or Venezuela, where he is a naturalized citizen.

Governments of both countries want Posada deported to Venezuela so he can stand trial on charges that in Caracas he plotted the deadly 1976 bombing of a Cuban jetliner.

Posada has denied any wrongdoing and has pleaded not guilty in the federal criminal case.

Lawyer criticizes Pentagon for releasing Guantanamo charge details

ROD McGUIRK Associated Press Writer

(AP) - CANBERRA, Australia-The Pentagon has released new details of allegations against three high-profile terror suspects being held at Guantanamo Bay in a move condemned by a defense lawyer Friday as a tactic to provoke moral condemnation.

Detailed allegations against David Hicks, an Australian accused of fighting for the Taliban; Omar Khadr, a Canadian accused of killing a U.S. Army Special Forces soldier in Afghanistan; and Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a Yemeni accused of supporting al-Qaida operatives, were posted recently on the U.S. Defense Department Web site.

All three had charges sworn against them this month in a preliminary step toward them being tried by military commissions at the U.S. naval base at Cuba where they are being held.

The charges must still be approved by the U.S. Department of Defense legal adviser and another official who oversees the tribunals.

Hicks' Pentagon-appointed lawyer, Marine Corps Maj. Michael Mori, said it was curious that the details were made public before the charges were officially approved.

"I think … they want people to morally judge and make a moral decision and get away from the legal aspect," Mori told Australian Broadcasting Corp. radio.

U.S. military commission prosecutor Air Force Col. Morris Davis said he expected the charges would be approved within two weeks.

Hicks, a 31-year-old former kangaroo skinner, is likely to be charged with attempted murder in violation of the law of war and providing material support for terrorism.

The Muslim convert had pleaded not guilty to charges of attempted murder, conspiracy to commit war crimes and aiding the enemy before the U.S. Supreme Court ruled last June that the previous military commission system was illegal.

The charge sheet released by the Defense Department alleges that Hicks "engaged in hostile action" in Albania in 1999 as a member of the paramilitary Kosovo Liberation Army.

He is also accused of engaging in "hostile action against Indian forces" in Kashmir in 2000 as a member of the Pakistani terror group Lashkar-e-Tayyaba.

The group allegedly helped him travel in 2001 to Afghanistan, where he trained with al-Qaida, carried out surveillance of the U.S. and British embassies in Kabul, and met al-Qaida's leader, Osama bin Laden, the charge sheet says.

After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States, Hicks is accused of holding the front line in Afghanistan with al-Qaida and Taliban troops who included American-born Taliban soldier John Walker Lindh. Lindh is serving a 20-year prison term after pleading guilty to terrorist offenses in a U.S. court in 2002.

Both Mori and Hicks' father, Terry Hicks, said there was little new information in the new charges against the lone Australian at Guantanamo.

Prime Minister John Howard, a staunch ally of the U.S. in its war against terror, has criticized the United States over delays in bringing Hicks to trial and is under mounting political pressure to bring him home.

Malcolm Fraser, a former prime minister from Howard's Liberal Party, accused the government on Friday of betraying Hicks' rights as a citizen.

Fraser, who led Australia from 1975 to 1983, told a human rights conference in Melbourne that the Guantanamo legal system was structured to produce guilty verdicts.

The San Francisco-based Electronic Frontier Foundation is pressing the Hepting lawsuit against AT&T Inc. (T.N: Quote, Profile , Research)

Nevada Test Site Workers Get Hopeful Boost From Senator Reid

George Knapp, Investigative Reporter

Hundreds of sick and dying workers from the Nevada Test Site are hopeful they'll be compensated for their illnesses now that Senator Harry Reid has offered new legislation.

Reid's bill, which was introduced Thursday, would expand eligibility for those who may have contracted cancer because of exposure to radiation.

The I-Team's George Knapp has more on the legislation and the problems it doesn't address.

"It just seems to me when you get over one hurdle there's another one waiting. You know, they just don't want to finalize this thing, and in my opinion they just hope you die and go away," Ray Slaughter stated.

Slaughter cleaned out tunnels after underground tests were set off at the Nevada Test Site. He personally witnessed several explosions. As the first on the scene, Slaughter was exposed to killer radiation and toxic chemicals.

His doctors say the radiation left him with two different types of cancer. Those doctors gave him two years to live. That was a year ago, and it's obvious by looking at him that Slaughter's clock is ticking. He knows the chances that he will receive compensation are growing slimmer by the day.

"I haven't been feeling well at all. So, I don't know if they're growing and they're doing something. I know that the tumors are growing and coming back. I know that," he continued.

Nevada Senator Harry Reid says his new legislation will help Slaughter and hundreds of other Test Site workers who are dying receive compensation for service to the country.

Reid's office sent the I-Team this statement: "I care about these Test Site workers because they, along with many other people, but not anyone that did any more than they, were responsible for winning the Cold War. The things that went on there allowed us to defeat, in the Cold War, the Soviet Union. That's how important this is."

The bill would allow anyone who worked at the Test Site before 1993 to cut through the beauracratic red tape and get the help they need by putting them in what is called a "special exemption cohort," which would mean almost all atomic workers who develop certain deadly diseases would be eligible for compensation.

Right now, two thirds of the dying Test Site workers don't qualify at all, and less than 5-percent of those who are eligible have received benefits. Slaughter's testimony in front of Congress in 2000 helped spark legislation to pay dying nuclear workers up to $150,000 each. But for Slaughter and other Cold War veterans, it may be too little, too late.

"Chronic lymphocytic leukemia, which is not one of the 22 registered cancers, and lymphoma. And based on the silicosis, I contracted diabetes, heart problems, and all kinds of different health problems that they've paid me for," Ray Slaughter explained. "I recently had a CAT scan done and it showed some stuff on my lung, and kidney and adrenal gland."

This week, Slaughter drove to Las Vegas for yet another in a long line of medical screenings. He says his doctor told him that radiation does not cause cancer. Disgusted, Slaughter is almost ready to give up, which is what he things the government wants him to do.

Eligible workers are put through what is called "dose reconstruction." It's a process that uses records from as long as 50 years ago to estimate how much radiation workers may have been exposed to. But Slaughter says it's a joke. Many times workers would take their radiation gauges off, and many of the records are incomplete or destroyed.

Ray said, "They're bogus. They're totally bogus in my opinion, because, you know, one year I got the maximum dose in three days -- the yearly dose -- and the next year I got zero. It doesn't make any sense. And I was constantly doing re-entry."

A government study agrees, saying the test drastically underestimates the amount of radiation each worker received. But for Slaughter and other nuclear workers, the problem isn't just getting the government to recognize that their cancers are linked to the Test Site, it's getting them to cut the beauracratic run-around and recognize them for their service and sacrifice.

"It's just one hurdle after another. I said, why can't you just say yeah, you've got lymphoma, which you've done partially, and your entitled to have a full body impairment rating and be compensated accordingly? That's all I'm asking." Ray explained.

Senator Reid says the money to help the workers has already been appropriated but the Bush administration won't spend it. He hopes to change that before Ray Slaughter dies.

Other big name senators have joined the fight for nuclear workers in their states.

Illinois senator Barack O'Bama is fighting for compensation for workers at 17 separate sites there. And New York Senator Charles Schumer successfully got a resource center built in western New York.

No comment' in Ranbaxy investigation

Staff Report

PLAINSBORO--Criminal investigators and Ranbaxy USA Inc. officials remained mum yesterday on the apparent warrant search of the generic drug manufacturer's American headquarters Wednesday by federal agents.

"We cannot comment on pending investigations," said Vickie Leduc, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Baltimore.

Agents wore jackets identifying them as "FDA-OCI Federal Agent" during the search of the India-based Ranbaxy's offices here at 600 College Road East -- indicating they're from the U.S. Food & Drug Administration's Office of Criminal Investigations.

Numerous Trentonian calls for comment yesterday went unanswered, and no new news releases appeared on the company's Website.

A source said that since Ranbaxy is a public company, officials will likely be forced to respond in some manner soon, to ease worries of stockholders.

On its Website, Ranbaxy Laboratories Limited, headquartered in Gurgaon, India, brags that from a small company in the Sixties it has grown "to be an integrated, research-based, international pharmaceutical company with over a billion dollar global sales ..."

"It is with the unwavering 'dedication' and the 'will to win' of Team Ranbaxy across the globe that we have traversed this journey so far.

"We are committed to provide quality generics at affordable prices to the patients worldwide with a view to help bring down the healthcare costs." Ranbaxy aims for $5 billion US sales by 2012.

"As we step into the next phase, we are driven by our ambition, willing to invest in the growth of our people and business, marching toward the new horizon of global leadership."

News stories in the past two years detail the company's patent fight with Pfizer Inc. to produce the generic version of the cholesterol drug Lipitor, its purchases of other generic drug manufacturers, and its fight to grow in the European market even as its U.S. revenues declined 22 percent in 2005 to $331 million.

Lawsuit Might Reduce FDA Authority In Allowing Terminally Ill Patients To Use Experimental Medications

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia on March 1 will reconsider a case that "threatens to shake the foundations of the FDA's regulatory authority covering pharmaceuticals and lead to greatly expanded use" of experimental medications, the Newark Star-Ledger reports (Cohen, Newark Star-Ledger, 2/12). In the case, the Abigail Alliance for Better Access to Developmental Drugs and the Washington Legal Foundation in 2003 filed a lawsuit against FDA to obtain access to experimental medications for terminally ill cancer patients. The lawsuit asked FDA to provide a special initial approval of experimental medications that appear effective and allow their sale and distribution to terminally ill patients who have no other approved treatment options. FDA argued that programs currently exist to provide experimental medications to terminally ill patients and that increased access to such treatments would lead to unacceptable risk. In May 2006, a three-judge panel of the court ruled that terminally ill patients have a "right of self-preservation" and should have access to experimental medications that have not reached Phase II clinical trials. According to the 2-1 decision, which reversed the dismissal of the lawsuit by a lower court, "barring a terminally ill patient from the use of a potentially lifesaving treatment impinges on this right of self-preservation." FDA appealed the decision and asked the full court to rehear the case. In November 2006, the court vacated the decision and agreed to rehear the case (Kaiser Daily Health Policy Report, 1/30).

Reaction

Maria Hardin of the National Organization for Rare Disorders said that the group supports "having expanded access to drugs that are in clinical trials" but has concerns about the "pressure that has been put on the FDA to provide drugs to anyone who is in a very serious state and to give it to them when the drug is still in safety trials." Fran Visco, president of the National Breast Cancer Coalition, said, "I understand the emotion that drives the Abigail Alliance, but this isn't about emotion, it's about saving as many lives as possible and not about getting as many drugs out as possible." Visco added, "It's about doing the right research and making sure we have patient protections in place and making drugs available that are truly helpful." Peter Jacobson of the University of Michigan Center for Law, Ethics and Health said that the "future of pharmaceutical regulation is at stake" in the case and that a decision in favor of the plaintiffs could compromise patient safety. The pharmaceutical industry also has raised concerns about the financial, legal and safety implications of expanded use of experimental medications (Newark Star-Ledger, 2/12).

Opinion Piece

Opponents of the lawsuit maintain that "current regulations and processes fully meet the needs" of terminally ill patients -- "doctors merely need to ask the government, on behalf of their patients, for access to any unapproved drug they wish" -- and that change "is therefore unnecessary," Mark Thornton, senior vice president for GenVec, writes in a Wall Street Journal opinion piece. However, according to Thornton, such requests "can sometimes rival receipt of an audit from the IRS" and are "on occasion withdrawn by exasperated doctors or refused by the FDA, leaving patients to fend for themselves." Other critics raise concerns about the safety of expanded use of experimental medications, but the "fact is that all drugs, no matter what stage of development, have the potential to evolve new safety concerns," Thornton writes. He adds that experimental medications "safe enough for the hundreds of patients in the 'Phase II' of human testing" also are "safe enough for a patient whose only option is the terminal progression of his disease" (Thornton, Wall Street Journal, 2/12).

Judge Recommends Marijuana Growth For Research Purposes

By David Abel

An administrative law judge recommended Monday that a professor at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst be allowed to grow marijuana for research purposes, possibly making the state host to the nation's second laboratory authorized to grow the drug.

Professor Lyle Craker, a horticulturist who specializes in medicinal plants, has won support from both Senators Edward M. Kennedy and John F. Kerry in his effort to grow marijuana for research.

Marijuana is now only legally grown at the University of Mississippi, but Craker has argued that the drug grown there is neither potent enough nor readily available to researchers.

In her opinion, which can be overruled by the US Drug Enforcement Administration, Judge Mary Ellen Bittner said Craker's bid to grow marijuana "would be in the public interest."

"There would be minimal risk of diversion of marijuana," she wrote. "There is currently an inadequate supply of marijuana available for research purposes ... [and] competition in the provision of marijuana for such purposes is inadequate."

In a phone interview, Craker said he had not read the 87-page opinion. "I understand it's favorable, and that's good," he said.

Rick Doblin — president of the Multidisciplinary Association for Psychedelic Studies, a drug research group based in Belmont that hopes to sponsor Craker's work — called the decision "a major turning point."

"This is a major step to getting us to do the scientific research that the government has been blocking for the past 30 years," Doblin said. "If the government says no, the hypocrisy of their approach will help fuel efforts for state medical marijuana reforms."

Garrison Courtney, a DEA spokesman, declined to comment on the ruling. "We're still reviewing the opinion," he said. "We'll make a determination at a later point."

Craker first applied to the DEA for permission to grow marijuana in 2001. Kennedy and Kerry later wrote a letter to the DEA, saying that the Mississippi lab had an "unjustified monopoly."

In 2004, Craker and the Multidisciplinary Association for Psychedelic Studies sued the government in federal court, charging the DEA with unreasonable delays.

The DEA promptly rejected their bid. In 2005, Craker and the group sought the opinion from an administrative law judge.

If the DEA's administrator decides to reject Bittner's recommendation, Doblin said Craker and the group would file another lawsuit in federal court.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Team Of DOJ Attorneys Key To Anti-Terrorism Efforts. U.S. News and World Report (2/18, Ragavan) reports, "Just a few weeks ago, Kenneth Wainstein, the Justice Department's new national security chief, received a book in the mail, a memoir titled Secrets. Its author, Daniel Ellsberg-the former Defense Department analyst who was prosecuted for leaking the Pentagon Papers to the New York Times 36 years ago-sent the book to Wainstein after a spirited exchange with him during a recent panel discussion about prosecuting leakers. 'Dear Ken,' Ellsberg inscribed in the book, 'I shared your revulsion against all leaks until some years ago.'" US News continues, "Prosecuting those who leak classified information is just a small part of Wainstein's controversial portfolio. As the assistant attorney general for the National Security Division, created last summer, Wainstein has been handed most of the department's hot-potato issues and has at his disposal some of the government's most secret, powerful, and criticized investigative tools. Just recently, President Bush decided not to reauthorize the National Security Agency's controversial warrantless electronic surveillance program but to place it under a special court-the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court-that oversees government surveillance in intelligence investigations. The revamped program will now be under Wainstein's purview. Look for civil-liberties groups and the new Democratic majority in Congress to keep a close eye on his every move." US News adds, "The career federal prosecutor seems unfazed by the prospect of such scrutiny. In an interview, Wainstein, 45, said that he is used to making difficult decisions based on the facts and the law. 'But with national security being a hot political issue, it's natural for people to scrutinize our big prosecution decisions through the prism of politics,' says Wainstein. 'Because it's important that we maintain public confidence, we're careful to both make and to announce our decisions in an apolitical way.' … Sounds good. But in coming months, Wainstein, a Senate-confirmed presidential appointee, will have to contend with a host of lingering perception problems. 'This administration has politicized almost every part of the Justice Department,' says Kate Martin, director of the Center for National Security Studies, a civil-liberties group. 'We need congressional oversight to prevent this key division from being similarly politicized.'"

Identities Of Pilots Used For CIA Renditions Discovered. The Los Angeles Times (2/18, Drogin, Goetz, 850K) reports, "Relying on the operatives' passport numbers, hotel records, credit card bills and aviation records, German prosecutors are seeking to properly identify the 13 Americans in a high-profile case that has upset relations between Washington and Berlin and caused a political scandal in Germany over whether government officials sanctioned the CIA operation." The Times "confirmed their real identities from government databases and visited their homes this month after a German court in January ordered the arrest of the three 'ghost pilots' and 10 other alleged members of the CIA's special renditions unit on charges of kidnapping and causing serious bodily harm to Khaled Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent, three years ago. None of the pilots responded to repeated requests for comment left with family members and on their home telephones. The Times is not publishing their real names because they have been charged only under their aliases." The Times adds, "One former CIA operation officer who was involved in the Italian case at CIA headquarters, speaking on condition of anonymity because the case is classified, said he and his colleagues were increasingly nervous about traveling in Europe for fear of getting swept up in the investigations. He said he checked with a contact at the Italian intelligence service for reassurance that he would not be arrested."

WAR NEWS:

Senate Votes Down Iraq Debate, But Seven Republicans Back Cloture. The failed effort in the Senate Saturday afternoon to agree to cloture and permit debate on a resolution criticizing President Bush's Iraq troop increase led two evening news broadcasts and appears on the front pages of several major newspapers, but receives far less coverage than Friday's House vote in favor of a critical resolution. Seven Republicans voted for cloture in the 56-34 vote -- Sens. Norm Coleman, Susan Collins, Chuck Hagel, Gordon Smith, Olympia Snowe, Arlen Specter, and John Warner. Independent Democrat Joseph Lieberman and all other Republicans were opposed, while 10 senators – Robert Bennett, Kit Bond, Thad Cochran, Bob Corker, John Ensign, Orrin Hatch, Tim Johnson, Jon Kyl, John McCain, and Lisa Murkowski, all Republicans except for Johnson -- did not vote.

The CBS Evening News (2/17, lead story, 2:25, Smith, 7.66M) reported, "They came to work on a Saturday, but Democrats in the Senate couldn't pull it off. The Senate voted against advancing a resolution that condemns President Bush's troop surge." ABC (Chen): "It was enough of a spectacle to draw a crowd to the Capitol on a sunny winter weekend. Imagine senators working on a Saturday. … Some members scurried back from what was to have been a long holiday weekend, and some presidential wanna-bes bailed out of big campaign appearances, because though no one thought the measure had a snowball's chance, most senators couldn't risk the political backlash they'd face for not showing up."

NBC Nightly News (2/17, lead story, 3:05, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "There will be no debate in the US Senate for the President's plan for a troop surge in Iraq, at least for now. It was a rare Saturday session, and despite the shift in power, Senate Democrats failed to get enough votes to bring up a resolution opposing the President's war plan." NBC (Reid): "The rare Saturday session had some senators rushing back to Washington from the presidential campaign trail for a spirited, at times angry, debate on Iraq. … Democrats angrily accused Republican leaders of blocking the vote on the resolution for the second time in two weeks," but Republicans "blamed Democrats for blocking a vote on a Republican resolution prohibiting cutting off funds for the troops." ABC World News (2/17, story 3, 3:00, Hendren, 8.78M) said, "It was part policy, part principle, and part political theater in the Senate today. Majority Leader Harry Reid dragged his colleagues in for a rare Saturday vote to condemn the troop surge in Iraq."

On CNN (2/17) just after the vote, correspondent Dana Bash pointed out that "seven Republicans voted to rebuke the President, essentially. Seven Republicans voted with the Democrats in an effort to start a debate on this issue. … The last time the Senate voted on this, last Monday, there were only two Republican senators who voted with the Democrats. And the others, about five of them, who don't agree with the President's plan, who actually outright oppose it, said that they were going to vote with their party because it was a matter of minority rights. It was a matter of sticking with their party because they believed that their party had the right to have their own resolution. Well, nothing has changed. Republicans still did not have the right to offer their own resolution. But still, these five Republican senators switched their vote, essentially because they say they lost patience, that they simply don't agree with the President's plan, they want the Senate to have their say, to have a vote, and that they gave their leadership time to work it out, to work out a deal with the Democrats and it didn't happen."

The gain in GOP support for the Democratic stance gets some print attention as well. The Washington Post (2/18, Murray, 690K) headlines its front-page report "Iraq Vote In Senate Blocked By GOP," saying Senate Republicans "for a second time blocked a symbolic attempt by Democrats to reject President Bush's troop increase yesterday, but GOP defections were higher than before, suggesting Republican cracks as the Iraq war dominates Congress's agenda." Democrats "picked up five new Republican allies," but the "fate of the resolution is now very much in doubt." Reid "announced after the vote that he would not bring up the resolution again. Both sides instead are girding for the next phase, a confrontation over war funding, with some Democrats determined to exercise the power of the purse to influence Iraq strategy."

The New York Times (2/18, Hulse, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports on its front page that the Senate "narrowly rejected" the effort, "but Republican defections emboldened Democrats to promise new attempts to influence the administration's war policy." The Times says the outcome "suggested that Democrats were slowly drawing support from Senate Republicans for what was shaping up to be a drawn-out fight between the Democrat-controlled Congress and Mr. Bush over his execution of the war." Reid said, "A majority of the United States Senate just voted on Iraq, and a majority of the United States Senate is against the escalation in Iraq."

The Los Angeles Times (2/18, Simon, 850K) reports Reid "accused Republicans of trying to protect the president from an embarrassing vote," though he said he "would no longer push for a vote on the nonbinding resolution." Reid said Iraq "would remain center stage in the Senate. 'This war is too important to permit Senate Republicans to brush it aside,' he said. 'The Senate will keep fighting to force President Bush to change course.'" Sen. Lindsey Graham "accused Democrats of playing 'stupid political games.'" Graham said, "This is a low point in my time in the Senate." The Washington Times (2/18, Ward, 88K) headlines its front-page story "War Rebuke Halted In Senate," and says Republicans "said they had rebuffed an 'unfair' attempt by Mr. Reid to prevent a vote on an alternative resolution that would protect funding for the troops in Iraq."

The Chicago Tribune (2/18, Zuckman, 617K) says that while the Senate "expressed strong, bipartisan disapproval of President Bush's policy on Iraq," lawmakers "nevertheless failed to end their debate and pass a non-binding resolution." RollCall.com (2/17, Stanton) says Reid "claimed a symbolic victory" due to the "bipartisan majority of 56 lawmakers" that backed cloture.

The Washington Post (2/18, A6, Weisman, 690K) looks at how the oddly timed vote impacted the Senate's presidential hopefuls. Sen. Joseph Biden "had planned to spend the day in Iowa but instead flew back to Washington for the vote, then returned for an evening event. Of all the Senate's presidential hopefuls, he was the only one to speak before the vote." Sen. Barack Obama "hurriedly departed a campaign stop in South Carolina to cast his vote before hustling to a campaign appearance in Richmond and then boarding a plane to San Diego." Sen. Sam Brownback "voted against moving to a debate on the war before rushing to catch a plane to Orlando, where he was to address religious broadcasters." Sen. John McCain "did not bother to show up. In Iowa yesterday, McCain defended his decision to stay away from Washington in defiant terms, condemning the Senate Democrats for scheduling a rare Saturday vote on what he described as a political charade."

The Washington Post (2/18, A5, Milbank, 690K) also looks at the casual attire of the senators, saying they "entered the chamber to vote on the Iraq war yesterday as if emerging from a Lands' End catalogue." Sen. Robert Byrd, "who knows something about theatrics, volunteered: 'If it will help to bring our soldiers home, I will work every Saturday for the rest of this Congress.'" But Sen. Ted Stevens "was sour about delaying his Presidents' Day recess. 'It is an important subject to be debated, but why Saturday?' he complained."

Among the other sources offering straightforward reports on the debate and vote are the AP (2/17, Espo), The Politico (2/17, Reilly, Bresnahan), the Web site of The Hill (2/17, Marre, Bolton), CNN.com (2/17), and BBC.com (2/17).

White House Says Real Fight Yet To Come. NBC Nightly News (2/17, story 2, 2:20, Yang, 9.87M) said White House Press Secretary Tony Snow "shrugged off today's vote saying it was merely a procedural maneuver. The real test, he says, and the President says, is yet to come. Even before today's vote, President Bush was warning Democrats about the next fight." Bush: "I'm going to make it very clear to the members of Congress starting now that, you know, they need to fund our troops and they need to make sure we have the flexibility necessary to get the job done." Yang: "This week, a poll found 63% of Americans oppose send manager troops to Iraq, but 60% said Congress should not cut funding for additional forces that has Democrats on the defensive."

Rice Visits Less-Violent Baghdad, Where She Publicly Praises Maliki. ABC World News (2/17, lead story, 2:20, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "Here's a headline: no deadly bombings in Baghdad for two days. The emergency rooms are quiet and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice makes a surprise visit to boost a rarity in Iraq: a sense of optimism. No one is boasting of total success." The CBS Evening News (2/17, story 2, 2:35, Smith, 7.66M) reported, "By one measure, the Baghdad security sweep already appears to be having results. According to the Iraqi army, the Baghdad morgue routinely handled 40 to 50 bodies a day before the sweep. Since it began, the number of bodies has dropped to about ten a day." NBC Nightly News (2/17, story 3, 2:10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Baghdad saw less killing today. In at least one neighborhood, residents enjoyed the calm and wondered how long it would last."

The New York Times (2/18, Cave, 1.16M) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "made a surprise visit to Baghdad on Saturday to meet with Iraqi officials about the new security plan and to press the Shiite-led government to accelerate reconciliation, reconstruction and economic progress." Rice, "in a meeting with reporters after her talk with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and other Iraqi leaders, said it was still too early to judge the effectiveness of the new plan. But she said she had pushed the Iraqis to think beyond short-term security, to how neighborhoods and Iraqi civil society could be rebuilt if sectarian violence between the ruling Shiites and the minority Sunnis subsided."

Under the headline, "In Baghdad, Rice Acknowledges Frustrations In U.S.," the Washington Post (2/18, A21, Ernesto Londono, 690K) adds Rice "expressed support for a nascent Baghdad security plan during an unannounced visit to the capital Saturday, but she reminded Iraq's leaders that Americans were growing increasingly frustrated with the unyielding lethality and cost of the war." She "spoke approvingly of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's leadership, urged Iraqi officials to enact laws to fairly administer the country's vast oil reserves and acknowledged widespread disapproval of the Bush administration's policies in Iraq among many Americans and U.S. lawmakers." Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari said "Rice left with a realistic sense of the challenges that lie ahead."

The Los Angeles Times (2/18, Roug, 850K) keys on Rice's reconciliation message, saying she "urged Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish politicians to use a lull in violence resulting from a new security plan to reach long-delayed agreement on key political issues." Rice "said U.S. commanders have told her that troop strength among Iraqi units in the Baghdad operation is as high as 90%. … But she reiterated that political progress would have to accompany any military advances." Rice "urged hundreds of American troops and U.S. Embassy staff members to be patient, saying they were engaged in a 'noble cause.' … But she also said the Bush administration didn't have unlimited patience."

The AP (2/18, Gearan) titles its coverage, "Rice: U.S. Has Doubts On Iraq Democracy." She "told Iraqi government leaders Saturday that the contentious debate in Washington over President Bush's war strategy reflects U.S. doubts that democracy will prevail over violence." While Rice "used her visit to publicly praise the Iraqi government's role in a new security crackdown in Baghdad, an Iraqi official said she was more critical in private." The Washington Times (2/18, Gearan, 88K) runs the AP story.

Bombs Kill 11 In Northern Iraq. The AP (2/17) reports from Kirkuk, "Police and witnesses said the first blast occurred near shops and a bus depot. Minutes later, a suicide car bomber attacked the same area. The back-to-back lasts shattered about 20 shops as terrified shoppers fled screaming in panic amid burning cars and debris."

Attacks On US Helicopters In Iraq Seem Carefully Planned. The New York Times (2/18, Gordon, Cloud, 1.16M) reports on its front page, "Documents captured from Iraqi insurgents indicate that some of the recent fatal attacks against American helicopters are a result of a carefully planned strategy to focus on downing coalition aircraft, one that American officials say has been carried out by mounting coordinated assaults with machine guns, rockets and surface-to-air missiles. The documents, said to have been drafted by Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, show that the militants were preparing to 'concentrate on the air force.' The contents of the documents are described in an American intelligence report that was reviewed by The New York Times." Officials call the documents "a fresh indication that the United States is facing an array of 'adaptive' adversaries in Iraq, enemies who are likely to step up their attacks as American forces expand their efforts to secure Baghdad." ABC World News (2/17, story 2, :25, Avila, 8.78M) briefly mentioned the Times report.

Iran Said To Use Iraq To "Shift" Regional Balance Of Power. Under the headline "Iran's Chance: U.S. Troubles in Iraq Create Opening for Regional Shift," the New York Times (2/18, Slackman, 1.16M) looks extensively at Tehran's actions in the wake of US action in Iraq. "In recent weeks, President Bush and American military officials have increasingly accused Iran of meddling in Iraq's affairs. But from Iran's perspective, given its longstanding interests in Iraq, it is the United States that is meddling in its backyard, analysts inside and outside of Iran say." Administration desires to "curtail the influence of Iran's radical Shiite leaders by producing an alternative, moderate center of Shiite Islam" have been "abundantly clear to Iran's clerical rulers" since 2003, and Tehran has "moved quickly to try to prevent the United States from gaining a permanent foothold." The Times explains, "While the United States sees in Iraq a venture that will affect its foreign interests for years to come, Iran sees an occupied neighbor with close religious, cultural, political and economic ties." The US' "failure to secure its position in Iraq has presented Tehran with a rare opportunity to recalibrate the balance of power in a neighborhood that had long been hostile to its aspirations." While Tehran has pursued a nuclear weapons program, "strengthened ties with Syria, built the militia Hezbollah into a state within a state in Lebanon and offered support to" Hamas, the Times says "the cornerstone to its regional plans lies in Baghdad."

"Rogue" Shiite Militias Allegedly Use Iranian Bombs. The Washington Times (2/18, Behn, 88K) reports, "Lethal Iranian bomb technology spotlighted by U.S. officials in Iraq last week is being used by rogue elements of Shi'ite militias that are not under any kind of central command, the U.S. military says." The finding "presented at a briefing in Baghdad last week further confuses an enemy landscape in which death is as likely to come at the hands of government-allied Shi'ite militias as from disgruntled former Ba'athist extremists and their al Qaeda allies."

Syria's Assad In Iran To Discuss Iraq. The AP (2/17) reports Syrian President Bashar Assad "arrived in Iran Saturday to discuss Iraq and other Middle East issues with President Mahmoud Ahmadinajed, state-run television reported. ... This is Assad's fifth visit to Iran since he took office in 2000. Iran and Syria have long been close allies."

More Commentary On Iran's Role In Iraq. The Washington Post (2/18, B06, 690K) editorializes, "The international coalition the administration has painstakingly assembled to pressure Iran seems to be having some effect on the mullahs; it should be maintained and strengthened. U.S. financial pressure and assurances of support to Iran's neighbors also are appropriate. All of these might have a greater chance of working, as we've said before, if the administration also remained open to diplomatic overtures, at least in a regional context. That, and not secret military plans, is the missing component of U.S. strategy right now.

In the Washington Post (2/18, B1, 690K), Brookings fellow Daniel Byman writes, "Iran has been meddling in its neighbors' affairs for a long time, and not just in Iraq. ... Iran could easily be even more aggressive in Iraq. Tehran could provide sophisticated weapons to a wider range of Iraqi groups than it reportedly has so far. Iran's Shiite proxies do at times attack American forces, but their principal targets are Sunni militias. They could kill a lot more Americans than they have." Rather, Iran has a "broader Iraq strategy, which goes well beyond Tehran's desire to undermine U.S. policy. Iranian leaders calculate that they will need formidable proxies should the United States leave, and indeed Iran will face many challenges in Iraq if U.S. forces depart." Byman adds that a US withdrawal could weaken Iran's influence in Iraq in the long term: "Iran's economic and military power is limited, and Iran's theocratic model of governance has little appeal for most Iraqis."

In the New York Times (2/18, WK12, 1.16M), columnist Frank Rich writes, "Maybe the Bush White House can't conduct a war, but no one has ever impugned its ability to lie about its conduct of a war. Now even that well-earned reputation for flawless fictionalizing is coming undone. ... The press and everyone else seems to have forgotten that the administration has twice sounded the same alarms about Iranian weaponry in Iraq that it did last week [in August 2005 and February 2006]." Bush's "real aim is to provoke war with Iran, no matter how overstretched and ill-equipped our armed forces may be for that added burden."

In the Los Angeles Times (2/18, 850K), Nation literary editor Adam Shatz asks, "Might Iran have legitimate interests in what is, after all, its own geographic neighborhood? Could it be that Iran's stake in Iraq is solidly grounded in the same realist principles that drive the behavior of most nations, rather than in 'malign intentions' or a desire to export the Islamic revolution?" Since Iran "sees itself as a protector of Shiite interests in the region" and "wants to ensure that no government in Iraq will threaten it again," it "has, in other words, a strong realist case for being involved in Iraq."

Iraqi Detainee Alleges Two Years Of Abuse By US Military. The New York Times (2/18, Moss, Mekhennet, 1.16M) reports on its front page that when Laith al-Ani was released by the US military after two years of detention, he "was handed a form and asked to place a check mark next to the sentence that best described how he had been treated: 'I didn't go through any abuse during detention,' read the first option, in Arabic. 'I have gone through abuse during detention,' read the second." Al-Ani signed the first option out of fear but now remembers a "sprawling complex of barracks in the southern desert near Kuwait as a bleak place where guards casually used their stun guns and exposed prisoners to long periods of extreme heat and cold; where prisoners fought among themselves and extremist elements tried to radicalize others; and where detainees often responded to the harsh conditions with hunger strikes and, at times, violent protests." The Times continues, "The American detention camps in Iraq now hold 15,500 prisoners, more than at any time since the war began. The camps are filled with people like Mr. Ani who are being held without charge and without access to tribunals where their cases are reviewed, the Times examination published last December found."

US To Admit Many More Iraqi Refugees. The CBS Evening News (2/17, story 3, 2:20, Smith, 7.66M) reported, "Millions of refugees are fleeing the fighting in Iraq. But only a few have reached the United States. Since 2003, the US has admitted just 600, but this week officials said 7,000 will be admitted this year. Most still head for Syria." CBS (Palmer): "Frantic Iraqi refugees newly arrived in Damascus push to register with the United Nations. They need visas, housing, schools for their children. Officials are overwhelmed. Some two million refugees have flooded into crowded Iraqi ghettos here. ... But even as the nightly stream of desperate Iraqis arrives in Syria, at the other end of the bus depot, another bus is loading Iraqi refugees who are even more desperate, because their money has run out. ... and about to take the long ride home, back to the terror and chaos of Iraq."

Marine Sentenced To Eight Years In Hamdaniya Killing. CNN.com (2/17) reports Marine Lance Cpl. Robert Pennington "will serve no more than eight years in prison in connection with the killing of an Iraqi civilian, a Marine Corps spokesman said Saturday." Pennington "was sentenced to 14 years' confinement but will serve no more than eight under a plea agreement." He "pleaded guilty Tuesday to charges regarding the death of Hashim Ibrahim Awad, 52, in Hamdaniya." BBC.com (2/17) also reports the story, calling it "one in a series of inquiries into the alleged abuse or killing of Iraqis by coalition forces."

Letters By Iraqis Show Unfolding National Tragedy. In the Washington Post (2/18, B7, 690K), former Coalition Provisional Authority education advisor John Agresto writes, "I do have letters from an Iraqi friend and his wife. Hasan (sadly, I dare not give his real name) was a translator for the Coalition Provisional Authority when I worked in Baghdad in 2003 and 2004. These brief letters catalogue the deterioration, the chaos and the human tragedy that have become Iraq's lot. ... They surely speak to the need to help those who once so hopefully helped us." Letters from 2004 to 2006 describe increasing danger; Agresto concludes, "I have written Hasan three times now since this last letter [from Christmas Eve, 2006], and I have not heard back."

Influence Of Joint Chiefs Rebounds Under Gates. The Los Angeles Times (2/18, Barnes, 850K) reports that while during the tenure of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, the Joint Chiefs of Staff "were kept out of war planning," under new Secretary Robert Gates, "military officers say the influence of the Joint Chiefs is starting to rebound. Unlike his predecessor, Gates is publicly and privately paying close attention to his uniformed advisors." Gates "has begun meeting with the chiefs once a week."

Walter Reed Said To Overwhelmed, Neglecting Patients. The Washington Post (2/18, Priest, Hull, 690K) reports in a highly critical 5,000-word front page article, "Signs of neglect are everywhere: mouse droppings, belly-up cockroaches, stained carpets, cheap mattresses. This is the world of Building 18, not the kind of place where [Jeremy] Duncan expected to recover when he was evacuated to Walter Reed Army Medical Center from Iraq last February with a broken neck and a shredded left ear, nearly dead from blood loss. ... The common perception of Walter Reed is of a surgical hospital that shines as the crown jewel of military medicine. But 5 1/2 years of sustained combat have transformed the venerable 113-acre institution into something else entirely -- a holding ground for physically and psychologically damaged outpatients. ... On the worst days, soldiers say they feel like they are living a chapter of 'Catch-22.' The wounded manage other wounded. Soldiers dealing with psychological disorders of their own have been put in charge of others at risk of suicide." Walter Reed commander Maj. Gen. George Weightman "said Walter Reed has taken steps over the past year to improve conditions for the outpatient army, which at its peak in summer 2005 numbered nearly 900, not to mention the hundreds of family members who come to care for them." NBC Nightly News (2/17, story 5, 3:25, Priest, 9.87M) ran a report based on the Post story, saying "conditions are far from the best. Peeling wallpaper, mice and cockroaches. The conditions here are said to be symptomatic of a system overwhelmed by more wounded soldiers than the Pentagon expected."

The Los Angeles Times (2/18, Spiegel, 850K) notes the distinction between high-quality inpatient care and questionable outpatient care, saying Walter Reed "is renowned for its inpatient medical care, which has helped keep alive hundreds of soldiers who probably would have died during previous conflicts. Less well-known is the care soldiers receive as outpatients, which has stretched to an average of 10 months -- two months longer than Army guidelines call for -- a period Weightman said can be even more frustrating for wounded soldiers and their families."

Two Army Privates Cope With Iraq Tour. The Washington Post (2/18, A22, Murphy, 690K) reports on two US Army artillerymen who were dropped at a "small, dusty base outside Baqubah in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad, the night before purely by accident." The Post continues, "Nobody has told them what job they'll be doing here, but they don't think there is much artillery in this war, and they expect to be used as infantry. ... U.S. casualties are piling up here now, slowly but steadily. [Staff Sgt. Benjamin] Maldonado said he doesn't see things here getting better, and it's tough to watch new guys go off into the fight. 'It would be one thing if you saw some improvement.'"

Prince Harry To Serve In Iraq. ABC World News (2/17, story 11, :25, Avila, 8.78M), the CBS Evening News (2/17, story 6, :20, Smith, 7.66M), and several wire services report British Prince Harry is expected to deploy to the Basra area and, as ABC said, will "likely take part in reconnaissance missions near the Iranian border area."

Lugar Urges Buildup Of "Civilian Forces." In the Washington Times (2/18, 88K), Sen. Richard Lugar writes, "A strong military response is necessary for the war against terrorism. ... But over-reliance on the military also carries risks. To succeed, we need diplomats who can shape complex bilateral relationships, repair and build alliances and navigate through a labyrinth of foreign languages and cultures. We need foreign aid experts who know how best to promote democratic practices and economic development. And we need communication professionals to get our message across to foreign audiences."

Taliban Offensive Expected In Spring. The Los Angeles Times (2/18, King, 850K) reports article, "In coming weeks, winter will loosen its grip on Afghanistan. Senior NATO generals insist that their troops are well positioned to confront the Taliban offensive that is expected to follow. But some analysts, diplomats and other observers think the Western alliance, and the Afghan government it supports, has failed to use winter's relative lull in fighting to seize the initiative in advance of a new battle with the insurgents. ... But the influx of about 3,000 additional troops is privately described by field commanders as both tardy and considerably smaller than what they had hoped for." Problems for NATO include "the use of crude yet lethal tactics such as suicide and roadside bombings," "the slow pace of reconstruction," and "the dubious efficacy of the Afghan army."

Coalition Helicopter Crashes In Afghanistan. The AP (2/17) reports, "A U.S.-led coalition helicopter crashed Sunday in southeastern Afghanistan after reporting engine failure, a coalition statement said. An official said the helicopter was not shot down." Col. Tom Collins said he was "confident it was not due to enemy action." BBC.com (2/17) reports, "Coalition and Nato forces have lost several helicopters in Afghanistan in the last few years but only one is thought to have been shot down."

NATO Forces Mistakenly Kill Afghan. The AP (2/18) reports, "NATO-led forces in southern Afghanistan shot to death an Afghan civilian mistaken for a suicide bomber because of twine and straps protruding from his jacket, the alliance said Sunday. ... It was the second such civilian shooting Saturday in Kandahar." CNN.com (2/17) also notes that "NATO troops in southern Afghanistan shot and killed a man they mistakenly thought was a suicide bomber."

LATimes Says Bush Focus On Afghanistan "Heartening." The Los Angeles Times (2/18, 850K) editorializes, "It's not quite fair to call Afghanistan the war the administration forgot. But it was heartening last week to hear President Bush give a speech about that other war for the first time in his second term, to acknowledge the growing Taliban threat and to call for a renewed U.S. and NATO commitment. Still, military power alone won't make Afghanistan secure — the country must also undergo substantial economic development. ... Bush will not get the full support and cooperation of NATO allies until he demonstrates that reconstruction is not a second priority to fighting Al Qaeda."

US Military Develops Nonlethal Beam. In the Washington Post (2/18, B2, 690K) Outlook section, Slate writer William Saletan writes, "The U.S. military just invented a weapon that fires a beam of searing pain. ... No one is harmed. The beam's energy waves penetrate just 1/64 of an inch into your body, heating your skin like microwaves. They inflame your nerve endings without burning you. This could be the future of warfare: less bloodshed, more pain." However, the invention "makes pain more essential to military operations -- and easier to inflict. To achieve the desired 'repel effect,' I have to make you suffer. Knowing that your agony will be brief and leave no physical damage makes the weapon easier to fire."

Several Fired US Attorneys Were Investigating GOP Officials. The Washington Post (2/18, A11, Eggen, 690K) reports, "All but one of the U.S. attorneys recently fired by the Justice Department had positive job reviews before they were dismissed, but many ran into political trouble with Washington over issues ranging from immigration to the death penalty, according to prosecutors, congressional aides and others familiar with the cases." The Post adds "it has also become clear that most of the prosecutors were overseeing significant public-corruption investigations at the time they were asked to leave. Four of the probes target Republican politicians or their supporters, prosecutors and other officials said. The emerging details stand in contrast to repeated statements from the Justice Department that six of the Republican-appointed prosecutors were dismissed because of poor performance." Carol S. Lam in San Diego "oversaw the probe that resulted in the guilty plea of then-Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, a Republican. Two others connected to that case, including a former senior CIA official, were indicted two days before Lam left the job on Thursday." Daniel G. Bogden in Nevada and Paul K. Charlton in Arizona "were also in the midst of investigations targeting current or former Republican members of Congress when they were fired."

Griffin Will Not Seek Confirmation As Arkansas US Attorney. The AP (2/18, Gambrell) reports, "An interim U.S. attorney says a 'partisan circus' over his recess appointment makes it impossible for him to receive fair consideration, and he will not seek Senate confirmation to his Arkansas district. … However, Tim Griffin can remain at the post without confirmation under a new provision in the Patriot Act that allow recess appointments to last until the end of a president's term, instead of 120 days. That provision was included in the act's reauthorization last year." The AP continues, "The new rules became fuel for hearings when the Democratic-controlled Congress took power this year, with Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., questioning Griffin's appointment. … 'They should do the right thing and name another interim appointment,' said Michael Teague, a spokesman for Pryor. 'Let's get back to the way the founding fathers saw this process working.'" The AP adds, "Griffin left open whether he would remain in the position until the end of President Bush's term, but he said he has not looked for another job. … 'The upside is I'm here in the job and will remain in the job until such time the White House asks me to move on,' Griffin said Friday."

More Commentary. The Baltimore Sun (2/18) editorializes, "Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty just couldn't tell a lie. So when pressed during Senate hearings on the unceremonious firing of seven U.S. attorneys, Mr. McNulty had to concede that politics did play a role in dumping the chief federal prosecutor in Little Rock, Ark. The replacement, J. Timothy Griffin, was an FOK - friend of Karl. That's Karl Rove, the president's top political adviser and key Republican strategist. … You can't get any more political than that." The Sun continues, With Arkansas Sen. Mark Pryor raising serious questions about the appointment, Mr. Griffin wisely withdrew his name for permanent consideration. … Mr. McNulty and his boss at the Justice Department, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, should stop conning the American people. Their explanation for the firings - that they were 'performance-related' - is pure poppycock. Congress should move swiftly to repeal an aspect of the Patriot Act that gives the attorney general the power to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for an indefinite period of time, which could result in someone serving in this powerful post without congressional consent. Mr. Gonzales doesn't deserve this power. … His recent firings show what matters to Mr. Gonzales, and it isn't performance:" The Sun concludes, "U.S. attorneys have enormous power. By politicizing the appointments, the Bush administration has diminished their ability to fairly and judiciously carry out their responsibility."

New Minnesota US Attorney Profiled. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (2/18, Tomson) reports, "Rachel Paulose is a U.S. attorney who is comfortable quoting Bible verses. She believes it is a blessing to live in a country where a person can take on crime, terror and corruption. … The daughter of immigrants who support her every move, she works herself hard, shorts herself on sleep and sacrifices her social life in the pursuit of justice." The Pioneer-Press continues, "At 33, she's the youngest current U.S. attorney and the first woman to serve in the position in Minnesota. … She manages some 50 assistant U.S. attorneys in an office that examines and seeks to successfully prosecute the most repulsive and harmful of crimes. … She points with pride to the more-than-20-year prison sentences obtained by her office in three child pornography cases during the past six months and then, referring to predators as yet uncaught, she promises: 'We're going to find you, hold you, and you're going to do a long time in federal prison.' … 'The crimes have become more depraved, more heinous, and the victims are subjected to particularly sadistic forms of abuse that the general public would find unimaginable,' she says. 'The reality is that good people don't know about this because they're not online looking.'" The Pioneer Press adds, "In just 10 years, Paulose has compiled an impressive record. After graduating from Yale Law School, she snagged a sought-after position in Minneapolis as a law clerk to James Loken, chief judge of the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. She worked for four years in private practice for the Dorsey & Whitney law firm and served in the U.S. Justice Department as an Attorney General's Honors Program trial attorney for the civil rights division. … She also prosecuted criminal and civil cases as an assistant U.S. attorney for Minnesota; served as senior counsel to Acting Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, and as the Justice Department's special counsel for health care fraud. … Nevertheless, her appointment a year ago as U.S. attorney for the District of Minnesota was headline news and raised a few eyebrows. … The appointment departed from normal practice. For the first time in decades, an interim U.S. attorney was sent directly from the Department of Justice to fill the job in Minnesota. Traditionally, interim appointees have come from within the Minnesota office, promoted either from first assistant U.S. attorney or chief of the criminal division."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Woman Jailed For Throwing Soft Drink On Highway. The Washington Post (2/18, A1, Vargas) reports, "To the locals, it's the 'McMissile' case. … And like the name, the details of it spill forth like a bad joke: A woman is driving north on Interstate 95. Three kids squirm in the back seat, and her sister, six months pregnant and having early contractions, sits in the front. The stress starts to simmer. Traffic slows, then crawls, then creeps. More stress. A car cuts in front of her, then scoots away. A short time later, it darts in again. She can no longer take it. She veers onto the shoulder and speeds up. Wham! She tosses a large McDonald's cup filled with ice into the other car." The Post continues, "No one was injured, but the cup launcher, Jessica Hall, 25, of Jacksonville, N.C., was charged and convicted by a Stafford County jury of maliciously throwing a missile into an occupied vehicle, a felony in Virginia. The instructions given to the jury said that 'any physical object can be considered a missile. A missile can be propelled by any force, including throwing.' … Hall, a mother of three young children whose husband is serving his third tour in Iraq, has spent more than a month in jail." The Post adds, "The jury sentenced her to two years in prison, the minimum, and a judge will formally impose a sentence Wednesday. Under state law, the judge can only decrease the jury's sentence."

Charges Against PG County School Official Raise Questions About Yonkers Tenure. The New York Journal News (2/18, Wilson) reports, "Former schools chief Andre Hornsby burst on the scene in Yonkers nine years ago with a cadre of Texas educators, fresh from helping transform the Houston school system. He came east to boost test scores and bridge the digital divide in city schools." The News continues, "With the aid of Cynthia Joffrion, the Texas technology maven who joined him in Yonkers, new computers flooded into classrooms while Hornsby's leadership helped raise test scores. Throughout his stormy 23-month tenure, however, Hornsby was dogged with questions about his dealings with technology vendors." The News adds, "It turns out that Joffrion, assistant superintendent for technology support services under Hornsby, was among his accusers, according to an FBI affidavit obtained by The Journal News. Joffrion in 1999 told authorities that Hornsby had ordered Yonkers employees to send new computers to his relatives. But then-Westchester District Attorney Jeanine Pirro's investigation of those allegations never led to charges after Hornsby caught wind of the probe. … In hindsight, Hornsby's Yonkers troubles seemed to presage what was to come following his hiring in 2003 as chief executive officer of the school system in Prince George's County, Md., the nation's 18th largest district. It borders Washington and has more than 130,000 students and a budget exceeding $1 billion. Hornsby now awaits trial on a 16-count federal indictment arising from a scheme in which prosecutors say he awarded lucrative technology contracts that benefited himself and close associates."

Fitzgerald Faulted For Focusing Solely On Libby. In a 2,200-word op-ed for the Washington Post (2/18, B1, 690K) Victoria Toensing, a deputy assistant attorney general in the Reagan administration, writes, "Could someone please explain to me why Scooter Libby is the only person on trial in the Valerie Plame leak investigation? … If we accept" Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald's "low threshold for bringing a criminal case, then why stop at Libby? This investigation has enough questionable motives and shadowy half-truths and flawed recollections to fill a court docket for months. So here are my own personal bills of indictment…" Toensing goes on to criticize several individuals and agencies involved in the Plame leak, including former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer whose testimony "about conversations differs from reporters' testimony, just as Libby's does."

Drug Firms Charged With Medicaid Fraud. The Trenton Times (NJ) (2/18, Cohen) reports, "The nation's big drugmakers have been systematically overcharging the Medicaid health-care program for the poor, reaping billions of dollars in illegal windfalls at the expense of the taxpayers, according to federal officials, members of Congress and a watchdog group." The Times continues, "Drugmakers are required by law to provide Medicaid with the same discounts they offer to big managed-care plans and hospital chains, but they have been disguis ing those prices, Ronald Tenpas, a U.S. associate deputy attorney general, told the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform earlier this month. … 'We are not seeing isolated instances of misconduct, but repeated practices within the industry that have resulted in significant loses to federal health-care programs,' he said." The Times adds, "The federal and state governments have had some success in recapturing money from the drug makers: During the last six years, government bodies have recouped about $3.9 billion in civil damages and criminal penalties stemming from 16 legal settlements involving Medicaid. … The settlements involve some of the biggest names in the industry, including Pfizer, Schering-Plough, GlaxoSmithKline, AstraZeneca and Bayer. Those cases dealt with overcharging the government for cancer, asthma, cholesterol, allergy and seizure medications. .. .But the scope of the problem could be much bigger. There are 150 pending federal investigations centering on Medicaid and two other government health-care programs that could find billions of dollars more in pharmaceutical company fraud."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

More Than 100 Inmates Have Died At Texas Jail In Past Six Years. The Houston Chronicle (2/18, McVicker) reports, "A Houston Chronicle review of state and county records reveals that from January 2001 through December 2006, at least 101 inmates — an average of about 17 a year — have died while in the custody of the Harris County Jail. In 2006 alone, after three consecutive years of failing to be in compliance with state standards, the jail recorded 22 in-custody deaths." The Chronicle continues, "At the time of their deaths, at least 72 of the inmates — more than 70 percent — were awaiting court hearings and had yet to be convicted of the crimes that led to their incarceration." The Chronicle adds, "Records and interviews show that almost one-third of the deaths involve questions of inadequate responses from guards and staff, failure by jail officials to provide inmates with essential medical and psychiatric care and medications, unsanitary conditions, and two allegations of physical abuse by guards. … In at least 13 cases, relatives or documents raise questions over whether inmates received needed medications prior to their deaths. Additionally, 11 of the deaths involve infections and illnesses suggesting sanitation problems. In 10 other cases, death reports suggest possible neglect, as in the Mack case." The Chronicle notes, "None of the records reviewed, however, concludes that jail staff contributed directly to the 101 deaths since 2001. During the same period, the Dallas County jail recorded 70 deaths. … Harris County Sheriff Tommy Thomas declined the Chronicle's request for an interview. He did reply to written questions, though he would not comment on specific cases, citing confidentiality laws."

Maryland AG Pushes Cold-Case Bill. The Baltimore Sun (2/18, Stiehm) reports, "Maryland's attorney general is exploring the creation of a cold-case squad to investigate unsolved homicides, with an emphasis on racial crimes dating back to the civil rights era. … 'Having a civil rights component to this office affords us the opportunity to look into current and past civil rights violations,' said Douglas F. Gansler, who took office last month and has announced plans to increase prosecutions of environmental violators and gang members." The Sun continues, "Gansler met Friday with top aides to discuss the idea of the new squad. The investigative unit would examine unsolved homicides from police files around the state, using modern forensic and DNA techniques, he said. … Compared to states in the Deep South, Maryland has fewer outstanding civil rights cases. Gansler said a survey is needed to count feasible cold cases with civil rights implications. … 'If a lot of these people are still alive, witnesses and perpetrators, and if we have the ability to pursue them, the government has the onus to do so,' Gansler said." The Sun adds, "The investigations would include race-based homicides and cases of civil rights workers who might have been killed because they were identified with the movement. The unit's unsolved cases could also encompass desecrations of synagogues or other houses of worship. … A handful of states have taken similar steps in establishing cold-case or civil rights divisions, including Florida. Alabama intends to add a cold-case unit this year that looks into civil rights crimes and review the fatal shooting in 1965 of a young black man, Jimmy Lee Jackson, that involved state troopers. … A bill before Congress, with co-sponsors including Rep. John Lewis of Georgia and Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, both Democrats, would require the Justice Department and the FBI to create cold-case units dedicated to civil rights."

Legends Surrounding Till Case Examined. The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (2/18, Mitchell) reports, "Few homicide cases in this nation's history have been shrouded by as much legend as the 1955 killing of Emmett Till. … Now, more than a half century after the 14-year-old's slaying, prosecutors are preparing to present the case to a Leflore County grand jury, separating fact from fiction, what's known from what may never be known. … 'Because of its importance to the civil rights movement, it has this mythic quality like the Kennedy assassination,' said David Beito, a University of Alabama professor who's an expert in the Till case. 'You get all sorts of conspiracies.'" The Clarion-Ledger continues, "Some of those legends took root not long after the black youth from Chicago was abducted, beaten and shot to death after he reportedly wolf-whistled at Carolyn Bryant at a grocery store in Money. Some have sprung up since. … Less than a month after Till's Aug. 28, 1955, slaying, an all-white jury acquitted her then-husband, Roy, and his half-brother, J.W. Milam - only to see them confess their guilt months later to Look magazine. The half-brothers have since died." The Clarion-Ledger adds, "In 2004, the Justice Department opened an investigation into Till's killing. A grand jury that will be impaneled in March is expected to take up the case. … The FBI's more than 8,000-page report on the Till case sheds new light on the legends surrounding the killing, and in some cases, contradicts them."

Seed Rivals Worried About Monsanto Deal. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (2/18, Contact) reports, "Six months after Monsanto Co. agreed to pay $1.5 billion for Delta and Pine Land -- the largest cottonseed company in the country -- the pot bubbles with intrigue." The Appeal continues, "Producers don't seem as worried as much as Monsanto rivals Switzerland-based Syngenta AG and Pioneer Hi-Bred International Inc., owned by DuPont. … Both have licensing agreements with D&PL and don't relish the idea of having to cooperate with Monsanto. … But what is really at stake is this: Monsanto owns more transgenetic cotton traits than any company in the world. If it also owns the largest cottonseed company, it would control the most cotton varieties, transgenes and -- in this case -- the herbicide

Roundup, central to many recent biotech advances in agriculture. … 'Farmers are not very happy unless they have stock in Monsanto,' said Bill Meredith, longtime U.S. Department of Agriculture cotton breeder in Stoneville, Miss. 'They fear they will have to pay more to get a product not as good as what they've got.'" The Appeal notes, "The Department of Justice was expected to rule on the antitrust issue by Wednesday. Now, it looks like the deal will close by spring. … If the merger goes through, Monsanto will control 85 percent of the mainstream bloodlines of cotton and every kind of cotton planted in the Mid-South. … 'The proposed Monsanto acquisition of Delta & Pine Land is clearly anti-competitive,' said Doyle Karr, DuPont spokesman. 'We have serious concerns about the impact it would have on farmers, the agricultural industry and ultimately consumers.' … While Syngenta says it is not engaged in a grass-roots effort to defeat the sale, it has told the Justice Department and others that it doesn't 'believe it's in the best interest of the growers,' said Anne Burt, spokeswoman."

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Urged To Make ANWR The US Strategic Petroleum Reserve. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/18, B7, 690K) Gal Luft, executive director of the Institute for the Analysis of Global Security, writes, "In his State of the Union address last month, President Bush announced his intention to expand the Strategic Petroleum Reserve as a way to strengthen America's energy security. … In an increasingly unstable world, the Strategic Petroleum Reserve is a much-needed insurance policy. But the way the president chose to expand it is ill-considered." Luft continues, "The administration should consider a radically different and much cheaper approach to boosting our security: make ANWR our strategic reserve. … Reframing the issue to cast the refuge as an emergency stockpile rather than a source of production might well change the politics."

US Urged To Help Cities Track Illegal Gun Sales. The Las Vegas Sun (2/18) editorializes, "Earlier this month we wrote in support of an effort by the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department to track the origin of guns used in crimes. The department had traced several such weapons to a gun shop in Sparks, just outside of Reno. … Such efforts are undertaken to determine whether gun shops are permitting 'straw purchases' - those made with the intent of giving or selling the guns to criminals. Support for these investigations comes from the Mayors Against Illegal Guns Coalition, which counts 150 U.S. mayors in its membership, including Geno Martini of Sparks." The Sun continues, "A co-founder of the group, New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg, last year sent police investigators into many of his city's gun shops. As the requirement for gun shop operators to be vigilant against straw purchases comes under federal law, all Bloomberg could do was press civil suits against those found to be in violation. … He hoped the Justice Department would take it from there, and file criminal charges where the evidence was strongest. But not only did the Justice Department refuse to bring charges, it also warned Bloomberg about "potential legal liabilities" the city could face if it continued such investigations." The Sun concludes, "Straw purchases are a mounting problem in communities across the country. The federal government should assist cities as they try to protect their citizens from the danger presented by criminals who can easily obtain guns from seemingly legitimate purchasers."

IMMIGRATION:

NAFTA's Failure To Curtail Illegal Immigration Examined. In a "Week in review" piece for the New York Times (2/18, WK4, 1.16M) Louis Uchitelle writes, "The North American Free Trade Agreement, enacted by Congress 14 years ago, held out an alluring promise: the agreement would reduce illegal immigration from Mexico. Mexicans, the argument went, would enjoy the prosperity and employment that the trade agreement would undoubtedly generate — and not feel the need to cross the border into the United States. But today the number of illegal migrants has only continued to rise. Why didn't Nafta curb this immigration? … A major factor lies in the assumptions made in drafting the trade agreement, assumptions about the way governments would behave (that is, rationally) and the way markets would respond (rationally, as well). Neither happened, yet Nafta remains the model for trade agreements with developing Latin countries, including the Central American Free Trade Agreement."

Georgia Legislators Planning Further Restrictions On Illegals. The Washington Times/AP (2/18) reports Georgia lawmakers "have been working around the edges to crack down again on aliens in the country illegally. Georgia made international headlines last spring when it passed some of the toughest laws in the U.S. targeting illegal aliens within its borders. Those laws included provisions to sanction employers who knowingly hire illegal aliens and deny some state services -- such as nonemergency medical care and unemployment checks -- to adults who can't verify that they're in the country legally. A flurry of smaller proposals has been moving through the state legislature this year, including several that would make it tougher for illegal aliens to drive in Georgia."

NYTimes Criticizes Congressional Border Security Measures. The New York Times (2/18, WK11, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "The country has summoned great energy to confront the immigration problem, but most of it has been misplaced, crudely and unevenly applied. It seeks not to solve the conundrum of a broken immigration system, but to subdue, in a million ways, the vulnerable men and women who are part of it. Government at all levels is working to keep unwanted immigrants in their place — on the other side of the border, in detention or in fear, toiling silently in the underground economy without recourse to the laws and protections the native-born expect. … What little the last Congress did about immigration was focused on appeasing hard-line conservatives by appearing to seal the border. President Bush's new budget continues that approach, seeking 3,000 more Border Patrol officers and another $1 billion for a 700-mile fence, adding to the billions spent to militarize the border since the 1990s. That still isn't enough to build the fence and it hasn't controlled the illegal flow; you need more visas and better workplace enforcement to do that."

Rep. Poe Raises Profile Of Border Agents' Prosecution. The Houston Chronicle (2/18, Mittelstadt) reports, "Flip on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight show these days and chances are pretty good you'll see Texas Congressman Ted Poe lamenting the fate of two ex-Border Patrol agents imprisoned for shooting a Mexican drug trafficker." The Chronicle continues, "For months, the Republican from Humble has relentlessly championed the agents' case on cable-TV shows and behind the scenes, helping foment public outrage directed at the White House and President Bush's appointees in the Justice and Homeland Security departments. … Poe, who spent 22 years as a hard-nosed criminal court judge in Houston and eight years before that as a Harris County prosecutor, seems an unlikely choice to be carrying the banner for two convicts. … 'It surprises some that I am seen to be on the side of the defendants,' Poe acknowledged in an interview. … But the lawmaker, in his second term, said his stance stems directly from his experiences on the bench and at the prosecution table. … 'I know the power of the prosecution and how powerful they are,' said Poe, who argues that the Justice Department went to extraordinary lengths to prosecute ex-agents Jose Compean and Ignacio Ramos for wounding the drug trafficker in a 2005 border altercation." The Chronicle adds, "Though the two men were duly convicted in a jury trial in El Paso, Poe contends the game was rigged against the defendants because of 'back-room deals' given by the prosecution to get the trafficker and other involved Border Patrol agents to testify. He also questions whether information was withheld from the jury. … And Poe is uneasy about what he views as Mexican interference into the case, citing letters written by Mexican consular officials seeking prosecution."

TAX:

Senate Legislation Would Crack Down On Hedge Fund Use Of Tax Havens. The Washington Post/Bloomberg (2/18, A10, Drajem, Donmoyer) reports Sens. Carl Levin, Barack Obama and Norm Coleman "proposed legislation that would target what they say is $100 billion a year in tax revenue lost each year because of overseas tax havens, in part by forcing hedge funds to track their foreign investors. The measure would impose tougher requirements on U.S. taxpayers using offshore secrecy jurisdictions, give the U.S. Treasury the authority to take action against foreign jurisdictions that impede tax enforcement, stiffen penalties against abusers and close offshore trust loopholes," according to a summary of the bill released by Levin.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Uses Radio Address To Push Health Insurance Proposal. The New York Times (2/18, A22, 1.16M) reports that in his weekly radio address President Bush "urged Congress…to create a tax break that would help people buy private health insurance outside the workplace. Repeating points made in his State of the Union address, Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0133219

Bush said that he wanted to create a standard tax deduction for health insurance and that he would 'continue to reach across party lines to enact common-sense health care reforms.' … Mr. Bush said he was pleased to receive a letter this week from 10 senators — 5 Democrats and 5 Republicans — who wanted to work with him on the nation's health care system."

Schwarzenegger Health Insurance Plan Could Hurt Middle Class Families. The Los Angeles Times (2/18, A1, Rau, 850K) reports that although Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's health insurance plan is meant to help those who cannot afford their own health insurance, "compelling everyone to obtain insurance -- the linchpin of his plan -- may not work for many Californians in need of aid, according to health policy experts. Under the governor's plan, nearly 1 million middle-class people would be caught in a tough bind, those experts say: They earn too much to qualify for the insurance subsidies Schwarzenegger wants the state to provide but not enough to afford comprehensive coverage. Only those whose yearly earnings are less than 250% of the federal poverty level -- about $25,525 for individuals and $51,625 for families of four -- would qualify for the proposed subsidies."

New Democratic Majorities' "Iron-Fisted Tactics" Draw GOP Complaints. The Washington Post (2/18, A4, Layton, 690K) reports that though Democrats "pledged to bring courtesy to the Capitol when they assumed control of Congress," they have "used its muscle to force through its agenda in the House and sideline Republicans. And after an initial burst of lawmaking, the Democratic juggernaut has kept on rolling. Of nine major bills passed by the House since the 110th Congress began, Republicans have been allowed to make amendments to just one, a measure directing federal research into additives to biofuels. … Last week, the strong-arming continued during the most important debate the Congress has faced yet -- the discussion about the Iraq war. Democrats initially said they would allow Republicans to propose one alternative to the resolution denouncing a troop buildup but, days later, they thought better of it." The post adds that Republican leaders "have been complaining daily about being pushed to the margins," however "significant numbers of House Republicans have voted along with Democrats on the legislation passed so far -- a fact that somewhat mutes criticism about iron-fisted tactics."

Liberals' Resurgence Attributed By Some To "Conservative Slump." In a "Week in Review" piece for the New York Times (2/18, WK1, 1.16M), Mark Leibovich writes, "These are balmy days on the American left — genuine, uncharacteristic sunniness unpolluted by some fluky political climate change. There is even talk of a — stutter, clear-throat, perish-thought — liberal resurgence. … The chicken-egg riddle is how much this alleged 'liberal moment' bespeaks genuine momentum for the left and how much stems from anti-Bush, antiwar, anti-Republican fervor. In other words, liberal moment or conservative slump?"

Moles Removed From Bush's Face Were Benign. ABC World News (2/17, story 5, :10, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "The White House said late today that two moles removed from President Bush's face yesterday were not cancerous. Tests came back on firming both of the moles on the President's left temple were benign. Mr. Bush has had several lesions removed before, growths his doctors link to sun exposure." CNN.com (2/17) reports White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said Bush "has a 1-inch scab on his left temple that is expected to heal in a week to 10 days."

GAO Faults Administration's Electronic Medical Records Privacy Strategy. The New York Times (2/18, A22, Pear, 1.16M) reports that the GAO has found the "Bush administration has no clear strategy to protect the privacy of patients as it promotes the use of electronic medical records throughout the nation's health care system." A GAO report "said the administration had a jumble of studies and vague policy statements but no overall strategy to ensure that privacy protections would be built into computer networks linking insurers, doctors, hospitals and other health care providers." The Times notes that President Bush "has repeatedly called for the creation of such networks, through which health care providers could share information on patients. … In response to the president's plea, federal officials have developed elaborate plans for what they describe as 'a nationwide health information network,'" but the GAO "said the administration had taken only rudimentary steps to safeguard sensitive personal data that would be exchanged over the network."

Latino Legislative Caucuses Said To Have "Outlived Their Usefulness." Los Angeles Times (2/18, 850K) columnist Gregory Rodriguez writes, "You go, Loretta Sanchez. Just keep walking away from that Congressional Hispanic Caucus. No, not just because of the nasty name caucus chief Rep. Joe Baca allegedly called you. B ut because you'll be undermining a political practice that will increasingly hurt Mexican American statewide candidates in the most politically powerful states in the nation. … The moment provides an opportunity to ponder whether Latino legislative caucuses haven't outlived their usefulness. I say it's time to abolish them. It's not because I stand in principled opposition to the idea of ethnic solidarity. It's just that both the demographic calculus and the political rationale that gave rise to Latino caucuses have disappeared. And as Latinos move toward becoming the largest ethnic group in the two most populous states, such caucuses become a political liability to statewide candidates vying to represent all constituencies."

DOJ_NMG_0133220

OTHER NEWS:

Republican Presidential Hopefuls Vie For Conservatives' Support. Presidential candidates from both parties are on the campaign trail this weekend, but as the CBS Evening News (2/17, story 4, 2:45, Smith, 7.66M) reported, "all the Republican candidates are wooing one particularly prized pool of voters." CBS (Pinkston) reported that a new CBS News poll gives Rudy Giuliani a "wide lead" in a head-to-head matchup with Sen. John McCain, with Republicans favoring Giuliani 50%-21%, more than "a two-to-one margin. Most surprising, Giuliani also solidly beats McCain among conservatives." Republican pollster David Winston: "There's this really strong image of Giuliani in the first 24 hours, in terms of 9/11." Pinkston: "Winston thinks Giuliani's performance in that crisis may overcome conservative opposition to his moderate positions on issues such as gun control and abortion. … But Giuliani shouldn't count on Tony Perkins' support. He heads the Family Research Council, a conservative Christian group." Perkins: "There are certain threshold issues of being pro-life, and supporting the sanctity of human life, then you're not going to get the support of social conservatives." Pinkston: "Conservatives also have their doubts about McCain for his moderate positions on immigration and gun control. And they question" Mitt Romney's "commitment to the anti-abortion cause. While most of the media spotlight on the GOP has focused on McCain, Giuliani, and Romney, there's another name from the Republican Party's glory days, who might get even more support from social conservatives: former House Speaker Newt Gingrich. Gingrich says it's too early to announce, but when his name is added to polls, he immediately becomes a strong contender."

Chait Says Giuliani Winning "Cult Following" Among Conservatives. In his Los Angeles Times (2/18, 850K) column, Jonathan Chait writes that "Giuliani's presidential campaign is starting to win a cult following among conservatives. It's not his position on domestic policy that's doing it -- he has nothing to say about that. Lord knows it's not his social issue positions, which even his strongest backers acknowledge are his political weak point. No, he has somehow built a record as a foreign policy guru despite having no experience beyond the municipal level. … He has a tough guy persona. He expresses extremely strong disapproval for enemies of the United States. (For instance, Giuliani has bragged about asking President Bush to let him personally execute Osama bin Laden.) All this makes Republicans swoon."

Acquaintances Reflect On Romney. In the second installment of its Outlook series on how "classmates, colleagues and competitors from the past" view the presidential candidates, the Washington Post (2/18, B1, 690K) runs a series of comments from those who know and have known Romney.

McCain Faces Iraq Questions During First Campaign Trip To Iowa. ABC World News (2/17, story 4, :10, Avila, 8.78M) reported Sen. John McCain "was on the campaign trial in Iowa, where he called the resolution denouncing the troop increase insulting to the public and the soldiers. This is McCain's first visit to Iowa since forming a presidential exploratory committee."

The Washington Post (2/18, A8, Balz, 690K) reports the Iraq war "followed" McCain to Iowa, where he "faced a series of skeptical questions about the lack of progress in the conflict and whether he or anyone has a plan for success. It became clear from the opening minutes of his first meeting of the day just how much the presidential aspirations of the senator, who is one of the leading advocates of President Bush's troop-increase policy, may be tied to events in Iraq." Throughout the hour-long town hall meeting, McCain "walked a line between strong advocacy for the troop buildup as the best chance to avoid a bloodletting in Iraq and defensiveness over the lack of progress and the growing impatience on the part of the public over what he said has been a badly mismanaged war effort dating back years." McCain said, "I know how tough it is for the American people. I know how frustrated Americans are. I know how saddened we are when we lose our most precious treasure. I understand your frustration. But I also want to tell you that I could not be honest with you without telling you that I believe if we fail, the consequences of failure are catastrophic and there would be genocide and chaos."

The New York Times (2/18, A30, Nagourney, 1.16M) said McCain began "testing one of the biggest questions so far of the presidential campaign: Can he win as an all-out supporter of the war in Iraq?" He "attacked Senate Democrats for what he called 'a political stunt' in trying to join the House in passing a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send more troops to Baghdad," but also "belittled the White House for falsely raising hopes by asserting early American successes in the war."

South Carolina Columnist Says Brownback Will Become "Major Figure." In South Carolina's The State (2/18), Lee Bandy writes that when, "three weeks ago, an estimated 350 Republican Party activists attended a luncheon in Columbia for GOP presidential hopeful Sam Brownback," many came "out of curiosity." But he "didn't disappoint his audience, made up mostly of religious conservatives. Members punctuated the air with shouts of 'amen' and 'praise the Lord.' It sounded more like a revival service than a political gathering. Many conservatives and religious leaders view Brownback as a serious candidate" for the presidency, and there is "little doubt he will become a major figure in U.S. public life and an increasingly critical player in its governing coalitions."

Clinton Says She Would Rather Lose Support Than Make False Apology On Iraq. The New York Times (2/18, A30, Healy, 1.16M) reports that "antiwar anger" at Sen. Hillary Clinton "has festered, and yesterday morning Mrs. Clinton rolled out a new response to those demanding contrition" on her 2002 Iraq war authorization vote. Clinton "said she was willing to lose support from voters rather than make an apology she did not believe in. 'If the most important thing to any of you is choosing someone who did not cast that vote or has said his vote was a mistake, then there are others to choose from,' Mrs. Clinton told an audience in Dover, N.H., in a veiled reference" to John Edwards and Sen. Barack Obama. Clinton's "decision not to apologize is regarded so seriously within her campaign that some advisers believe it will be remembered as a turning point in the race: either ultimately galvanizing voters against her (if she loses the nomination), or highlighting her resolve and her willingness to buck Democratic conventional wisdom (if she wins). At the same time, the level of Democratic anger has surprised some of her allies and advisers, and her campaign is worried about how long it will last and how much damage it might cause her."

"Old Enemies" On The Right Mobilize Against Clinton. The Los Angeles Times (2/18, Braun, 850K) reports on its front page that "old enemies" of Clinton "are out in force. Just weeks after she joined the Democratic Party's flock of presidential contenders, Clinton is being targeted by conservative and Republican-allied activists intent on derailing her campaign before the start of next year's primaries. They have surfaced with a flurry of planned projects: a Michael Moore-style documentary film, book-length exposes, and websites such as StopHerNow.com and StopHillaryPAC.com. Conservative admirers of the Swift Vets and POWs for Truth media blitz that helped torpedo Democratic Sen. John F. Kerry's presidential candidacy in 2004 are now agitating to 'Swift-boat' Clinton." The Times says the "emerging moves" against Clinton "reflect the accelerated pace of the 2008 race and conservatives' growing conviction that she poses a formidable threat that requires fast and early footwork."

Reid's Son Joins Clinton Team. The Washington Post (2/18, A2, Cillizza, Murray, 690K) reports that while Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "has pledged not to pick among his many friends" running for the presidential nomination, Clinton has "found the next-best thing -- signing his eldest son, Rory, as both the chair of her campaign in the Silver State and an adviser on Western issues. Rory Reid currently serves as the chairman of the Clark County Commission -- that's Las Vegas's county -- and is a past chairman of the Nevada state party."

Obama Hits South Carolina And Virginia, Collecting Kaine Endorsement. The Washington Post (2/18, A9, Shear, 690K) reports Sen. Barack Obama "took his presidential campaign to the heart of the Deep South for the first time this weekend, tailoring his campaign message to associate himself with the civil rights movement. With a Kenyan father who was not descended from African slaves, Obama is unlike Southern black candidates, steeped in the slavery and civil rights struggles that tore at the region for more than a century. Neither is he like the white politicians, whose skin color automatically disqualifies them from the black experience. And so, on his maiden presidential visit to South Carolina and Virginia, Obama was greeted with not only enthusiasm but also a bit of curiosity." After addressing a "primarily black crowd of about 2,000" at historically black Claflin University in Orangeburg, South Carolina, "Obama and his wife, Michelle, traveled to Richmond and accepted the endorsement of Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine." Obama "then continued a busy day by addressing more than 4,000 Democratic activists at the state party's annual Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner."

The Washington Times (2/18, McLaughlin, 88K) says Kaine said in his endorsement, "I am very happy to say it is a very simple decision for me in terms of what I think is important in my assessment of where the nation is to endorse Sen. Barack Obama as our nation's next president." Kaine said his "early endorsement was a sign of his enthusiasm for Mr. Obama. His endorsement of the first-term senator made Mr. Kaine the first governor to publicly endorse any presidential candidate."

Obama Said To Represent Growing Population Of African Immigrants. In a Los Angeles Times (2/18, 850K) op-ed, University of California Santa Cruz associate professor of literature Louis Chude-Sokei writes that while "not quite able to pass for white," Obama "has been able to pass for African American. He is biracial, but not white; black, but not African American; American but not African. What has entranced the country more than his somewhat vague policies is Obama's challenge to conventional racial and cultural categories. … But there is a third side to Obama -- and also to the politics of racial passing in America. The population of African immigrants" in the US "is rapidly growing."

Edwards Addresses Las Vegas Union Group. The AP (2/17, Nakashima) reports John Edwards "took his plan for universal health care to union-strong Las Vegas on Saturday, visiting the local branch of the electrical workers labor group to which his brother belongs." It was Edwards' ninth visit to the state since the 2004 election, "including five times last year before swinging by again in December to announce he was running for president."

Richardson Vows To Exit Iraq, Shut Down Guantanamo Bay. The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/18, Rayno) reports, "On his second day in office, Democratic Presidential candidate Bill Richardson said yesterday he would shut down Guantanamo Bay detention camp for suspected terrorists. 'The first day I would get us out of Iraq,' the New Mexico governor said, adding he would also close Abu Grab prison where Iraqi prisoners were tortured." Addressing the Concord City Democrats, Richardson said that Abu Ghraib "is 'one of the reasons this country has so many problems in the Muslim world.'" Richardson "joked about his low profile compared to other Democratic hopefuls, but seriously called for all Democratic candidates to pledge not to attack each other. He touted his experience both in foreign policy and at home as governor. Speaking of the current administration's foreign policy problems, Richardson said 'We can't afford to have a President without foreign policy training.'"

Dodd Stresses Experience In South Carolina Stop. South Carolina's The State (2/18, Michals) reports Sen. Christopher Dodd "got a warm response Saturday morning from S.C. Democrats when he brought up the issues of predatory lending, the war in Iraq and public vs. private education. 'People are expressing that sense of urgency about what we need to do at home and abroad,' Dodd said during a Columbia stop in his 2008 presidential campaign. 'I wanted to get out and be part of this debate.' … Dodd's rousing speech -- as local Democrats drank coffee and dined on grits, eggs and bacon -- often circled back to his 30 years of experience as a lawmaker. 'We've done six years of on-the-job training' with President Bush, Dodd said."

Will Sees Clinton, Edwards "Stumbling" As Giuliani Soars. In his Washington Post (2/18, B7, 690K) column, George Will writes, "Two Democratic presidential candidates with national campaign experience are stumbling. A Republican candidate who has run only municipal campaigns is confounding expectations, calling into question some assumptions about Republican voters. John Edwards has learned -- surely he did not know it when they were hired -- that two women employed by his campaign have Internet trails of vitriolic anti-Christian, and especially anti-Catholic, rants." And Sen. Hillary Clinton, "who says that a Democratic president would properly withdraw U.S. forces," is "not voting for a policy she considers proper." Meanwhile, predictions that support for Rudy Giuliani "will evaporate" among Republicans as more of his background becomes known is "becoming self-refuting." The "insistent reiteration of it during Giuliani's coast-to-coast campaigning is telling activist Republicans…the facts about Giuliani. And so far those facts are not causing a recoil from him."

States Continue Primary Calendar Maneuvering. Several reports focus on possible changes to the primary calendar. In California, the San Francisco Chronicle (2/18, Marinucci, 384K) runs a front-page story headlined "Early Primary -- Too Much Too Soon?" The Chronicle says Democrat Tom Vilsack warns that a February primary in the most-populous state "would not substitute for the lunch counters in Iowa, the house parties in New Hampshire and the barbecues in South Carolina where presidential nominations are really decided." The "intensive and personal vetting of candidates that has developed for generations in states such as Iowa and New Hampshire, Vilsack said, is one reason why mega-media states such as California, New Jersey and Illinois may not get the clout they hope for by moving up in the presidential primary schedule." However, the California Senate "handily passed legislation last week to move California's presidential primary from June 2008 to Feb. 5, 2008," and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is expected to back it. The Los Angeles Times (2/18, Barabak, 850K) runs a question-and-answer piece on the possible move.

The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/18, Tuohy) looks at Nevada's jump to the early stages of the calendar, saying Democratic candidates "will be on unfamiliar political ground when they arrive" in the State Wednesday "for their first joint forum of the 2008 campaign. For the first time, the state that popularized quickie marriages, built a global reputation for its casinos and gave free range to places like the Bunny Ranch plans a caucus" for January 19, "between the Iowa caucuses and New Hampshire's leadoff" primary. Nevada state archivist Guy Louis Rocha said, "They're starting to see that Nevada is a player. All roads now head through Nevada. The fact is, Nevada's always been a backwater."

The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (2/18, Gilbert, 255K) says that whether the February 19 primary in Wisconsin will be a "big deal or an empty, anticlimactic ritual is anybody's guess. But at this point either outcome seems plausible." Both nominations "could be effectively wrapped up after only a few weeks of voting -- and before the campaign even gets to Wisconsin. … But that's not the only possible scenario. In the most wide-open presidential election in decades, with two or three politically robust, big-name contenders in each party backed up by a bevy of respectable long shots, a quick outcome is not guaranteed." If the race "doesn't peter out before Wisconsin, then a very different dynamic could come into play, one that might give the state a more meaningful role than it has had in many years."

Mayors To Press Democratic Hopefuls On Urban Agenda. The Washington Times (2/18, Debose, 88K) reports on its front page, "The nation's mayors say they will press the 2008 Democratic presidential hopefuls to address the needs of cities by crafting urban agendas early in their campaigns, but some candidates could already have an edge based on their records." According to US Conference of Mayors President Douglas Palmer, mayor of Trenton, New Jersey, Sen. Hillary Clinton "has the strongest record working with urban black mayors -- both as a senator and as first lady." Detroit Mayor Kwame Kilpatrick also called Clinton "a strong contender," crediting her and her husband "for the creation of new policies such as welfare-to-work, which he said helped cities get more residents off the poverty rolls." Kilpatrick said he has met with Clinton, Sen. Joseph Biden, and John Edwards.

Presidential Race Could Offer Twist On Traditional "Religion Gap." The New York Times Magazine (2/18, Rosen) examines the "religion gap" in US politics, the "fact that regular churchgoers identify by a wide margin with the G.O.P. Come election time, the personal religiosity of the Democratic candidates won't matter nearly as much as the positions they take in all the drearily familiar theaters of the culture war. What a matchup between churchgoing Democrats" like Sen. Hillary Clinton or Sen. Barack Obama "and secular-minded Republicans" like Rudy Giuliani or Sen. John McCain "may supply, though, is welcome moderation in our debates over issues like abortion, gay marriage and stem-cell research. God knows, both sides of the ideological divide have fundamentalists in need of taming."

WPost Says Campaigns Should Release Names Of "Bundlers." The Washington Post (2/18, B6, 690K) editorializes, "The 2008 presidential field has already begun to sort itself into candidates willing to disclose the identities of their big financiers and those who balk at providing this critical information. On the side of real disclosure" are Sens. Christopher Dodd, John McCain, and Barack Obama, as well as Mitt Romney and Tom Vilsack. "Declining to provide this information" are Sen. Hillary Clinton, John Edwards, and Rudy Giuliani. The "refusal of these candidates to live up to the standards set by President Bush during his two campaigns, as well as by 2004 Democratic nominee John F. Kerry, speaks volumes about their commitment -- or lack thereof -- to openness in government." The "names of bundlers should be a matter of public record."

Brooks Says New Science On Human Nature Confirms Conservatives' Assumptions. In his New York Times (2/18, WK12, 1.16M) column, David Brooks writes, "Over the past 30 years or so…belief in natural goodness has been discarded. It began to lose favor because of the failure of just about every social program that was inspired by it, from the communes to progressive education on up. But the big blow came at the hands of science. From the content of our genes, the nature of our neurons and the lessons of evolutionary biology, it has become clear that nature is filled with competition and conflicts of interest. … As Steven Pinker has put it, Hobbes was more right than Rousseau." Brooks adds, "This darker if more realistic view of human nature has led to a rediscovery of different moral codes and different political assumptions. … This is based on the idea that there is a universal human nature; that it has nasty, competitive elements; that we don't understand much about it; and that the conventions and institutions that have evolved to keep us from slitting each other's throats are valuable and are altered at great peril."

In Jerusalem, Rice "Presses Forward" With Israeli-Palestinian Effort. Under the headline, "Rice Finds Huge Gaps Between Israel, Palestinians," AFP (2/18, Millikin) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "is to meet with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmud Abbas as she presses forward with a new initiative to revive the moribund peace process." She "flew in to Israel Saturday vowing to press ahead with a risky summit with the two leaders, who are embroiled in a bitter feud over the presence of Islamist radicals in a soon-to-be-formed Palestinian government. … The highlight of her mission is to be her first three-way meeting with Abbas and Olmert on Monday. She has billed that as the kick-off of a long-awaited US initiative to revive negotiations on a peace deal and the creation of a Palestinian state." However, Rice's "plan has been overshadowed by controversy over a power-sharing deal reached last week between" Fatah and Hamas.

The New York Times (2/18, A20, 1.16M) calls Rice's meeting tomorrow with Olmert and Abbas "much anticipated" and "a possible first step to rejuvenating Middle East peace talks," but adds that the summit "seems likely to be overtaken by battles over a new Palestinian unity government." The three sides "were jostling for position before the meeting, with the Americans and Israelis saying that the new government must recognize Israel, and the Palestinian Authority president saying that the world would have to live with the coalition. But it was unclear whether those statements sounded a death knell for restarting talks."

The AP (2/18) notes remarks by Abbas to Assistant Secretary of State David Welch that "the world will have to deal with a new Hamas-Fatah coalition even if its platform falls short of international demands such as recognition of Israel." Abbas told Welch "he will deliver the same message _ that he has done his best to moderate the Islamic militants – at an upcoming summit with" Rice and Olmert tomorrow. However, Rice and Livni "suggested later Saturday that there would be no room for compromise. Speaking at the start of a meeting in Jerusalem, they said any Palestinian government would have to meet the three conditions of international acceptance – recognizing Israel, renouncing violence and accepting previous peace deals with Israel." Rice "said Saturday she would withhold judgment until the government is formed."

On its front page, the Washington Times (2/18, A1, Mitnick, 88K) notes Abbas "delivered a blunt message" to Welch – "'The world must deal' with Hamas." For her part, Rice "acknowledged that her visit was taking place at a 'complicated time.'" Despite plans to work towards a peace settlement in tomorrow's summit meeting, Rice, Abbas and Olmert "appear likely to be detoured by the Mecca agreement and how it will affect relations with the Palestinian Authority and the flow of international aid."

Gaza "Slow" To Develop 18 Months After Israeli Pullout. Under the headline, "Israelis Are Gone, But Gaza Rebuilding Is Slow," the New York Times (2/18, Myre, 1.16M) examines developments in Gaza since the mid-2005 Israeli pull-back. That "withdrawal raised Palestinian hopes for new homes, schools and businesses, and an easing of the overcrowding." However, "internal Palestinian turmoil, the conflict with Israel and a lack of money have kept the abandoned settlements looking almost exactly as they were the day the Israelis left."

Israel Denies Egyptian-Canadian Spied For Mossad In Turkey. The New York Times (2/18, A9, El-Naggar, 1.16M) details the arrest in Cairo of Mohamed Esam Ghoneim, "an Egyptian student who fled the country six years ago." Ghoneim is accused of "spying for Israel." One newspaper account claims he "left Egypt in August 2001 on a tourist visa to Turkey, where he offered his services at the Israeli Embassy and was recruited by an agent of the Mossad, Israel's intelligence service, to gather information about Egyptians and Arabs living there." The Times notes that "Israeli officials denied the allegations, saying they learned about the case from news reports."

North Korean Negotiations Said To Show Necessity Of Iran Talks. A lengthy analysis piece in the New York Times (2/18, Sanger, 1.16M) examines the "looming question" of US policy towards North Korea and Iran. "When it comes to finding a way to disarm your enemies, here is a puzzle: How do you decide which dictatorial, nuke-building regimes to negotiate with, and which to freeze out, sanction or intimidate with a couple of aircraft carriers?" Although "hardliners and conservatives were assailing the administration last week for 'selling out' to Kim Jong Il, some in the administration were wondering whether there are lessons here for dealing with Iran." The Times notes that Administration officials "worked out" parts of this week's agreement "in one-on-one talks in Berlin of the kind the White House refused to hold a few years back… Those are exactly the steps Mr. Bush refuses to take with Tehran." The Times explains the White House's "logic" -- Pyongyang's "nuclear program is already 'mature,'" and "insisting on suspending fuel production … would not gain the United States any leverage. Iran, they argue, is different. It has no weapons -- at least not yet."

US-Russian Relations Said To Suffer From Mutual Distrust, Disappointments. In a New York Times (2/18, WK3, 1.16M) analysis piece, Steven Lee Myers says a second Cold War "could in its own way be just as messy and unpredictable" as the first. "For all the talk of strategic partnership and even personal friendship" between President Vladimir Putin and President Bush, the "relationship between Russia and the United States has reached what is probably its lowest point since the Soviet Union collapsed a decade and a half ago." Russia and the US "seem headed into a period of tensions when every step is met with distrust and some counterstep, putting them on opposite sides of hotspots around the world, from Iran to Georgia to Kosovo. … The countries are now openly competing for influence in Europe, in the Caucasus and in Central Asia, where access to natural resources and military bases has become paramount for both." While Moscow and Washington "are no more likely to go to war than before," Myers says potential flashpoints abound. And, as in the cold war, it would not take much for simmering tensions to become a grave breach, even a violent one."

US Urged To Hold Putin Accountable For Russian Democratization. In the Washington Post (2/18, B2, 690K), researcher Anders Aslund says Putin's recent "anti-American tirade" was "notable for what it said about his domestic politics." While he "obviously thinks he is riding high," he "has painted himself into a corner as he faces the end of the two terms in office that the Russian constitution allows him. … Having spent his time as president undermining democracy, property rights, the free press and the rule of law by taking over Yukos oil (and throwing its owner into a Siberian prison) and then other big companies, now he and his coterie must cling to power somehow -- or risk losing it all if they cannot stage-manage a transition to the proper person." Putin's international speeches "have the effect of increasing his popularity and therefore his grip on the country." The "ultimate question is how the Putin regime will end," and Aslund says Washington "can no longer be a mere bystander in this drama." Vice President Cheney's "speech in Vilnius, Lithuania, last May was a welcome departure, which enraged the Kremlin. It's the time for the White House to follow through."

Professor Says Cold War Nostalgia Is Misplaced. In an op-ed in today's Los Angeles Times (2/18, 850K), Yale University professor Paul Kennedy says of the Cold War, "There is a palpable sense of nostalgia these days for the familiar contours of that bygone conflict, which has been replaced by a much more murky, elusive and confusing age." That "bipolar world" was "inherently stable," while "today's world is far less stable and indeed much less favorable to the comfortable Western democracies." However, Kennedy argues, "however tricky our relationships with Putin's Russia and President Hu Jintao's China are nowadays, the prospect of our entering a massive and mutually cataclysmic conflict with either nation are vastly reduced." He continues, "Those were really scary times, and much more dangerous than our present circumstance because the potential damage that could be inflicted during an East-West conflagration was far, far greater than anything that Al Qaeda can do to us now."

Italians Peacefully Protest Expansion Of US Airbases. The New York Times (2/18, Kiefer, 1.16M) reports, "Tens of thousands of people converged Saturday on [Vicenza] in the Veneto region of northern Italy for a peaceful protest against the planned expansion of an American military base. The expansion would essentially double the base's size so it could house the full 173rd Airborne Brigade. The number of military personnel here would grow to about 4,500 from 2,750." In addition to local concerns, "the widely publicized demonstration on Saturday was billed as a chance for Italians to express their anger over American foreign policy. Fears grew of a repeat of the violence that overtook antiglobalization protests in Genoa in 2001." The AP (2/18, Barry) adds, "Despite fears that violent demonstrators would be drawn to the protest, the march took place without incident, finishing outside the main train station where it started, as hundred of police officers stood guard and helicopters hovered overhead. The route did not pass the airfield where the expanded base is to be built, where critics keep a permanent picket."

Madrid-ETA Peace Process Said To Be "In Tatters." The Washington Post (2/18, A20, Anderson, 690K) notes last December's "bombing at Madrid's Barajas airport, which leveled a five-story parking lot and killed two Ecuadoran immigrants … shocked" Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero's government and "many Spaniards who had dared to hope that peace talks with ETA, formally known as Basque Homeland and Liberty, would finally settle one of Europe's last and longest violent campaigns for independence." The peace process "is in tatters, with no clear way forward. The bombing destroyed ETA's credibility, eroded confidence in Zapatero's government and emboldened the opposition Popular Party, which has adopted an increasingly strident tone against any compromise with Zapatero on his drive to resolve the issue."

Chavez Family's Efforts To Amass Political Power Criticized. The New York Times (2/18, A10, Romero, 1.16M) describes the "expanding power" of relatives of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez. "From a humble start in a dirt-floored adobe home that was bulldozed to make way for a hamburger stand, the family's widening political clout has been increasingly scrutinized as critics call attention to abuses of power and corruption charges throughout the institutions now controlled by Mr. Chávez, including the National Assembly, the Supreme Court and the federal bureaucracy." Chavez's "family boasts not only a mayor and a governor, but also the secretary of state for Barinas, a post created for the president's brother Argenis, who carries out many day-to-day functions at the governor's palace. Another brother, Adelis, is a senior banker at Banco Sofitasa, which does brisk business with the state government. Adelis also supervises the government's construction of a new soccer stadium in Barinas." The Times adds, "Revelations of corruption under his family's watch in Barinas and accusations of nepotism have dogged Mr. Chávez even as he makes combating such irregularities one of the priorities of his government."

Kirchner's Wife Could Seek Argentine Presidency. Under the headline, "Argentina's First Lady May Have Eye On Husband's Job," the Los Angeles Times (2/18, McDonnell, 850K) reports, "She is a senator and the chief advisor to her husband, who is no less than the president of Argentina. Some call her the real power in the presidential palace. … And the heated rumor mill" says Cristina Fernandez de Kirchner wants husband Nestor Kirchner's job. Citing "a sizzling new round of speculation about Fernandez's long-presumed presidential aspirations," the Times says "the 'new Evita' label appears destined to stick, even if comparisons seem to be a stretch in the case of this lawyer from a middle-class background and the up-from-the-streets Eva Peron."

Stage Could Be Set For Dramatic Cuba Policy Changes. Under the headline, "Ground Shifting Under U.S. Isolation Of Cuba," the Los Angeles Times (2/18, Williams, 850K) reports, "Opposition to restrictive U.S. policies on Cuba has been mounting for more than a decade, but it may have reached critical mass with recent power shifts in Havana and Washington." Saying "a course change may be ahead," the Times notes "polls suggest most Americans want better relations with the island. Farm and energy interests would like to trade and invest in Cuba. A raft of legislation to change trade and travel restrictions has been introduced in Congress this session. Even many who have fled Cuba say it's time to end the standoff." For his part, Raul Castro "has said Cuba would be open to talks on improving relations, but the White House has spurned the offers." The Times adds, "President Bush would probably veto any measure to engage with Cuba, but lawmakers and lobbyists believe there is sufficient support to override a veto or attach policy changes to legislation Bush must sign." Notably, "few see even the slightest flinch in the administration's posture," and some "recent actions" suggest "a status quo."

Pakistani Suicide Bombing Kills 15 In Courthouse. The New York Times (2/18, Gall, 1.16M) reports, "In the sixth suicide bombing in a month, a man blew himself up in a small district courtroom in the border town of Quetta on Saturday, killing 15 people, including a senior judge, and wounding 35." Although no one has claimed responsibility, one local official "connected it to the string of suicide attacks that have now killed some 40 people and put security forces on alert across the country." While "Baluchistan has often been the scene of bombings," that official "said local groups lacked the expertise for suicide bombing." The Washington Post/AP (2/18, A22, Sattar) calls the blast "the deadliest in a series of attacks that have struck the country in recent weeks. Many Pakistanis suspect that pro-Taliban fighters are targeting sensitive sites to undermine the country's support of the United States, and an official in the region where Saturday's attack took place hinted at Afghan involvement."

Chinese Nouveau-Riche Tread Lightly In Changing Society. The Washington Post Magazine (2/18, Fan) profiles the evolution of wealth in China. "After the 1949 Communist revolution, private wealth became a huge social liability. Much of it was confiscated by officials or voluntarily handed over by owners who feared persecution otherwise." In the past twenty years, however, "the booming Chinese economy has been one of the biggest stories in the world. Wealth and conspicuous consumption are climbing in a country where the average per-capita income has only just jumped to $145 a month (in Beijing, it's $209 a month)." Notably, President Hu Jintao "has responded to the growing gap between rich and poor by demanding that more attention be paid to a 'harmonious society.' Authorities have imposed luxury taxes on boats, golf clubs and diamond watches." Among the newly wealthy, "the urge to flaunt economic success competes with the desire to keep a low profile." And, "wealth is beginning to bring other privileges," including political participation.

Washington Foreign Policy Debates Said To Omit Pertinent Intelligence. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (2/18, 850K), Stanford professor Michael May writes, "here's the only thing we know for sure: When the collection of politicians and pundits we call 'Washington' makes predictions about countries in which the U.S. has 'vital interests' (and especially about countries with which we have had bad relations), the predictions — even when they contradict one another! — are almost always wrong. … Washington debates tend to be narrow; they fall within a range of acceptable conventional wisdom and close out anything that seems to go out on a limb. … The assumptions underlying those debates are seldom challenged. They are based on politically acceptable views of the other state and, career-wise, it doesn't pay to challenge them. Indeed, movers and doers in Washington often do not even have time to challenge them. There is little or no intelligence outside the axis of debate."

Kristof Says "Human Rights" Includes Elimination Of Disease. In his New York Times (2/18, WK13, 1.16M) column, Nicholas Kristof depicts efforts by President Carter and others to eliminate the guinea worm, as a human rights campaign. "We tend to think of human rights in terms of a right to vote, a right to free speech, a right to assembly. But a child should also have a right not to suffer agony because of a worm that is easily preventable, as well as a right not to go blind because of a lack of medication that costs a dollar or two, even a right not to die for lack of a $5 mosquito net." Carter "argues -- and he's dead right -- that we conceive of human rights too narrowly as political and civil rights, and that we also need to fight for the human right of children to live healthy lives. He has led the way in waging that battle."

Hoagland Says Business Optimism More Realistic Than Political Negativism. In his Washington Post (2/18, B7, 690K) column, Jim Hoagland describes a "disjunction of spirits" between international business and politics. "Global business is burbling while global politics croaks messages of dread, frustration and hatred. It is supersized Dickens: The best of times by many economic measures is also the worst of times when we listen to the pollsters and the politicians." Hoagland says "selling fear is the oldest tool of politics. Selling hope and confidence is the mother's milk of business. The more we get, the more we have to fear having it taken away by 'others' as defined by race, religion, class or rivalrous sameness. … Abundant financing in global markets and broad confidence in the ability of today's central banks to control inflation have created a buoyant international financial system." While "there is always cause for concern about markets overshooting," the "merchants of political despair are overdoing it."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Team Of DOJ Attorneys Key To Anti-Terrorism Efforts. U.S. News and World Report (2/18, Ragavan) reports, "Just a few weeks ago, Kenneth Wainstein, the Justice Department's new national security chief, received a book in the mail, a memoir titled Secrets. Its author, Daniel Ellsberg-the former Defense Department analyst who was prosecuted for leaking the Pentagon Papers to the New York Times 36 years ago-sent the book to Wainstein after a spirited exchange with him during a recent panel discussion about prosecuting leakers. 'Dear Ken,' Ellsberg inscribed in the book, 'I shared your revulsion against all leaks until some years ago.'" US News continues, "Prosecuting those who leak classified information is just a small part of Wainstein's controversial portfolio. As the assistant attorney general for the National Security Division, created last summer, Wainstein has been handed most of the department's hot-potato issues and has at his disposal some of the government's most secret, powerful, and criticized investigative tools. Just recently, President Bush decided not to reauthorize the National Security Agency's controversial warrantless electronic surveillance program but to place it under a special court-the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court-that oversees government surveillance in intelligence investigations. The revamped program will now be under Wainstein's purview. Look for civil-liberties groups and the new Democratic majority in Congress to keep a close eye on his every move." US News adds, "The career federal prosecutor seems unfazed by the prospect of such scrutiny. In an interview, Wainstein, 45, said that he is used to making difficult decisions based on the facts and the law. 'But with national security being a hot political issue, it's natural for people to scrutinize our big prosecution decisions through the prism of politics,' says Wainstein. 'Because it's important that we maintain public confidence, we're careful to both make and to announce our decisions in an apolitical way.' … Sounds good. But in coming months, Wainstein, a Senate-confirmed presidential appointee, will have to contend with a host of lingering perception problems. 'This administration has politicized almost every part of the Justice Department,' says Kate Martin, director of the Center for National Security Studies, a civil-liberties group. 'We need congressional oversight to prevent this key division from being similarly politicized.'"

Identities Of Pilots Used For CIA Renditions Discovered. The Los Angeles Times (2/18, Drogin, Goetz, 850K) reports, "Relying on the operatives' passport numbers, hotel records, credit card bills and aviation records, German prosecutors are seeking to properly identify the 13 Americans in a high-profile case that has upset relations between Washington and Berlin and caused a political scandal in Germany over whether government officials sanctioned the CIA operation." The Times "confirmed their real identities from government databases and visited their homes this month after a German court in January ordered the arrest of the three 'ghost pilots' and 10 other alleged members of the CIA's special renditions unit on charges of kidnapping and causing serious bodily harm to Khaled Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent, three years ago. None of the pilots responded to repeated requests for comment left with family members and on their home telephones. The Times is not publishing their real names because they have been charged only under their aliases." The Times adds, "One former CIA operation officer who was involved in the Italian case at CIA headquarters, speaking on condition of anonymity because the case is classified, said he and his colleagues were increasingly nervous about traveling in Europe for fear of getting swept up in the investigations. He said he checked with a contact at the Italian intelligence service for reassurance that he would not be arrested."

WAR NEWS:

Senate Votes Down Iraq Debate, But Seven Republicans Back Cloture. The failed effort in the Senate Saturday afternoon to agree to cloture and permit debate on a resolution criticizing President Bush's Iraq troop increase led two evening news broadcasts and appears on the front pages of several major newspapers, but receives far less coverage than Friday's House vote in favor of a critical resolution. Seven Republicans voted for cloture in the 56-34 vote -- Sens. Norm Coleman, Susan Collins, Chuck Hagel, Gordon Smith, Olympia Snowe, Arlen Specter, and John Warner. Independent Democrat Joseph Lieberman and all other Republicans were opposed, while 10 senators – Robert Bennett, Kit Bond, Thad Cochran, Bob Corker, John Ensign, Orrin Hatch, Tim Johnson, Jon Kyl, John McCain, and Lisa Murkowski, all Republicans except for Johnson -- did not vote.

The CBS Evening News (2/17, lead story, 2:25, Smith, 7.66M) reported, "They came to work on a Saturday, but Democrats in the Senate couldn't pull it off. The Senate voted against advancing a resolution that condemns President Bush's troop surge." ABC (Chen): "It was enough of a spectacle to draw a crowd to the Capitol on a sunny winter weekend. Imagine senators working on a Saturday. … Some members scurried back from what was to have been a long holiday weekend, and some presidential wanna-bes bailed out of big campaign appearances, because though no one thought the measure had a snowball's chance, most senators couldn't risk the political backlash they'd face for not showing up."

NBC Nightly News (2/17, lead story, 3:05, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "There will be no debate in the US Senate for the President's plan for a troop surge in Iraq, at least for now. It was a rare Saturday session, and despite the shift in power, Senate Democrats failed to get enough votes to bring up a resolution opposing the President's war plan." NBC (Reid): "The rare Saturday session had some senators rushing back to Washington from the presidential campaign trail for a spirited, at times angry, debate on Iraq. … Democrats angrily accused Republican leaders of blocking the vote on the resolution for the second time in two weeks," but Republicans "blamed Democrats for blocking a vote on a Republican resolution prohibiting cutting off funds for the troops." ABC World News (2/17, story 3, 3:00, Hendren, 8.78M) said, "It was part policy, part principle, and part political theater in the Senate today. Majority Leader Harry Reid dragged his colleagues in for a rare Saturday vote to condemn the troop surge in Iraq."

On CNN (2/17) just after the vote, correspondent Dana Bash pointed out that "seven Republicans voted to rebuke the President, essentially. Seven Republicans voted with the Democrats in an effort to start a debate on this issue. … The last time the Senate voted on this, last Monday, there were only two Republican senators who voted with the Democrats. And the others, about five of them, who don't agree with the President's plan, who actually outright oppose it, said that they were going to vote with their party because it was a matter of minority rights. It was a matter of sticking with their party because they believed that their party had the right to have their own resolution. Well, nothing has changed. Republicans still did not have the right to offer their own resolution. But still, these five Republican senators switched their vote, essentially because they say they lost patience, that they simply don't agree with the President's plan, they want the Senate to have their say, to have a vote, and that they gave their leadership time to work it out, to work out a deal with the Democrats and it didn't happen."

The gain in GOP support for the Democratic stance gets some print attention as well. The Washington Post (2/18, Murray, 690K) headlines its front-page report "Iraq Vote In Senate Blocked By GOP," saying Senate Republicans "for a second time blocked a symbolic attempt by Democrats to reject President Bush's troop increase yesterday, but GOP defections were higher than before, suggesting Republican cracks as the Iraq war dominates Congress's agenda." Democrats "picked up five new Republican allies," but the "fate of the resolution is now very much in doubt." Reid "announced after the vote that he would not bring up the resolution again. Both sides instead are girding for the next phase, a confrontation over war funding, with some Democrats determined to exercise the power of the purse to influence Iraq strategy."

The New York Times (2/18, Hulse, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports on its front page that the Senate "narrowly rejected" the effort, "but Republican defections emboldened Democrats to promise new attempts to influence the administration's war policy." The Times says the outcome "suggested that Democrats were slowly drawing support from Senate Republicans for what was shaping up to be a drawn-out fight between the Democrat-controlled Congress and Mr. Bush over his execution of the war." Reid said, "A majority of the United States Senate just voted on Iraq, and a majority of the United States Senate is against the escalation in Iraq."

The Los Angeles Times (2/18, Simon, 850K) reports Reid "accused Republicans of trying to protect the president from an embarrassing vote," though he said he "would no longer push for a vote on the nonbinding resolution." Reid said Iraq "would remain center stage in the Senate. 'This war is too important to permit Senate Republicans to brush it aside,' he said. 'The Senate will keep fighting to force President Bush to change course.'" Sen. Lindsey Graham "accused Democrats of playing 'stupid political games.'" Graham said, "This is a low point in my time in the Senate."

The Washington Times (2/18, Ward, 88K) headlines its front-page story "War Rebuke Halted In Senate," and says Republicans "said they had rebuffed an 'unfair' attempt by Mr. Reid to prevent a vote on an alternative resolution that would protect funding for the troops in Iraq."

The Chicago Tribune (2/18, Zuckman, 617K) says that while the Senate "expressed strong, bipartisan disapproval of President Bush's policy on Iraq," lawmakers "nevertheless failed to end their debate and pass a non-binding resolution." RollCall.com (2/17, Stanton) says Reid "claimed a symbolic victory" due to the "bipartisan majority of 56 lawmakers" that backed cloture.

The Washington Post (2/18, A6, Weisman, 690K) looks at how the oddly timed vote impacted the Senate's presidential hopefuls. Sen. Joseph Biden "had planned to spend the day in Iowa but instead flew back to Washington for the vote, then returned for an evening event. Of all the Senate's presidential hopefuls, he was the only one to speak before the vote." Sen. Barack Obama "hurriedly departed a campaign stop in South Carolina to cast his vote before hustling to a campaign appearance in Richmond and then boarding a plane to San Diego." Sen. Sam Brownback "voted against moving to a debate on the war before rushing to catch a plane to Orlando, where he was to address religious broadcasters." Sen. John McCain "did not bother to show up. In Iowa yesterday, McCain defended his decision to stay away from Washington in defiant terms, condemning the Senate Democrats for scheduling a rare Saturday vote on what he described as a political charade."

The Washington Post (2/18, A5, Milbank, 690K) also looks at the casual attire of the senators, saying they "entered the chamber to vote on the Iraq war yesterday as if emerging from a Lands' End catalogue." Sen. Robert Byrd, "who knows something about theatrics, volunteered: 'If it will help to bring our soldiers home, I will work every Saturday for the rest of this Congress.'" But Sen. Ted Stevens "was sour about delaying his Presidents' Day recess. 'It is an important subject to be debated, but why Saturday?' he complained."

Among the other sources offering straightforward reports on the debate and vote are the AP (2/17, Espo), The Politico (2/17, Reilly, Bresnahan), the Web site of The Hill (2/17, Marre, Bolton), CNN.com (2/17), and BBC.com (2/17).

White House Says Real Fight Yet To Come. NBC Nightly News (2/17, story 2, 2:20, Yang, 9.87M) said White House Press Secretary Tony Snow "shrugged off today's vote saying it was merely a procedural maneuver. The real test, he says, and the President says, is yet to come. Even before today's vote, President Bush was warning Democrats about the next fight." Bush: "I'm going to make it very clear to the members of Congress starting now that, you know, they need to fund our troops and they need to make sure we have the flexibility necessary to get the job done." Yang: "This week, a poll found 63% of Americans oppose send manager troops to Iraq, but 60% said Congress should not cut funding for additional forces that has Democrats on the defensive."

Rice Visits Less-Violent Baghdad, Where She Publicly Praises Maliki. ABC World News (2/17, lead story, 2:20, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "Here's a headline: no deadly bombings in Baghdad for two days. The emergency rooms are quiet and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice makes a surprise visit to boost a rarity in Iraq: a sense of optimism. No one is boasting of total success." The CBS Evening News (2/17, story 2, 2:35, Smith, 7.66M) reported, "By one measure, the Baghdad security sweep already appears to be having results. According to the Iraqi army, the Baghdad morgue routinely handled 40 to 50 bodies a day before the sweep. Since it began, the number of bodies has dropped to about ten a day." NBC Nightly News (2/17, story 3, 2:10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Baghdad saw less killing today. In at least one neighborhood, residents enjoyed the calm and wondered how long it would last."

The New York Times (2/18, Cave, 1.16M) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "made a surprise visit to Baghdad on Saturday to meet with Iraqi officials about the new security plan and to press the Shiite-led government to accelerate reconciliation, reconstruction and economic progress." Rice, "in a meeting with reporters after her talk with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and other Iraqi leaders, said it was still too early to judge the effectiveness of the new plan. But she said she had pushed the Iraqis to think beyond short-term security, to how neighborhoods and Iraqi civil society could be rebuilt if sectarian violence between the ruling Shiites and the minority Sunnis subsided."

Under the headline, "In Baghdad, Rice Acknowledges Frustrations In U.S.," the Washington Post (2/18, A21, Ernesto Londono, 690K) adds Rice "expressed support for a nascent Baghdad security plan during an unannounced visit to the capital Saturday, but she reminded Iraq's leaders that Americans were growing increasingly frustrated with the unyielding lethality and cost of the war." She "spoke approvingly of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's leadership, urged Iraqi officials to enact laws to fairly administer the country's vast oil reserves and acknowledged widespread disapproval of the Bush administration's policies in Iraq among many Americans and U.S. lawmakers." Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari said "Rice left with a realistic sense of the challenges that lie ahead."

The Los Angeles Times (2/18, Roug, 850K) keys on Rice's reconciliation message, saying she "urged Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish politicians to use a lull in violence resulting from a new security plan to reach long-delayed agreement on key political issues." Rice "said U.S. commanders have told her that troop strength among Iraqi units in the Baghdad operation is as high as 90%. … But she reiterated that political progress would have to accompany any military advances." Rice "urged hundreds of American troops and U.S. Embassy staff members to be patient, saying they were engaged in a 'noble cause.' … But she also said the Bush administration didn't have unlimited patience."

The AP (2/18, Gearan) titles its coverage, "Rice: U.S. Has Doubts On Iraq Democracy." She "told Iraqi government leaders Saturday that the contentious debate in Washington over President Bush's war strategy reflects U.S. doubts that democracy will prevail over violence." While Rice "used her visit to publicly praise the Iraqi government's role in a new security crackdown in Baghdad, an Iraqi official said she was more critical in private." The Washington Times (2/18, Gearan, 88K) runs the AP story.

Bombs Kill 11 In Northern Iraq. The AP (2/17) reports from Kirkuk, "Police and witnesses said the first blast occurred near shops and a bus depot. Minutes later, a suicide car bomber attacked the same area. The back-to-back lasts shattered about 20 shops as terrified shoppers fled screaming in panic amid burning cars and debris."

Attacks On US Helicopters In Iraq Seem Carefully Planned. The New York Times (2/18, Gordon, Cloud, 1.16M) reports on its front page, "Documents captured from Iraqi insurgents indicate that some of the recent fatal attacks against American helicopters are a result of a carefully planned strategy to focus on downing coalition aircraft, one that American officials say has been carried out by mounting coordinated assaults with machine guns, rockets and surface-to-air missiles. The documents, said to have been drafted by Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, show that the militants were preparing to 'concentrate on the air force.' The contents of the documents are described in an American intelligence report that was reviewed by The New York Times." Officials call the documents "a fresh indication that the United States is facing an array of 'adaptive' adversaries in Iraq, enemies who are likely to step up their attacks as American forces expand their efforts to secure Baghdad." ABC World News (2/17, story 2, :25, Avila, 8.78M) briefly mentioned the Times report.

Iran Said To Use Iraq To "Shift" Regional Balance Of Power. Under the headline "Iran's Chance: U.S. Troubles in Iraq Create Opening for Regional Shift," the New York Times (2/18, Slackman, 1.16M) looks extensively at Tehran's actions in the wake of US action in Iraq. "In recent weeks, President Bush and American military officials have increasingly accused Iran of meddling in Iraq's affairs. But from Iran's perspective, given its longstanding interests in Iraq, it is the United States that is meddling in its backyard, analysts inside and outside of Iran say." Administration desires to "curtail the influence of Iran's radical Shiite leaders by producing an alternative, moderate center of Shiite Islam" have been "abundantly clear to Iran's clerical rulers" since 2003, and Tehran has "moved quickly to try to prevent the United States from gaining a permanent foothold." The Times explains, "While the United States sees in Iraq a venture that will affect its foreign interests for years to come, Iran sees an occupied neighbor with close religious, cultural, political and economic ties." The US' "failure to secure its position in Iraq has presented Tehran with a rare opportunity to recalibrate the balance of power in a neighborhood that had long been hostile to its aspirations." While Tehran has pursued a nuclear weapons program, "strengthened ties with Syria, built the militia Hezbollah into a state within a state in Lebanon and offered support to" Hamas, the Times says "the cornerstone to its regional plans lies in Baghdad."

"Rogue" Shiite Militias Allegedly Use Iranian Bombs. The Washington Times (2/18, Behn, 88K) reports, "Lethal Iranian bomb technology spotlighted by U.S. officials in Iraq last week is being used by rogue elements of Shi'ite militias that are not under any kind of central command, the U.S. military says." The finding "presented at a briefing in Baghdad last week further confuses an enemy landscape in which death is as likely to come at the hands of government-allied Shi'ite militias as from disgruntled former Ba'athist extremists and their al Qaeda allies."

Syria's Assad In Iran To Discuss Iraq. The AP (2/17) reports Syrian President Bashar Assad "arrived in Iran Saturday to discuss Iraq and other Middle East issues with President Mahmoud Ahmadinajed, state-run television reported. ... This is Assad's fifth visit to Iran since he took office in 2000. Iran and Syria have long been close allies."

More Commentary On Iran's Role In Iraq. The Washington Post (2/18, B06, 690K) editorializes, "The international coalition the administration has painstakingly assembled to pressure Iran seems to be having some effect on the mullahs; it should be maintained and strengthened. U.S. financial pressure and assurances of support to Iran's neighbors also are appropriate. All of these might have a greater chance of working, as we've said before, if the administration also remained open to diplomatic overtures, at least in a regional context. That, and not secret military plans, is the missing component of U.S. strategy right now.

In the Washington Post (2/18, B1, 690K), Brookings fellow Daniel Byman writes, "Iran has been meddling in its neighbors' affairs for a long time, and not just in Iraq. ... Iran could easily be even more aggressive in Iraq. Tehran could provide sophisticated weapons to a wider range of Iraqi groups than it reportedly has so far. Iran's Shiite proxies do at times attack American forces, but their principal targets are Sunni militias. They could kill a lot more Americans than they have." Rather, Iran has a "broader Iraq strategy, which goes well beyond Tehran's desire to undermine U.S. policy. Iranian leaders calculate that they will need formidable proxies should the United States leave, and indeed Iran will face many challenges in Iraq if U.S. forces depart." Byman adds that a US withdrawal could weaken Iran's influence in Iraq in the long term: "Iran's economic and military power is limited, and Iran's theocratic model of governance has little appeal for most Iraqis."

In the New York Times (2/18, WK12, 1.16M), columnist Frank Rich writes, "Maybe the Bush White House can't conduct a war, but no one has ever impugned its ability to lie about its conduct of a war. Now even that well-earned reputation for flawless fictionalizing is coming undone. ... The press and everyone else seems to have forgotten that the administration has twice sounded the same alarms about Iranian weaponry in Iraq that it did last week [in August 2005 and February 2006]." Bush's "real aim is to provoke war with Iran, no matter how overstretched and ill-equipped our armed forces may be for that added burden."

In the Los Angeles Times (2/18, 850K), Nation literary editor Adam Shatz asks, "Might Iran have legitimate interests in what is, after all, its own geographic neighborhood? Could it be that Iran's stake in Iraq is solidly grounded in the same realist principles that drive the behavior of most nations, rather than in 'malign intentions' or a desire to export the Islamic revolution?" Since Iran "sees itself as a protector of Shiite interests in the region" and "wants to ensure that no government in Iraq will threaten it again," it "has, in other words, a strong realist case for being involved in Iraq."

Iraqi Detainee Alleges Two Years Of Abuse By US Military. The New York Times (2/18, Moss, Mekhennet, 1.16M) reports on its front page that when Laith al-Ani was released by the US military after two years of detention, he "was handed a form and asked to place a check mark next to the sentence that best described how he had been treated: 'I didn't go through any abuse during detention,' read the first option, in Arabic. 'I have gone through abuse during detention,' read the second." Al-Ani signed the first option out of fear but now remembers a "sprawling complex of barracks in the southern desert near Kuwait as a bleak place where guards casually used their stun guns and exposed prisoners to long periods of extreme heat and cold; where prisoners fought among themselves and extremist elements tried to radicalize others; and where detainees often responded to the harsh conditions with hunger strikes and, at times, violent protests." The Times continues, "The American detention camps in Iraq now hold 15,500 prisoners, more than at any time since the war began. The camps are filled with people like Mr. Ani who are being held without charge and without access to tribunals where their cases are reviewed, the Times examination published last December found."

US To Admit Many More Iraqi Refugees. The CBS Evening News (2/17, story 3, 2:20, Smith, 7.66M) reported, "Millions of refugees are fleeing the fighting in Iraq. But only a few have reached the United States. Since 2003, the US has admitted just 600, but this week officials said 7,000 will be admitted this year. Most still head for Syria." CBS (Palmer): "Frantic Iraqi refugees newly arrived in Damascus push to register with the United Nations. They need visas, housing, schools for their children. Officials are overwhelmed. Some two million refugees have flooded into crowded Iraqi ghettos here. ... But even as the nightly stream of desperate Iraqis arrives in Syria, at the other end of the bus depot, another bus is loading Iraqi refugees who are even more desperate, because their money has run out. ... and about to take the long ride home, back to the terror and chaos of Iraq."

Marine Sentenced To Eight Years In Hamdaniya Killing. CNN.com (2/17) reports Marine Lance Cpl. Robert Pennington "will serve no more than eight years in prison in connection with the killing of an Iraqi civilian, a Marine Corps spokesman said Saturday." Pennington "was sentenced to 14 years' confinement but will serve no more than eight under a plea agreement." He "pleaded guilty Tuesday to charges regarding the death of Hashim Ibrahim Awad, 52, in Hamdaniya." BBC.com (2/17) also reports the story, calling it "one in a series of inquiries into the alleged abuse or killing of Iraqis by coalition forces."

Letters By Iraqis Show Unfolding National Tragedy. In the Washington Post (2/18, B7, 690K), former Coalition Provisional Authority education advisor John Agresto writes, "I do have letters from an Iraqi friend and his wife. Hasan (sadly, I dare not give his real name) was a translator for the Coalition Provisional Authority when I worked in Baghdad in 2003 and 2004. These brief letters catalogue the deterioration, the chaos and the human tragedy that have become Iraq's lot. ... They surely speak to the need to help those who once so hopefully helped us." Letters from 2004 to 2006 describe increasing danger; Agresto concludes, "I have written Hasan three times now since this last letter [from Christmas Eve, 2006], and I have not heard back."

Influence Of Joint Chiefs Rebounds Under Gates. The Los Angeles Times (2/18, Barnes, 850K) reports that while during the tenure of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, the Joint Chiefs of Staff "were kept out of war planning," under new Secretary Robert Gates, "military officers say the influence of the Joint Chiefs is starting to rebound. Unlike his predecessor, Gates is publicly and privately paying close attention to his uniformed advisors." Gates "has begun meeting with the chiefs once a week."

Walter Reed Said To Overwhelmed, Neglecting Patients. The Washington Post (2/18, Priest, Hull, 690K) reports in a highly critical 5,000-word front page article, "Signs of neglect are everywhere: mouse droppings, belly-up cockroaches, stained carpets, cheap mattresses. This is the world of Building 18, not the kind of place where [Jeremy] Duncan expected to recover when he was evacuated to Walter Reed Army Medical Center from Iraq last February with a broken neck and a shredded left ear, nearly dead from blood loss. ... The common perception of Walter Reed is of a surgical hospital that shines as the crown jewel of military medicine. But 5 1/2 years of sustained combat have transformed the venerable 113-acre institution into something else entirely -- a holding ground for physically and psychologically damaged outpatients. ... On the worst days, soldiers say they feel like they are living a chapter of 'Catch-22.' The wounded manage other wounded. Soldiers dealing with psychological disorders of their own have been put in charge of others at risk of suicide." Walter Reed commander Maj. Gen. George Weightman "said Walter Reed has taken steps over the past year to improve conditions for the outpatient army, which at its peak in summer 2005 numbered nearly 900, not to mention the hundreds of family members who come to care for them." NBC Nightly News (2/17, story 5, 3:25, Priest, 9.87M) ran a report based on the Post story, saying "conditions are far from the best. Peeling wallpaper, mice and cockroaches. The conditions here are said to be symptomatic of a system overwhelmed by more wounded soldiers than the Pentagon expected."

The Los Angeles Times (2/18, Spiegel, 850K) notes the distinction between high-quality inpatient care and questionable outpatient care, saying Walter Reed "is renowned for its inpatient medical care, which has helped keep alive hundreds of soldiers who probably would have died during previous conflicts. Less well-known is the care soldiers receive as outpatients, which has stretched to an average of 10 months -- two months longer than Army guidelines call for -- a period Weightman said can be even more frustrating for wounded soldiers and their families."

Two Army Privates Cope With Iraq Tour. The Washington Post (2/18, A22, Murphy, 690K) reports on two US Army artillerymen who were dropped at a "small, dusty base outside Baqubah in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad, the night before purely by accident." The Post continues, "Nobody has told them what job they'll be doing here, but they don't think there is much artillery in this war, and they expect to be used as infantry. ... U.S. casualties are piling up here now, slowly but steadily. [Staff Sgt. Benjamin] Maldonado said he doesn't see things here getting better, and it's tough to watch new guys go off into the fight. 'It would be one thing if you saw some improvement.'"

Prince Harry To Serve In Iraq. ABC World News (2/17, story 11, :25, Avila, 8.78M), the CBS Evening News (2/17, story 6, :20, Smith, 7.66M), and several wire services report British Prince Harry is expected to deploy to the Basra area and, as ABC said, will "likely take part in reconnaissance missions near the Iranian border area."

Lugar Urges Buildup Of "Civilian Forces." In the Washington Times (2/18, 88K), Sen. Richard Lugar writes, "A strong military response is necessary for the war against terrorism. ... But over-reliance on the military also carries risks. To succeed, we need diplomats who can shape complex bilateral relationships, repair and build alliances and navigate through a labyrinth of foreign languages and cultures. We need foreign aid experts who know how best to promote democratic practices and economic development. And we need communication professionals to get our message across to foreign audiences."

Taliban Offensive Expected In Spring. The Los Angeles Times (2/18, King, 850K) reports article, "In coming weeks, winter will loosen its grip on Afghanistan. Senior NATO generals insist that their troops are well positioned to confront the Taliban offensive that is expected to follow. But some analysts, diplomats and other observers think the Western alliance, and the Afghan government it supports, has failed to use winter's relative lull in fighting to seize the initiative in advance of a new battle with the insurgents. ... But the influx of about 3,000 additional troops is privately described by field commanders as both tardy and considerably smaller than what they had hoped for." Problems for NATO include "the use of crude yet lethal tactics such as suicide and roadside bombings," "the slow pace of reconstruction," and "the dubious efficacy of the Afghan army."

Coalition Helicopter Crashes In Afghanistan. The AP (2/17) reports, "A U.S.-led coalition helicopter crashed Sunday in southeastern Afghanistan after reporting engine failure, a coalition statement said. An official said the helicopter was not shot down." Col. Tom Collins said he was "confident it was not due to enemy action." BBC.com (2/17) reports, "Coalition and Nato forces have lost several helicopters in Afghanistan in the last few years but only one is thought to have been shot down."

NATO Forces Mistakenly Kill Afghan. The AP (2/18) reports, "NATO-led forces in southern Afghanistan shot to death an Afghan civilian mistaken for a suicide bomber because of twine and straps protruding from his jacket, the alliance said Sunday. ... It was the second such civilian shooting Saturday in Kandahar." CNN.com (2/17) also notes that "NATO troops in southern Afghanistan shot and killed a man they mistakenly thought was a suicide bomber."

LATimes Says Bush Focus On Afghanistan "Heartening." The Los Angeles Times (2/18, 850K) editorializes, "It's not quite fair to call Afghanistan the war the administration forgot. But it was heartening last week to hear President Bush give a speech about that other war for the first time in his second term, to acknowledge the growing Taliban threat and to call for a renewed U.S. and NATO commitment. Still, military power alone won't make Afghanistan secure — the country must also undergo substantial economic development. ... Bush will not get the full support and cooperation of NATO allies until he demonstrates that reconstruction is not a second priority to fighting Al Qaeda."

US Military Develops Nonlethal Beam. In the Washington Post (2/18, B2, 690K) Outlook section, Slate writer William Saletan writes, "The U.S. military just invented a weapon that fires a beam of searing pain. ... No one is harmed. The beam's energy waves penetrate just 1/64 of an inch into your body, heating your skin like microwaves. They inflame your nerve endings without burning you. This could be the future of warfare: less bloodshed, more pain." However, the invention "makes pain more essential to military operations -- and easier to inflict. To achieve the desired 'repel effect,' I have to make you suffer. Knowing that your agony will be brief and leave no physical damage makes the weapon easier to fire."

Several Fired US Attorneys Were Investigating GOP Officials. The Washington Post (2/18, A11, Eggen, 690K) reports, "All but one of the U.S. attorneys recently fired by the Justice Department had positive job reviews before they were dismissed, but many ran into political trouble with Washington over issues ranging from immigration to the death penalty, according to prosecutors, congressional aides and others familiar with the cases." The Post adds "it has also become clear that most of the prosecutors were overseeing significant public-corruption investigations at the time they were asked to leave. Four of the probes target Republican politicians or their supporters, prosecutors and other officials said. The emerging details stand in contrast to repeated statements from the Justice Department that six of the Republican-appointed prosecutors were dismissed because of poor performance." Carol S. Lam in San Diego "oversaw the probe that resulted in the guilty plea of then-Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, a Republican. Two others connected to that case, including a former senior CIA official, were indicted two days before Lam left the job on Thursday." Daniel G. Bogden in Nevada and Paul K. Charlton in Arizona "were also in the midst of investigations targeting current or former Republican members of Congress when they were fired."

Griffin Will Not Seek Confirmation As Arkansas US Attorney. The AP (2/18, Gambrell) reports, "An interim U.S. attorney says a 'partisan circus' over his recess appointment makes it impossible for him to receive fair consideration, and he will not seek Senate confirmation to his Arkansas district. … However, Tim Griffin can remain at the post without confirmation under a new provision in the Patriot Act that allow recess appointments to last until the end of a president's term, instead of 120 days. That provision was included in the act's reauthorization last year." The AP continues, "The new rules became fuel for hearings when the Democratic-controlled Congress took power this year, with Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., questioning Griffin's appointment. … 'They should do the right thing and name another interim appointment,' said Michael Teague, a spokesman for Pryor. 'Let's get back to the way the founding fathers saw this process working.'" The AP adds, "Griffin left open whether he would remain in the position until the end of President Bush's term, but he said he has not looked for another job. … 'The upside is I'm here in the job and will remain in the job until such time the White House asks me to move on,' Griffin said Friday."

More Commentary. The Baltimore Sun (2/18) editorializes, "Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty just couldn't tell a lie. So when pressed during Senate hearings on the unceremonious firing of seven U.S. attorneys, Mr. McNulty had to concede that politics did play a role in dumping the chief federal prosecutor in Little Rock, Ark. The replacement, J. Timothy Griffin, was an FOK - friend of Karl. That's Karl Rove, the president's top political adviser and key Republican strategist. … You can't get any more political than that." The Sun continues, With Arkansas Sen. Mark Pryor raising serious questions about the appointment, Mr. Griffin wisely withdrew his name for permanent consideration. … Mr. McNulty and his boss at the Justice Department, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, should stop conning the American people. Their explanation for the firings - that they were 'performance-related' - is pure poppycock. Congress should move swiftly to repeal an aspect of the Patriot Act that gives the attorney general the power to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for an indefinite period of time, which could result in someone serving in this powerful post without congressional consent. Mr. Gonzales doesn't deserve this power. … His recent firings show what matters to Mr. Gonzales, and it isn't performance:" The Sun concludes, "U.S. attorneys have enormous power. By politicizing the appointments, the Bush administration has diminished their ability to fairly and judiciously carry out their responsibility."

New Minnesota US Attorney Profiled. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (2/18, Tomson) reports, "Rachel Paulose is a U.S. attorney who is comfortable quoting Bible verses. She believes it is a blessing to live in a country where a person can take on crime, terror and corruption. … The daughter of immigrants who support her every move, she works herself hard, shorts herself on sleep and sacrifices her social life in the pursuit of justice." The Pioneer-Press continues, "At 33, she's the youngest current U.S. attorney and the first woman to serve in the position in Minnesota. … She manages some 50 assistant U.S. attorneys in an office that examines and seeks to successfully prosecute the most repulsive and harmful of crimes. … She points with pride to the more-than-20-year prison sentences obtained by her office in three child pornography cases during the past six months and then, referring to predators as yet uncaught, she promises: 'We're going to find you, hold you, and you're going to do a long time in federal prison.' … 'The crimes have become more depraved, more heinous, and the victims are subjected to particularly sadistic forms of abuse that the general public would find unimaginable,' she says. 'The reality is that good people don't know about this because they're not online looking.'" The Pioneer Press adds, "In just 10 years, Paulose has compiled an impressive record. After graduating from Yale Law School, she snagged a sought-after position in Minneapolis as a law clerk to James Loken, chief judge of the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. She worked for four years in private practice for the Dorsey & Whitney law firm and served in the U.S. Justice Department as an Attorney General's Honors Program trial attorney for the civil rights division. … She also prosecuted criminal and civil cases as an assistant U.S. attorney for Minnesota; served as senior counsel to Acting Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, and as the Justice Department's special counsel for health care fraud. … Nevertheless, her appointment a year ago as U.S. attorney for the District of Minnesota was headline news and raised a few eyebrows. … The appointment departed from normal practice. For the first time in decades, an interim U.S. attorney was sent directly from the Department of Justice to fill the job in Minnesota. Traditionally, interim appointees have come from within the Minnesota office, promoted either from first assistant U.S. attorney or chief of the criminal division."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Woman Jailed For Throwing Soft Drink On Highway. The Washington Post (2/18, A1, Vargas) reports, "To the locals, it's the 'McMissile' case. … And like the name, the details of it spill forth like a bad joke: A woman is driving north on Interstate 95. Three kids squirm in the back seat, and her sister, six months pregnant and having early contractions, sits in the front. The stress starts to simmer. Traffic slows, then crawls, then creeps. More stress. A car cuts in front of her, then scoots away. A short time later, it darts in again. She can no longer take it. She veers onto the shoulder and speeds up. Wham! She tosses a large McDonald's cup filled with ice into the other car." The Post continues, "No one was injured, but the cup launcher, Jessica Hall, 25, of Jacksonville, N.C., was charged and convicted by a Stafford County jury of maliciously throwing a missile into an occupied vehicle, a felony in Virginia. The instructions given to the jury said that 'any physical object can be considered a missile. A missile can be propelled by any force, including throwing.' … Hall, a mother of three young children whose husband is serving his third tour in Iraq, has spent more than a month in jail." The Post adds, "The jury sentenced her to two years in prison, the minimum, and a judge will formally impose a sentence Wednesday. Under state law, the judge can only decrease the jury's sentence."

Charges Against PG County School Official Raise Questions About Yonkers Tenure. The New York Journal News (2/18, Wilson) reports, "Former schools chief Andre Hornsby burst on the scene in Yonkers nine years ago with a cadre of Texas educators, fresh from helping transform the Houston school system. He came east to boost test scores and bridge the digital divide in city schools." The News continues, "With the aid of Cynthia Joffrion, the Texas technology maven who joined him in Yonkers, new computers flooded into classrooms while Hornsby's leadership helped raise test scores. Throughout his stormy 23-month tenure, however, Hornsby was dogged with questions about his dealings with technology vendors." The News adds, "It turns out that Joffrion, assistant superintendent for technology support services under Hornsby, was among his accusers, according to an FBI affidavit obtained by The Journal News. Joffrion in 1999 told authorities that Hornsby had ordered Yonkers employees to send new computers to his relatives. But then-Westchester District Attorney Jeanine Pirro's investigation of those allegations never led to charges after Hornsby caught wind of the probe. … In hindsight, Hornsby's Yonkers troubles seemed to presage what was to come following his hiring in 2003 as chief executive officer of the school system in Prince George's County, Md., the nation's 18th largest district. It borders Washington and has more than 130,000 students and a budget exceeding $1 billion. Hornsby now awaits trial on a 16-count federal indictment arising from a scheme in which prosecutors say he awarded lucrative technology contracts that benefited himself and close associates."

Fitzgerald Faulted For Focusing Solely On Libby. In a 2,200-word op-ed for the Washington Post (2/18, B1, 690K) Victoria Toensing, a deputy assistant attorney general in the Reagan administration, writes, "Could someone please explain to me why Scooter Libby is the only person on trial in the Valerie Plame leak investigation? … If we accept" Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald's "low threshold for bringing a criminal case, then why stop at Libby? This investigation has enough questionable motives and shadowy half-truths and flawed recollections to fill a court docket for months. So here are my own personal bills of indictment…" Toensing goes on to criticize several individuals and agencies involved in the Plame leak, including former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer whose testimony "about conversations differs from reporters' testimony, just as Libby's does."

Drug Firms Charged With Medicaid Fraud. The Trenton Times (NJ) (2/18, Cohen) reports, "The nation's big drugmakers have been systematically overcharging the Medicaid health-care program for the poor, reaping billions of dollars in illegal windfalls at the expense of the taxpayers, according to federal officials, members of Congress and a watchdog group." The Times continues, "Drugmakers are required by law to provide Medicaid with the same discounts they offer to big managed-care plans and hospital chains, but they have been disguis ing those prices, Ronald Tenpas, a U.S. associate deputy attorney general, told the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform earlier this month. … 'We are not seeing isolated instances of misconduct, but repeated practices within the industry that have resulted in significant loses to federal health-care programs,' he said." The Times adds, "The federal and state governments have had some success in recapturing money from the drug makers: During the last six years, government bodies have recouped about $3.9 billion in civil damages and criminal penalties stemming from 16 legal settlements involving Medicaid. … The settlements involve some of the biggest names in the industry, including Pfizer, Schering-Plough, GlaxoSmithKline, AstraZeneca and Bayer. Those cases dealt with overcharging the government for cancer, asthma, cholesterol, allergy and seizure medications. .. .But the scope of the problem could be much bigger. There are 150 pending federal investigations centering on Medicaid and two other government health-care programs that could find billions of dollars more in pharmaceutical company fraud."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

More Than 100 Inmates Have Died At Texas Jail In Past Six Years. The Houston Chronicle (2/18, McVicker) reports, "A Houston Chronicle review of state and county records reveals that from January 2001 through December 2006, at least 101 inmates — an average of about 17 a year — have died while in the custody of the Harris County Jail. In 2006 alone, after three consecutive years of failing to be in compliance with state standards, the jail recorded 22 in-custody deaths." The Chronicle continues, "At the time of their deaths, at least 72 of the inmates — more than 70 percent — were awaiting court hearings and had yet to be convicted of the crimes that led to their incarceration." The Chronicle adds, "Records and interviews show that almost one-third of the deaths involve questions of inadequate responses from guards and staff, failure by jail officials to provide inmates with essential medical and psychiatric care and medications, unsanitary conditions, and two allegations of physical abuse by guards. … In at least 13 cases, relatives or documents raise questions over whether inmates received needed medications prior to their deaths. Additionally, 11 of the deaths involve infections and illnesses suggesting sanitation problems. In 10 other cases, death reports suggest possible neglect, as in the Mack case." The Chronicle notes, "None of the records reviewed, however, concludes that jail staff contributed directly to the 101 deaths since 2001. During the same period, the Dallas County jail recorded 70 deaths. … Harris County Sheriff Tommy Thomas declined the Chronicle's request for an interview. He did reply to written questions, though he would not comment on specific cases, citing confidentiality laws."

Maryland AG Pushes Cold-Case Bill. The Baltimore Sun (2/18, Stiehm) reports, "Maryland's attorney general is exploring the creation of a cold-case squad to investigate unsolved homicides, with an emphasis on racial crimes dating back to the civil rights era. … 'Having a civil rights component to this office affords us the opportunity to look into current and past civil rights violations,' said Douglas F. Gansler, who took office last month and has announced plans to increase prosecutions of environmental violators and gang members." The Sun continues, "Gansler met Friday with top aides to discuss the idea of the new squad. The investigative unit would examine unsolved homicides from police files around the state, using modern forensic and DNA techniques, he said. … Compared to states in the Deep South, Maryland has fewer outstanding civil rights cases. Gansler said a survey is needed to count feasible cold cases with civil rights implications. … 'If a lot of these people are still alive, witnesses and perpetrators, and if we have the ability to pursue them, the government has the onus to do so,' Gansler said." The Sun adds, "The investigations would include race-based homicides and cases of civil rights workers who might have been killed because they were identified with the movement. The unit's unsolved cases could also encompass desecrations of synagogues or other houses of worship. … A handful of states have taken similar steps in establishing cold-case or civil rights divisions, including Florida. Alabama intends to add a cold-case unit this year that looks into civil rights crimes and review the fatal shooting in 1965 of a young black man, Jimmy Lee Jackson, that involved state troopers. … A bill before Congress, with co-sponsors including Rep. John Lewis of Georgia and Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, both Democrats, would require the Justice Department and the FBI to create cold-case units dedicated to civil rights."

Legends Surrounding Till Case Examined. The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (2/18, Mitchell) reports, "Few homicide cases in this nation's history have been shrouded by as much legend as the 1955 killing of Emmett Till. … Now, more than a half century after the 14-year-old's slaying, prosecutors are preparing to present the case to a Leflore County grand jury, separating fact from fiction, what's known from what may never be known. … 'Because of its importance to the civil rights movement, it has this mythic quality like the Kennedy assassination,' said David Beito, a University of Alabama professor who's an expert in the Till case. 'You get all sorts of conspiracies.'" The Clarion-Ledger continues, "Some of those legends took root not long after the black youth from Chicago was abducted, beaten and shot to death after he reportedly wolf-whistled at Carolyn Bryant at a grocery store in Money. Some have sprung up since. … Less than a month after Till's Aug. 28, 1955, slaying, an all-white jury acquitted her then-husband, Roy, and his half-brother, J.W. Milam - only to see them confess their guilt months later to Look magazine. The half-brothers have since died." The Clarion-Ledger adds, "In 2004, the Justice Department opened an investigation into Till's killing. A grand jury that will be impaneled in March is expected to take up the case. … The FBI's more than 8,000-page report on the Till case sheds new light on the legends surrounding the killing, and in some cases, contradicts them."

Seed Rivals Worried About Monsanto Deal. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (2/18, Contact) reports, "Six months after Monsanto Co. agreed to pay $1.5 billion for Delta and Pine Land -- the largest cottonseed company in the country -- the pot bubbles with intrigue." The Appeal continues, "Producers don't seem as worried as much as Monsanto rivals Switzerland-based Syngenta AG and Pioneer Hi-Bred International Inc., owned by DuPont. … Both have licensing agreements with D&PL and don't relish the idea of having to cooperate with Monsanto. … But what is really at stake is this: Monsanto owns more transgenetic cotton traits than any company in the world. If it also owns the largest cottonseed company, it would control the most cotton varieties, transgenes and -- in this case -- the herbicide Roundup, central to many recent biotech advances in agriculture. … 'Farmers are not very happy unless they have stock in Monsanto,' said Bill Meredith, longtime U.S. Department of Agriculture cotton breeder in Stoneville, Miss. 'They fear they will have to pay more to get a product not as good as what they've got.'" The Appeal notes, "The Department of Justice was expected to rule on the antitrust issue by Wednesday. Now, it looks like the deal will close by spring. … If the merger goes through, Monsanto will control 85 percent of the mainstream bloodlines of cotton and every kind of cotton planted in the Mid-South. … 'The proposed Monsanto acquisition of Delta & Pine Land is clearly anti-competitive,' said Doyle Karr, DuPont spokesman. 'We have serious concerns about the impact it would have on farmers, the agricultural industry and ultimately consumers.' … While Syngenta says it is not engaged in a grass-roots effort to defeat the sale, it has told the Justice Department and others that it doesn't 'believe it's in the best interest of the growers,' said Anne Burt, spokeswoman."

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Urged To Make ANWR The US Strategic Petroleum Reserve. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/18, B7, 690K) Gal Luft, executive director of the Institute for the Analysis of Global Security, writes, "In his State of the Union address last month, President Bush announced his intention to expand the Strategic Petroleum Reserve as a way to strengthen America's energy security. … In an increasingly unstable world, the Strategic Petroleum Reserve is a much-needed insurance policy. But the way the president chose to expand it is ill-considered." Luft continues, "The administration should consider a radically different and much cheaper approach to boosting our security: make ANWR our strategic reserve. … Reframing the issue to cast the refuge as an emergency stockpile rather than a source of production might well change the politics."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US Urged To Help Cities Track Illegal Gun Sales. The Las Vegas Sun (2/18) editorializes, "Earlier this month we wrote in support of an effort by the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department to track the origin of guns used in crimes. The department had traced several such weapons to a gun shop in Sparks, just outside of Reno. … Such efforts are undertaken to determine whether gun shops are permitting 'straw purchases' - those made with the intent of giving or selling the guns to criminals. Support for these investigations comes from the Mayors Against Illegal Guns Coalition, which counts 150 U.S. mayors in its membership, including Geno Martini of Sparks." The Sun continues, "A co-founder of the group, New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg, last year sent police investigators into many of his city's gun shops. As the requirement for gun shop operators to be vigilant against straw purchases comes under federal law, all Bloomberg could do was press civil suits against those found to be in violation. … He hoped the Justice Department would take it from there, and file criminal charges where the evidence was strongest. But not only did the Justice Department refuse to bring charges, it also warned Bloomberg about "potential legal liabilities" the city could face if it continued such investigations." The Sun concludes, "Straw purchases are a mounting problem in communities across the country. The federal government should assist cities as they try to protect their citizens from the danger presented by criminals who can easily obtain guns from seemingly legitimate purchasers."

DOJ_NMG_0133241

IMMIGRATION:

NAFTA's Failure To Curtail Illegal Immigration Examined. In a "Week in review" piece for the New York Times (2/18, WK4, 1.16M) Louis Uchitelle writes, "The North American Free Trade Agreement, enacted by Congress 14 years ago, held out an alluring promise: the agreement would reduce illegal immigration from Mexico. Mexicans, the argument went, would enjoy the prosperity and employment that the trade agreement would undoubtedly generate — and not feel the need to cross the border into the United States. But today the number of illegal migrants has only continued to rise. Why didn't Nafta curb this immigration? … A major factor lies in the assumptions made in drafting the trade agreement, assumptions about the way governments would behave (that is, rationally) and the way markets would respond (rationally, as well). Neither happened, yet Nafta remains the model for trade agreements with developing Latin countries, including the Central American Free Trade Agreement."

Georgia Legislators Planning Further Restrictions On Illegals. The Washington Times/AP (2/18) reports Georgia lawmakers "have been working around the edges to crack down again on aliens in the country illegally. Georgia made international headlines last spring when it passed some of the toughest laws in the U.S. targeting illegal aliens within its borders. Those laws included provisions to sanction employers who knowingly hire illegal aliens and deny some state services -- such as nonemergency medical care and unemployment checks -- to adults who can't verify that they're in the country legally. A flurry of smaller proposals has been moving through the state legislature this year, including several that would make it tougher for illegal aliens to drive in Georgia."

NYTimes Criticizes Congressional Border Security Measures. The New York Times (2/18, WK11, 1.16M), inan editorial, writes, "The country has summoned great energy to confront the immigration problem, but most of it has been misplaced, crudely and unevenly applied. It seeks not to solve the conundrum of a broken immigration system, but to subdue, in a million ways, the vulnerable men and women who are part of it. Government at all levels is working to keep unwanted immigrants in their place — on the other side of the border, in detention or in fear, toiling silently in the underground economy without recourse to the laws and protections the native-born expect. … What little the last Congress did about immigration was focused on appeasing hard-line conservatives by appearing to seal the border. President Bush's new budget continues that approach, seeking 3,000 more Border Patrol officers and another $1 billion for a 700-mile fence, adding to the billions spent to militarize the border since the 1990s. That still isn't enough to build the fence and it hasn't controlled the illegal flow; you need more visas and better workplace enforcement to do that."

Rep. Poe Raises Profile Of Border Agents' Prosecution. The Houston Chronicle (2/18, Mittelstadt) reports, "Flip on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight show these days and chances are pretty good you'll see Texas Congressman Ted Poe lamenting the fate of two ex-Border Patrol agents imprisoned for shooting a Mexican drug trafficker." The Chronicle continues, "For months, the Republican from Humble has relentlessly championed the agents' case on cable-TV shows and behind the scenes, helping foment public outrage directed at the White House and President Bush's appointees in the Justice and Homeland Security departments. … Poe, who spent 22 years as a hard-nosed criminal court judge in Houston and eight years before that as a Harris County prosecutor, seems an unlikely choice to be carrying the banner for two convicts. … 'It surprises some that I am seen to be on the side of the defendants,' Poe acknowledged in an interview. … But the lawmaker, in his second term, said his stance stems directly from his experiences on the bench and at the prosecution table. … 'I know the power of the prosecution and how powerful they are,' said Poe, who argues that the Justice Department went to extraordinary lengths to prosecute ex-agents Jose Compean and Ignacio Ramos for wounding the drug trafficker in a 2005 border altercation." The Chronicle adds, "Though the two men were duly convicted in a jury trial in El Paso, Poe contends the game was rigged against the defendants because of 'back-room deals' given by the prosecution to get the trafficker and other involved Border Patrol agents to testify. He also questions whether information was withheld from the jury. … And Poe is uneasy about what he views as Mexican interference into the case, citing letters written by Mexican consular officials seeking prosecution."

TAX:

Senate Legislation Would Crack Down On Hedge Fund Use Of Tax Havens. The Washington Post/Bloomberg (2/18, A10, Drajem, Donmoyer) reports Sens. Carl Levin, Barack Obama and Norm Coleman "proposed legislation that would target what they say is $100 billion a year in tax revenue lost each year because of overseas tax havens, in part by forcing hedge funds to track their foreign investors. The measure would impose tougher requirements on U.S. taxpayers using offshore secrecy jurisdictions, give the U.S. Treasury the authority to take action against foreign jurisdictions that impede tax enforcement, stiffen penalties against abusers and close offshore trust loopholes," according to a summary of the bill released by Levin.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Uses Radio Address To Push Health Insurance Proposal. The New York Times (2/18, A22, 1.16M) reports that in his weekly radio address President Bush "urged Congress…to create a tax break that would help people buy private health insurance outside the workplace. Repeating points made in his State of the Union address, Mr. Bush said that he wanted to create a standard tax deduction for health insurance and that he would 'continue to reach across party lines to enact common-sense health care reforms.' … Mr. Bush said he was pleased to receive a letter this week from 10 senators — 5 Democrats and 5 Republicans — who wanted to work with him on the nation's health care system."

Schwarzenegger Health Insurance Plan Could Hurt Middle Class Families. The Los Angeles Times (2/18, A1, Rau, 850K) reports that although Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's health insurance plan is meant to help those who cannot afford their own health insurance, "compelling everyone to obtain insurance -- the linchpin of his plan -- may not work for many Californians in need of aid, according to health policy experts. Under the governor's plan, nearly 1 million middle-class people would be caught in a tough bind, those experts say: They earn too much to qualify for the insurance subsidies Schwarzenegger wants the state to provide but not enough to afford comprehensive coverage. Only those whose yearly earnings are less than 250% of the federal poverty level -- about $25,525 for individuals and $51,625 for families of four -- would qualify for the proposed subsidies."

New Democratic Majorities' "Iron-Fisted Tactics" Draw GOP Complaints. The Washington Post (2/18, A4, Layton, 690K) reports that though Democrats "pledged to bring courtesy to the Capitol when they assumed control of Congress," they have "used its muscle to force through its agenda in the House and sideline Republicans. And after an initial burst of lawmaking, the Democratic juggernaut has kept on rolling. Of nine major bills passed by the House since the 110th Congress began, Republicans have been allowed to make amendments to just one, a measure directing federal research into additives to biofuels. … Last week, the strong-arming continued during the most important debate the Congress has faced yet -- the discussion about the Iraq war. Democrats initially said they would allow Republicans to propose one alternative to the resolution denouncing a troop buildup but, days later, they thought better of it." The post adds that Republican leaders "have been complaining daily about being pushed to the margins," however "significant numbers of House Republicans have voted along with Democrats on the legislation passed so far -- a fact that somewhat mutes criticism about iron-fisted tactics."

Liberals' Resurgence Attributed By Some To "Conservative Slump." In a "Week in Review" piece for the New York Times (2/18, WK1, 1.16M), Mark Leibovich writes, "These are balmy days on the American left — genuine, uncharacteristic sunniness unpolluted by some fluky political climate change. There is even talk of a — stutter, clear-throat, perish-thought — liberal resurgence. … The chicken-egg riddle is how much this alleged 'liberal moment' bespeaks genuine momentum for the left and how much stems from anti-Bush, antiwar, anti-Republican fervor. In other words, liberal moment or conservative slump?"

Moles Removed From Bush's Face Were Benign. ABC World News (2/17, story 5, :10, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "The White House said late today that two moles removed from President Bush's face yesterday were not cancerous. Tests came back on firming both of the moles on the President's left temple were benign. Mr. Bush has had several lesions removed before, growths his doctors link to sun exposure." CNN.com (2/17) reports White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said Bush "has a 1-inch scab on his left temple that is expected to heal in a week to 10 days."

GAO Faults Administration's Electronic Medical Records Privacy Strategy. The New York Times (2/18, A22, Pear, 1.16M) reports that the GAO has found the "Bush administration has no clear strategy to protect the privacy of patients as it promotes the use of electronic medical records throughout the nation's health care system." A GAO report "said the administration had a jumble of studies and vague policy statements but no overall strategy to ensure that privacy protections would be built into computer networks linking insurers, doctors, hospitals and other health care providers." The Times notes that President Bush "has repeatedly called for the creation of such networks, through which health care providers could share information on patients. … In response to the president's plea, federal officials have developed elaborate plans for what they describe as 'a nationwide health information network,'" but the GAO "said the administration had taken only rudimentary steps to safeguard sensitive personal data that would be exchanged over the network."

Latino Legislative Caucuses Said To Have "Outlived Their Usefulness." Los Angeles Times (2/18, 850K) columnist Gregory Rodriguez writes, "You go, Loretta Sanchez. Just keep walking away from that Congressional Hispanic Caucus. No, not just because of the nasty name caucus chief Rep. Joe Baca allegedly called you. B ut because you'll be undermining a political practice that will increasingly hurt Mexican American statewide candidates in the most politically powerful states in the nation. … The moment provides an opportunity to ponder whether Latino legislative caucuses haven't outlived their usefulness. I say it's time to abolish them. It's not because I stand in principled opposition to the idea of ethnic solidarity. It's just that both the demographic calculus and the political rationale that gave rise to Latino caucuses have disappeared. And as Latinos move toward becoming the largest ethnic group in the two most populous states, such caucuses become a political liability to statewide candidates vying to represent all constituencies."

OTHER NEWS:

Republican Presidential Hopefuls Vie For Conservatives' Support. Presidential candidates from both parties are on the campaign trail this weekend, but as the CBS Evening News (2/17, story 4, 2:45, Smith, 7.66M) reported, "all the Republican candidates are wooing one particularly prized pool of voters." CBS (Pinkston) reported that a new CBS News poll gives Rudy Giuliani a "wide lead" in a head-to-head matchup with Sen. John McCain, with Republicans favoring Giuliani 50%-21%, more than "a two-to-one margin. Most surprising, Giuliani also solidly beats McCain among conservatives." Republican pollster David Winston: "There's this really strong image of Giuliani in the first 24 hours, in terms of 9/11." Pinkston: "Winston thinks Giuliani's performance in that crisis may overcome conservative opposition to his moderate positions on issues such as gun control and abortion. … But Giuliani shouldn't count on Tony Perkins' support. He heads the Family Research Council, a conservative Christian group." Perkins: "There are certain threshold issues of being pro-life, and supporting the sanctity of human life, then you're not going to get the support of social conservatives." Pinkston: "Conservatives also have their doubts about McCain for his moderate positions on immigration and gun control. And they question" Mitt Romney's "commitment to the anti-abortion cause. While most of the media spotlight on the GOP has focused on McCain, Giuliani, and Romney, there's another name from the Republican Party's glory days, who might get even more support from social conservatives: former House Speaker Newt Gingrich. Gingrich says it's too early to announce, but when his name is added to polls, he immediately becomes a strong contender."

Chait Says Giuliani Winning "Cult Following" Among Conservatives. In his Los Angeles Times (2/18, 850K) column, Jonathan Chait writes that "Giuliani's presidential campaign is starting to win a cult following among conservatives. It's not his position on domestic policy that's doing it -- he has nothing to say about that. Lord knows it's not his social issue positions, which even his strongest backers acknowledge are his political weak point. No, he has somehow built a record as a foreign policy guru despite having no experience beyond the municipal level. … He has a tough guy persona. He expresses extremely strong disapproval for enemies of the United States. (For instance, Giuliani has bragged about asking President Bush to let him personally execute Osama bin Laden.) All this makes Republicans swoon."

Acquaintances Reflect On Romney. In the second installment of its Outlook series on how "classmates, colleagues and competitors from the past" view the presidential candidates, the Washington Post (2/18, B1, 690K) runs a series of comments from those who know and have known Romney.

McCain Faces Iraq Questions During First Campaign Trip To Iowa. ABC World News (2/17, story 4, :10, Avila, 8.78M) reported Sen. John McCain "was on the campaign trial in Iowa, where he called the resolution denouncing the troop increase insulting to the public and the soldiers. This is McCain's first visit to Iowa since forming a presidential exploratory committee."

The Washington Post (2/18, A8, Balz, 690K) reports the Iraq war "followed" McCain to Iowa, where he "faced a series of skeptical questions about the lack of progress in the conflict and whether he or anyone has a plan for success. It became clear from the opening minutes of his first meeting of the day just how much the presidential aspirations of the senator, who is one of the leading advocates of President Bush's troop-increase policy, may be tied to events in Iraq." Throughout the hour-long town hall meeting, McCain "walked a line between strong advocacy for the troop buildup as the best chance to avoid a bloodletting in Iraq and defensiveness over the lack of progress and the growing impatience on the part of the public over what he said has been a badly mismanaged war effort dating back years." McCain said, "I know how tough it is for the American people. I know how frustrated Americans are. I know how saddened we are when we lose our most precious treasure. I understand your frustration. But I also want to tell you that I could not be honest with you without telling you that I believe if we fail, the consequences of failure are catastrophic and there would be genocide and chaos."

The New York Times (2/18, A30, Nagourney, 1.16M) said McCain began "testing one of the biggest questions so far of the presidential campaign: Can he win as an all-out supporter of the war in Iraq?" He "attacked Senate Democrats for what he called 'a political stunt' in trying to join the House in passing a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send more troops to Baghdad," but also "belittled the White House for falsely raising hopes by asserting early American successes in the war."

South Carolina Columnist Says Brownback Will Become "Major Figure." In South Carolina's The State (2/18), Lee Bandy writes that when, "three weeks ago, an estimated 350 Republican Party activists attended a luncheon in Columbia for GOP presidential hopeful Sam Brownback," many came "out of curiosity." But he "didn't disappoint his audience, made up mostly of religious conservatives. Members punctuated the air with shouts of 'amen' and 'praise the Lord.' It sounded more like a revival service than a political gathering. Many conservatives and religious leaders view Brownback as a serious candidate" for the presidency, and there is "little doubt he will become a major figure in U.S. public life and an increasingly critical player in its governing coalitions."

Clinton Says She Would Rather Lose Support Than Make False Apology On Iraq. The New York Times (2/18, A30, Healy, 1.16M) reports that "antiwar anger" at Sen. Hillary Clinton "has festered, and yesterday morning Mrs. Clinton rolled out a new response to those demanding contrition" on her 2002 Iraq war authorization vote. Clinton "said she was willing to lose support from voters rather than make an apology she did not believe in. 'If the most important thing to any of you is choosing someone who did not cast that vote or has said his vote was a mistake, then there are others to choose from,' Mrs. Clinton told an audience in Dover, N.H., in a veiled reference" to John Edwards and Sen. Barack Obama. Clinton's "decision not to apologize is regarded so seriously within her campaign that some advisers believe it will be remembered as a turning point in the race: either ultimately galvanizing voters against her (if she loses the nomination), or highlighting her resolve and her willingness to buck Democratic conventional wisdom (if she wins). At the same time, the level of Democratic anger has surprised some of her allies and advisers, and her campaign is worried about how long it will last and how much damage it might cause her."

"Old Enemies" On The Right Mobilize Against Clinton. The Los Angeles Times (2/18, Braun, 850K) reports on its front page that "old enemies" of Clinton "are out in force. Just weeks after she joined the Democratic Party's flock of presidential contenders, Clinton is being targeted by conservative and Republican-allied activists intent on derailing her campaign before the start of next year's primaries. They have surfaced with a flurry of planned projects: a Michael Moore-style documentary film, book-length exposes, and websites such as StopHerNow.com and StopHillaryPAC.com. Conservative admirers of the Swift Vets and POWs for Truth media blitz that helped torpedo Democratic Sen. John F. Kerry's presidential candidacy in 2004 are now agitating to 'Swift-boat' Clinton." The Times says the "emerging moves" against Clinton "reflect the accelerated pace of the 2008 race and conservatives' growing conviction that she poses a formidable threat that requires fast and early footwork."

Reid's Son Joins Clinton Team. The Washington Post (2/18, A2, Cillizza, Murray, 690K) reports that while Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "has pledged not to pick among his many friends" running for the presidential nomination, Clinton has "found the next-best thing -- signing his eldest son, Rory, as both the chair of her campaign in the Silver State and an adviser on Western issues. Rory Reid currently serves as the chairman of the Clark County Commission -- that's Las Vegas's county -- and is a past chairman of the Nevada state party."

Obama Hits South Carolina And Virginia, Collecting Kaine Endorsement. The Washington Post (2/18, A9, Shear, 690K) reports Sen. Barack Obama "took his presidential campaign to the heart of the Deep South for the first time this weekend, tailoring his campaign message to associate himself with the civil rights movement. With a Kenyan father who was not descended from African slaves, Obama is unlike Southern black candidates, steeped in the slavery and civil rights struggles that tore at the region for more than a century. Neither is he like the white politicians, whose skin color automatically disqualifies them from the black experience. And so, on his maiden presidential visit to South Carolina and Virginia, Obama was greeted with not only enthusiasm but also a bit of curiosity." After addressing a "primarily black crowd of about 2,000" at historically black Claflin University in Orangeburg, South Carolina, "Obama and his wife, Michelle, traveled to Richmond and accepted the endorsement of Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine." Obama "then continued a busy day by addressing more than 4,000 Democratic activists at the state party's annual Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner."

The Washington Times (2/18, McLaughlin, 88K) says Kaine said in his endorsement, "I am very happy to say it is a very simple decision for me in terms of what I think is important in my assessment of where the nation is to endorse Sen. Barack Obama as our nation's next president." Kaine said his "early endorsement was a sign of his enthusiasm for Mr. Obama. His endorsement of the first-term senator made Mr. Kaine the first governor to publicly endorse any presidential candidate."

Obama Said To Represent Growing Population Of African Immigrants. In a Los Angeles Times (2/18, 850K) op-ed, University of California Santa Cruz associate professor of literature Louis Chude-Sokei writes that while "not quite able to pass for white," Obama "has been able to pass for African American. He is biracial, but not white; black, but not African American; American but not African. What has entranced the country more than his somewhat vague policies is Obama's challenge to conventional racial and cultural categories. … But there is a third side to Obama -- and also to the politics of racial passing in America. The population of African immigrants" in the US "is rapidly growing."

Edwards Addresses Las Vegas Union Group. The AP (2/17, Nakashima) reports John Edwards "took his plan for universal health care to union-strong Las Vegas on Saturday, visiting the local branch of the electrical workers labor group to which his brother belongs." It was Edwards' ninth visit to the state since the 2004 election, "including five times last year before swinging by again in December to announce he was running for president."

Richardson Vows To Exit Iraq, Shut Down Guantanamo Bay. The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/18, Rayno) reports, "On his second day in office, Democratic Presidential candidate Bill Richardson said yesterday he would shut down Guantanamo Bay detention camp for suspected terrorists. 'The first day I would get us out of Iraq,' the New Mexico governor said, adding he would also close Abu Grab prison where Iraqi prisoners were tortured." Addressing the Concord City Democrats, Richardson said that Abu Ghraib "is 'one of the reasons this country has so many problems in the Muslim world.'" Richardson "joked about his low profile compared to other Democratic hopefuls, but seriously called for all Democratic candidates to pledge not to attack each other. He touted his experience both in foreign policy and at home as governor. Speaking of the current administration's foreign policy problems, Richardson said 'We can't afford to have a President without foreign policy training.'"

Dodd Stresses Experience In South Carolina Stop. South Carolina's The State (2/18, Michals) reports Sen. Christopher Dodd "got a warm response Saturday morning from S.C. Democrats when he brought up the issues of predatory lending, the war in Iraq and public vs. private education. 'People are expressing that sense of urgency about what we need to do at home and abroad,' Dodd said during a Columbia stop in his 2008 presidential campaign. 'I wanted to get out and be part of this debate.' … Dodd's rousing speech -- as local Democrats drank coffee and dined on grits, eggs and bacon -- often circled back to his 30 years of experience as a lawmaker. 'We've done six years of on-the-job training' with President Bush, Dodd said."

Will Sees Clinton, Edwards "Stumbling" As Giuliani Soars. In his Washington Post (2/18, B7, 690K) column, George Will writes, "Two Democratic presidential candidates with national campaign experience are stumbling. A Republican candidate who has run only municipal campaigns is confounding expectations, calling into question some assumptions about Republican voters. John Edwards has learned -- surely he did not know it when they were hired -- that two women employed by his campaign have Internet trails of vitriolic anti-Christian, and especially anti-Catholic, rants." And Sen. Hillary Clinton, "who says that a Democratic president would properly withdraw U.S. forces," is "not voting for a policy she considers proper." Meanwhile, predictions that support for Rudy Giuliani "will evaporate" among Republicans as more of his background becomes known is "becoming self-refuting." The "insistent reiteration of it during Giuliani's coast-to-coast campaigning is telling activist Republicans…the facts about Giuliani. And so far those facts are not causing a recoil from him."

States Continue Primary Calendar Maneuvering. Several reports focus on possible changes to the primary calendar. In California, the San Francisco Chronicle (2/18, Marinucci, 384K) runs a front-page story headlined "Early Primary -- Too Much Too Soon?" The Chronicle says Democrat Tom Vilsack warns that a February primary in the most-populous state "would not substitute for the lunch counters in Iowa, the house parties in New Hampshire and the barbecues in South Carolina where presidential nominations are really decided." The "intensive and personal vetting of candidates that has developed for generations in states such as Iowa and New Hampshire, Vilsack said, is one reason why mega-media states such as California, New Jersey and Illinois may not get the clout they hope for by moving up in the presidential primary schedule."

However, the California Senate "handily passed legislation last week to move California's presidential primary from June 2008 to Feb. 5, 2008," and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is expected to back it. The Los Angeles Times (2/18, Barabak, 850K) runs a question-and-answer piece on the possible move.

The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/18, Tuohy) looks at Nevada's jump to the early stages of the calendar, saying Democratic candidates "will be on unfamiliar political ground when they arrive" in the State Wednesday "for their first joint forum of the 2008 campaign. For the first time, the state that popularized quickie marriages, built a global reputation for its casinos and gave free range to places like the Bunny Ranch plans a caucus" for January 19, "between the Iowa caucuses and New Hampshire's leadoff" primary. Nevada state archivist Guy Louis Rocha said, "They're starting to see that Nevada is a player. All roads now head through Nevada. The fact is, Nevada's always been a backwater."

The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (2/18, Gilbert, 255K) says that whether the February 19 primary in Wisconsin will be a "big deal or an empty, anticlimactic ritual is anybody's guess. But at this point either outcome seems plausible." Both nominations "could be effectively wrapped up after only a few weeks of voting -- and before the campaign even gets to Wisconsin. … But that's not the only possible scenario. In the most wide-open presidential election in decades, with two or three politically robust, big-name contenders in each party backed up by a bevy of respectable long shots, a quick outcome is not guaranteed." If the race "doesn't peter out before Wisconsin, then a very different dynamic could come into play, one that might give the state a more meaningful role than it has had in many years."

Mayors To Press Democratic Hopefuls On Urban Agenda. The Washington Times (2/18, Debose, 88K) reports on its front page, "The nation's mayors say they will press the 2008 Democratic presidential hopefuls to address the needs of cities by crafting urban agendas early in their campaigns, but some candidates could already have an edge based on their records." According to US Conference of Mayors President Douglas Palmer, mayor of Trenton, New Jersey, Sen. Hillary Clinton "has the strongest record working with urban black mayors -- both as a senator and as first lady." Detroit Mayor Kwame Kilpatrick also called Clinton "a strong contender," crediting her and her husband "for the creation of new policies such as welfare-to-work, which he said helped cities get more residents off the poverty rolls." Kilpatrick said he has met with Clinton, Sen. Joseph Biden, and John Edwards.

Presidential Race Could Offer Twist On Traditional "Religion Gap." The New York Times Magazine (2/18, Rosen) examines the "religion gap" in US politics, the "fact that regular churchgoers identify by a wide margin with the G.O.P. Come election time, the personal religiosity of the Democratic candidates won't matter nearly as much as the positions they take in all the drearily familiar theaters of the culture war. What a matchup between churchgoing Democrats" like Sen. Hillary Clinton or Sen. Barack Obama "and secular-minded Republicans" like Rudy Giuliani or Sen. John McCain "may supply, though, is welcome moderation in our debates over issues like abortion, gay marriage and stem-cell research. God knows, both sides of the ideological divide have fundamentalists in need of taming."

WPost Says Campaigns Should Release Names Of "Bundlers." The Washington Post (2/18, B6, 690K) editorializes, "The 2008 presidential field has already begun to sort itself into candidates willing to disclose the identities of their big financiers and those who balk at providing this critical information. On the side of real disclosure" are Sens. Christopher Dodd, John McCain, and Barack Obama, as well as Mitt Romney and Tom Vilsack. "Declining to provide this information" are Sen. Hillary Clinton, John Edwards, and Rudy Giuliani. The "refusal of these candidates to live up to the standards set by President Bush during his two campaigns, as well as by 2004 Democratic nominee John F. Kerry, speaks volumes about their commitment -- or lack thereof -- to openness in government." The "names of bundlers should be a matter of public record."

Brooks Says New Science On Human Nature Confirms Conservatives' Assumptions. In his New York Times (2/18, WK12, 1.16M) column, David Brooks writes, "Over the past 30 years or so…belief in natural goodness has been discarded. It began to lose favor because of the failure of just about every social program that was inspired by it, from the communes to progressive education on up. But the big blow came at the hands of science. From the content of our genes, the nature of our neurons and the lessons of evolutionary biology, it has become clear that nature is filled with competition and conflicts of interest. … As Steven Pinker has put it, Hobbes was more right than Rousseau." Brooks adds, "This darker if more realistic view of human nature has led to a rediscovery of different moral codes and different political assumptions. … This is based on the idea that there is a universal human nature; that it has nasty, competitive elements; that we don't understand much about it; and that the conventions and institutions that have evolved to keep us from slitting each other's throats are valuable and are altered at great peril."

In Jerusalem, Rice "Presses Forward" With Israeli-Palestinian Effort. Under the headline, "Rice Finds Huge Gaps Between Israel, Palestinians," AFP (2/18, Millikin) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "is to meet with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmud Abbas as she presses forward with a new initiative to revive the moribund peace process." She "flew in to Israel Saturday vowing to press ahead with a risky summit with the two leaders, who are embroiled in a bitter feud over the presence of Islamist radicals in a soon-to-be-formed Palestinian government. … The highlight of her mission is to be her first three-way meeting with Abbas and Olmert on Monday. She has billed that as the kick-off of a long-awaited US initiative to revive negotiations on a peace deal and the creation of a Palestinian state." However, Rice's "plan has been overshadowed by controversy over a power-sharing deal reached last week between" Fatah and Hamas.

The New York Times (2/18, A20, 1.16M) calls Rice's meeting tomorrow with Olmert and Abbas "much anticipated" and "a possible first step to rejuvenating Middle East peace talks," but adds that the summit "seems likely to be overtaken by battles over a new Palestinian unity government." The three sides "were jostling for position before the meeting, with the Americans and Israelis saying that the new government must recognize Israel, and the Palestinian Authority president saying that the world would have to live with the coalition. But it was unclear whether those statements sounded a death knell for restarting talks."

The AP (2/18) notes remarks by Abbas to Assistant Secretary of State David Welch that "the world will have to deal with a new Hamas-Fatah coalition even if its platform falls short of international demands such as recognition of Israel." Abbas told Welch "he will deliver the same message _ that he has done his best to moderate the Islamic militants – at an upcoming summit with" Rice and Olmert tomorrow. However, Rice and Livni "suggested later Saturday that there would be no room for compromise. Speaking at the start of a meeting in Jerusalem, they said any Palestinian government would have to meet the three conditions of international acceptance – recognizing Israel, renouncing violence and accepting previous peace deals with Israel." Rice "said Saturday she would withhold judgment until the government is formed."

On its front page, the Washington Times (2/18, A1, Mitnick, 88K) notes Abbas "delivered a blunt message" to Welch – "'The world must deal' with Hamas." For her part, Rice "acknowledged that her visit was taking place at a 'complicated time.'" Despite plans to work towards a peace settlement in tomorrow's summit meeting, Rice, Abbas and Olmert "appear likely to be detoured by the Mecca agreement and how it will affect relations with the Palestinian Authority and the flow of international aid."

Gaza "Slow" To Develop 18 Months After Israeli Pullout. Under the headline, "Israelis Are Gone, But Gaza Rebuilding Is Slow," the New York Times (2/18, Myre, 1.16M) examines developments in Gaza since the mid-2005 Israeli pull-back. That "withdrawal raised Palestinian hopes for new homes, schools and businesses, and an easing of the overcrowding." However, "internal Palestinian turmoil, the conflict with Israel and a lack of money have kept the abandoned settlements looking almost exactly as they were the day the Israelis left."

Israel Denies Egyptian-Canadian Spied For Mossad In Turkey. The New York Times (2/18, A9, El-Naggar, 1.16M) details the arrest in Cairo of Mohamed Esam Ghoneim, "an Egyptian student who fled the country six years ago." Ghoneim is accused of "spying for Israel." One newspaper account claims he "left Egypt in August 2001 on a tourist visa to Turkey, where he offered his services at the Israeli Embassy and was recruited by an agent of the Mossad, Israel's intelligence service, to gather information about Egyptians and Arabs living there." The Times notes that "Israeli officials denied the allegations, saying they learned about the case from news reports."

North Korean Negotiations Said To Show Necessity Of Iran Talks. A lengthy analysis piece in the New York Times (2/18, Sanger, 1.16M) examines the "looming question" of US policy towards North Korea and Iran. "When it comes to finding a way to disarm your enemies, here is a puzzle: How do you decide which dictatorial, nuke-building regimes to negotiate with, and which to freeze out, sanction or intimidate with a couple of aircraft carriers?" Although "hardliners and conservatives were assailing the administration last week for 'selling out' to Kim Jong Il, some in the administration were wondering whether there are lessons here for dealing with Iran." The Times notes that Administration officials "worked out" parts of this week's agreement "in one-on-one talks in Berlin of the kind the White House refused to hold a few years back… Those are exactly the steps Mr. Bush refuses to take with Tehran." The Times explains the White House's "logic" -- Pyongyang's "nuclear program is already 'mature,'" and "insisting on suspending fuel production … would not gain the United States any leverage. Iran, they argue, is different. It has no weapons -- at least not yet."

US-Russian Relations Said To Suffer From Mutual Distrust, Disappointments. In a New York Times (2/18, WK3, 1.16M) analysis piece, Steven Lee Myers says a second Cold War "could in its own way be just as messy and unpredictable" as the first. "For all the talk of strategic partnership and even personal friendship" between President Vladimir Putin and President Bush, the "relationship between Russia and the United States has reached what is probably its lowest point since the Soviet Union collapsed a decade and a half ago." Russia and the US "seem headed into a period of tensions when every step is met with distrust and some counterstep, putting them on opposite sides of hotspots around the world, from Iran to Georgia to Kosovo. … The countries are now openly competing for influence in Europe, in the Caucasus and in Central Asia, where access to natural resources and military bases has become paramount for both." While Moscow and Washington "are no more likely to go to war than before," Myers says potential flashpoints abound. And, as in the cold war, it would not take much for simmering tensions to become a grave breach, even a violent one."

US Urged To Hold Putin Accountable For Russian Democratization. In the Washington Post (2/18, B2, 690K), researcher Anders Aslund says Putin's recent "anti-American tirade" was "notable for what it said about his domestic politics." While he "obviously thinks he is riding high," he "has painted himself into a corner as he faces the end of the two terms in office that the Russian constitution allows him. … Having spent his time as president undermining democracy, property rights, the free press and the rule of law by taking over Yukos oil (and throwing its owner into a Siberian prison) and then other big companies, now he and his coterie must cling to power somehow -- or risk losing it all if they cannot stage-manage a transition to the proper person." Putin's international speeches "have the effect of increasing his popularity and therefore his grip on the country." The "ultimate question is how the Putin regime will end," and Aslund says Washington "can no longer be a mere bystander in this drama." Vice President Cheney's "speech in Vilnius, Lithuania, last May was a welcome departure, which enraged the Kremlin. It's the time for the White House to follow through."

Professor Says Cold War Nostalgia Is Misplaced. In an op-ed in today's Los Angeles Times (2/18, 850K), Yale University professor Paul Kennedy says of the Cold War, "There is a palpable sense of nostalgia these days for the familiar contours of that bygone conflict, which has been replaced by a much more murky, elusive and confusing age." That "bipolar world" was "inherently stable," while "today's world is far less stable and indeed much less favorable to the comfortable Western democracies." However, Kennedy argues, "however tricky our relationships with Putin's Russia and President Hu Jintao's China are nowadays, the prospect of our entering a massive and mutually cataclysmic conflict with either nation are vastly reduced." He continues, "Those were really scary times, and much more dangerous than our present circumstance because the potential damage that could be inflicted during an East-West conflagration was far, far greater than anything that Al Qaeda can do to us now."

Italians Peacefully Protest Expansion Of US Airbases. The New York Times (2/18, Kiefer, 1.16M) reports, "Tens of thousands of people converged Saturday on [Vicenza] in the Veneto region of northern Italy for a peaceful protest against the planned expansion of an American military base. The expansion would essentially double the base's size so it could house the full 173rd Airborne Brigade. The number of military personnel here would grow to about 4,500 from 2,750." In addition to local concerns, "the widely publicized demonstration on Saturday was billed as a chance for Italians to express their anger over American foreign policy. Fears grew of a repeat of the violence that overtook antiglobalization protests in Genoa in 2001." The AP (2/18, Barry) adds, "Despite fears that violent demonstrators would be drawn to the protest, the march took place without incident, finishing outside the main train station where it started, as hundred of police officers stood guard and helicopters hovered overhead. The route did not pass the airfield where the expanded base is to be built, where critics keep a permanent picket."

Madrid-ETA Peace Process Said To Be "In Tatters." The Washington Post (2/18, A20, Anderson, 690K) notes last December's "bombing at Madrid's Barajas airport, which leveled a five-story parking lot and killed two Ecuadoran immigrants … shocked" Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero's government and "many Spaniards who had dared to hope that peace talks with ETA, formally known as Basque Homeland and Liberty, would finally settle one of Europe's last and longest violent campaigns for independence." The peace process "is in tatters, with no clear way forward. The bombing destroyed ETA's credibility, eroded confidence in Zapatero's government and emboldened the opposition Popular Party, which has adopted an increasingly strident tone against any compromise with Zapatero on his drive to resolve the issue."

Chavez Family's Efforts To Amass Political Power Criticized. The New York Times (2/18, A10, Romero, 1.16M) describes the "expanding power" of relatives of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez. "From a humble start in a dirt-floored adobe home that was bulldozed to make way for a hamburger stand, the family's widening political clout has been increasingly scrutinized as critics call attention to abuses of power and corruption charges throughout the institutions now controlled by Mr. Chávez, including the National Assembly, the Supreme Court and the federal bureaucracy." Chavez's "family boasts not only a mayor and a governor, but also the secretary of state for Barinas, a post created for the president's brother Argenis, who carries out many day-to-day functions at the governor's palace. Another brother, Adelis, is a senior banker at Banco Sofitasa, which does brisk business with the state government. Adelis also supervises the government's construction of a new soccer stadium in Barinas." The Times adds, "Revelations of corruption under his family's watch in Barinas and accusations of nepotism have dogged Mr. Chávez even as he makes combating such irregularities one of the priorities of his government."

Kirchner's Wife Could Seek Argentine Presidency. Under the headline, "Argentina's First Lady May Have Eye On Husband's Job," the Los Angeles Times (2/18, McDonnell, 850K) reports, "She is a senator and the chief advisor to her husband, who is no less than the president of Argentina. Some call her the real power in the presidential palace. … And the heated rumor mill" says Cristina Fernandez de Kirchner wants husband Nestor Kirchner's job. Citing "a sizzling new round of speculation about Fernandez's long-presumed presidential aspirations," the Times says "the 'new Evita' label appears destined to stick, even if comparisons seem to be a stretch in the case of this lawyer from a middle-class background and the up-from-the-streets Eva Peron."

Stage Could Be Set For Dramatic Cuba Policy Changes. Under the headline, "Ground Shifting Under U.S. Isolation Of Cuba," the Los Angeles Times (2/18, Williams, 850K) reports, "Opposition to restrictive U.S. policies on Cuba has been mounting for more than a decade, but it may have reached critical mass with recent power shifts in Havana and Washington." Saying "a course change may be ahead," the Times notes "polls suggest most Americans want better relations with the island. Farm and energy interests would like to trade and invest in Cuba. A raft of legislation to change trade and travel restrictions has been introduced in Congress this session. Even many who have fled Cuba say it's time to end the standoff." For his part, Raul Castro "has said Cuba would be open to talks on improving relations, but the White House has spurned the offers." The Times adds, "President Bush would probably veto any measure to engage with Cuba, but lawmakers and lobbyists believe there is sufficient support to override a veto or attach policy changes to legislation Bush must sign." Notably, "few see even the slightest flinch in the administration's posture," and some "recent actions" suggest "a status quo."

Pakistani Suicide Bombing Kills 15 In Courthouse. The New York Times (2/18, Gall, 1.16M) reports, "In the sixth suicide bombing in a month, a man blew himself up in a small district courtroom in the border town of Quetta on Saturday, killing 15 people, including a senior judge, and wounding 35." Although no one has claimed responsibility, one local official "connected it to the string of suicide attacks that have now killed some 40 people and put security forces on alert across the country." While "Baluchistan has often been the scene of bombings," that official "said local groups lacked the expertise for suicide bombing." The Washington Post/AP (2/18, A22, Sattar) calls the blast "the deadliest in a series of attacks that have struck the country in recent weeks. Many Pakistanis suspect that pro-Taliban fighters are targeting sensitive sites to undermine the country's support of the United States, and an official in the region where Saturday's attack took place hinted at Afghan involvement."

Chinese Nouveau-Riche Tread Lightly In Changing Society. The Washington Post Magazine (2/18, Fan) profiles the evolution of wealth in China. "After the 1949 Communist revolution, private wealth became a huge social liability. Much of it was confiscated by officials or voluntarily handed over by owners who feared persecution otherwise." In the past twenty years, however, "the booming Chinese economy has been one of the biggest stories in the world. Wealth and conspicuous consumption are climbing in a country where the average per-capita income has only just jumped to $145 a month (in Beijing, it's $209 a month)." Notably, President Hu Jintao "has responded to the growing gap between rich and poor by demanding that more attention be paid to a 'harmonious society.' Authorities have imposed luxury taxes on boats, golf clubs and diamond watches." Among the newly wealthy, "the urge to flaunt economic success competes with the desire to keep a low profile." And, "wealth is beginning to bring other privileges," including political participation.

Washington Foreign Policy Debates Said To Omit Pertinent Intelligence. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (2/18, 850K), Stanford professor Michael May writes, "here's the only thing we know for sure: When the collection of politicians and pundits we call 'Washington' makes predictions about countries in which the U.S. has 'vital interests' (and especially about countries with which we have had bad relations), the predictions — even when they contradict one another! — are almost always wrong. … Washington debates tend to be narrow; they fall within a range of acceptable conventional wisdom and close out anything that seems to go out on a limb. … The assumptions underlying those debates are seldom challenged. They are based on politically acceptable views of the other state and, career-wise, it doesn't pay to challenge them. Indeed, movers and doers in Washington often do not even have time to challenge them. There is little or no intelligence outside the axis of debate."

Kristof Says "Human Rights" Includes Elimination Of Disease. In his New York Times (2/18, WK13, 1.16M) column, Nicholas Kristof depicts efforts by President Carter and others to eliminate the guinea worm, as a human rights campaign. "We tend to think of human rights in terms of a right to vote, a right to free speech, a right to assembly. But a child should also have a right not to suffer agony because of a worm that is easily preventable, as well as a right not to go blind because of a lack of medication that costs a dollar or two, even a right not to die for lack of a $5 mosquito net." Carter "argues -- and he's dead right -- that we conceive of human rights too narrowly as political and civil rights, and that we also need to fight for the human right of children to live healthy lives. He has led the way in waging that battle."

Hoagland Says Business Optimism More Realistic Than Political Negativism. In his Washington Post (2/18, B7, 690K) column, Jim Hoagland describes a "disjunction of spirits" between international business and politics. "Global business is burbling while global politics croaks messages of dread, frustration and hatred. It is supersized Dickens: The best of times by many economic measures is also the worst of times when we listen to the pollsters and the politicians." Hoagland says "selling fear is the oldest tool of politics. Selling hope and confidence is the mother's milk of business. The more we get, the more we have to fear having it taken away by 'others' as defined by race, religion, class or rivalrous sameness. … Abundant financing in global markets and broad confidence in the ability of today's central banks to control inflation have created a buoyant international financial system." While "there is always cause for concern about markets overshooting," the "merchants of political despair are overdoing it."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Guys In Suits: On A Mission (USNEWS)

By Chitra Ragavan

U.S. News and World Report, February 18, 2007

OK, they may look like accountants, but this team of government lawyers is a key cog in the war on terror

Just a few weeks ago, Kenneth Wainstein, the Justice Department's new national security chief, received a book in the mail, a memoir titled Secrets. Its author, Daniel Ellsberg-the former Defense Department analyst who was prosecuted for leaking the Pentagon Papers to the New York Times 36 years ago-sent the book to Wainstein after a spirited exchange with him during a recent panel discussion about prosecuting leakers. "Dear Ken," Ellsberg inscribed in the book, "I shared your revulsion against all leaks until some years ago."

Prosecuting those who leak classified information is just a small part of Wainstein's controversial portfolio. As the assistant attorney general for the National Security Division, created last summer, Wainstein has been handed most of the department's hot-potato issues and has at his disposal some of the government's most secret, powerful, and criticized investigative tools. Just recently, President Bush decided not to reauthorize the National Security Agency's controversial warrantless electronic surveillance program but to place it under a special court-the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court-that oversees government surveillance in intelligence investigations. The revamped program will now be under Wainstein's purview. Look for civil-liberties groups and the new Democratic majority in Congress to keep a close eye on his every move.

The career federal prosecutor seems unfazed by the prospect of such scrutiny. In an interview, Wainstein, 45, said that he is used to making difficult decisions based on the facts and the law. "But with national security being a hot political issue, it's natural for people to scrutinize our big prosecution decisions through the prism of politics," says Wainstein. "Because it's important that we maintain public confidence, we're careful to both make and to announce our decisions in an apolitical way."

Sounds good. But in coming months, Wainstein, a Senate-confirmed presidential appointee, will have to contend with a host of lingering perception problems. "This administration has politicized almost every part of the Justice Department," says Kate Martin, director of the Center for National Security Studies, a civil-liberties group. "We need congressional oversight to prevent this key division from being similarly politicized."

If anyone can serve as an apolitical gatekeeper for the department's professional ranks, friends and colleagues say, it's Wainstein. He was exposed to the trapdoor world of national security issues early in life, thanks to his parents, who both spent their careers in military intelligence. His dad, Leonard, worked for a nonprofit group that advised the Joint Chiefs of Staff. His mother, Eleanor, who died last December, wrote a number of prescient studies for the Rand Corp. in the 1970s on terrorism, Islamic fundamentalism, and corporate kidnappings. "There was a lot of talk about terrorism back then," says Wainstein. "It's just different predators [today]."

Gorilla. A former U.S. attorney for Washington, D.C., Wainstein spent most of his career putting drug dealers, murderers, and crooked politicians behind bars. He later picked up his national security credentials at the FBI, where he served as general counsel and chief of staff to Director Robert Mueller. "You need somebody who can balance the intelligence imperatives with the law-enforcement imperatives," says Chuck Rosenberg, a U.S. attorney in Virginia. "Sometimes they are in conflict, and you need someone to sort that out."

Pilots Traced To CIA Renditions (LAT)

By Bob Drogin And John Goetz, Special To The Times

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

The Times identifies three fliers facing kidnapping charges in Germany related to a 2003 counter-terrorism mission.

CLAYTON, N.C. — The forecast called for heavy snow on the route home, so the three pilots who had just flown a covert CIA-sponsored "extraordinary rendition" flight were forced to stay an extra night at the Gran Melia Victoria, a luxury hotel overlooking the marina on the island of Majorca.

Up in Room 552, the pilot who called himself Capt. James Fairing picked up the phone at 2:28 in the afternoon and dialed his tree-shaded home in a subdivision carved out of pine forests here in Clayton, about 15 miles southeast of Raleigh. He also called his employer, a North Carolina-based air charter service that long has worked for the CIA.

Fairing's copilot, who registered as Eric Matthew Fain, reached for the phone in his room and called a woman back home with whom he owns a 22-foot speedboat and who also flies missions for the CIA. The third pilot from the stranded flight carried a U.S. passport issued to Kirk James Bird. The passport photo shows a balding, middle-age man with a broad smile.

The names they used were all aliases, but The Times confirmed their real identities from government databases and visited their homes this month after a German court in January ordered the arrest of the three "ghost pilots" and 10 other alleged members of the CIA's special renditions unit on charges of kidnapping and causing serious bodily harm to Khaled Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent, three years ago.

Charged under aliases

None of the pilots responded to repeated requests for comment left with family members and on their home telephones. The Times is not publishing their real names because they have been charged only under their aliases.

Relying on the operatives' passport numbers, hotel records, credit card bills and aviation records, German prosecutors are seeking to properly identify the 13 Americans in a high-profile case that has upset relations between Washington and Berlin and caused a political scandal in Germany over whether government officials sanctioned the CIA operation.

Elsewhere in Europe, legal and parliamentary investigations have focused a harsh spotlight on the CIA's program to abduct suspected terrorists and ferry them to secret sites for interrogation, operations known variously as "black renditions" or "extraordinary renditions."

On Friday, an Italian judge issued arrest warrants for 26 suspected CIA operatives for allegedly abducting a radical Muslim cleric outside his mosque in Milan in February 2003 and delivering him to Egypt, where his lawyer says he was tortured. The trial is set for June 8 in Milan.

All the Americans charged, including the top two CIA officers in Italy at the time, have departed the country, but Italian law allows defendants to be tried in absentia.

None of the aliases used in Italy match those in the German case, although one of the pilots may have been involved in both incidents.

One former CIA operation officer who was involved in the Italian case at CIA headquarters, speaking on condition of anonymity because the case is classified, said he and his colleagues were increasingly nervous about traveling in Europe for fear of getting swept up in the investigations. He said he checked with a contact at the Italian intelligence service for reassurance that he would not be arrested.

Seized in error

According to Masri's account, he was detained by local authorities while crossing from Serbia into Macedonia on Dec. 31, 2003. Three weeks later, seven or eight men in masks stripped him naked, put him in a diaper and jumpsuit, drugged him and then chained him, spread-eagle and blindfolded, to the floor of a Boeing 737 that flew to Afghanistan on Jan. 24, 2004. German prosecutors say the men in masks were with the CIA rendition team.

At the time, U.S. intelligence authorities believed Masri was involved with radical Islamic groups in Ulm, a city in southern Germany. Masri was released five months later after undergoing what he described as repeated beatings and other physical abuse in a now-closed CIA-run prison called the Salt Pit in Kabul, the Afghan capital. U.S. officials have told German authorities that Masri was seized and imprisoned in error because his name is similar to that of a suspected terrorist linked to Al Qaeda.

Flight records show that Aero Contractors, based in Smithfield, N.C., operated the plane that carried Masri from Macedonia to Afghanistan. The charter aircraft company has flown scores of sensitive missions for the CIA and has played a key support role in counter-terrorism operations since the Sept. 11 attacks, according to former agency officials.

The three pilots in the Masri rendition case live within a 30-minute drive of the guarded Aero hangar and offices at the rural Johnston County airport. Reached by telephone Saturday, Aero official Freddy Pearce declined to discuss any aspect of the company's business.

The chief pilot in the Masri case, who used the alias Fairing, called Pearce at his Clayton home during his layover in Spain.

In real life, the chief pilot is 52, drives a Toyota Previa minivan and keeps a collection of model trains in a glass display case near a large bubbling aquarium in his living room. Federal aviation records show he is rated to fly seven kinds of aircraft as long as he wears his glasses.

His wife, reached by phone at her office, said her husband had done no wrong. "He's just a pilot," she said.

His copilot, who used the alias Fain, is a bearded man of 35 who lives with his father and two dogs in a separate subdivision. He called home during a subsequent mission from the Royal Plaza Hotel on the Spanish resort island of Ibiza, according to records collected by Spanish investigators from the Guardia Civil.

DOJ_NMG_0133257

The third pilot, who used the alias Bird, is 46, drives a Ford Explorer and has a 17-foot aluminum fishing boat. Certified as a flight instructor, he keeps plastic models of his favorite planes mounted by the fireplace in his living room in a house that backs onto a private golf course here. His wife declined to comment.

On the flight back to Washington, after the snow had cleared, the rendition team celebrated by ordering 17 shrimp cocktails and three bottles of fine Spanish wine, according to catering invoices obtained by the prosecutors.

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Vote In Senate Blocked By GOP (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

7 Republicans Join Democratic Push

Senate Republicans for a second time blocked a symbolic attempt by Democrats to reject President Bush's troop increase yesterday, but GOP defections were higher than before, suggesting Republican cracks as the Iraq war dominates Congress's agenda.

With the 56 to 34 vote, Democrats fell shy of the 60 votes required to kick off debate on a nonbinding resolution passed by the House last week that expresses support for the troops but criticizes Bush's decision to expand combat ranks by more than 20,000 troops. Senate Democrats picked up five new Republican allies in their effort to advance the resolution, bringing the GOP total to seven.

But the fate of the resolution is now very much in doubt. Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) announced after the vote that he would not bring up the resolution again. Both sides instead are girding for the next phase, a confrontation over war funding, with some Democrats determined to exercise the power of the purse to influence Iraq strategy.

As Congress struggled to find its voice in the Iraq debate, the administration intensified its own campaign to convince the American public that the conflict remains winnable. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice paid a surprise visit to Baghdad yesterday, announcing that the increase in troops was bringing "new hope and a new optimism" to the besieged city. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki assured Bush on Friday that the buildup had already achieved "fabulous success."

Those optimistic pronouncements appeared to have little impact on the Senate floor yesterday, where a rare Saturday session made for a dramatic political tableau. Presidential candidates jetted in from various primary states, having canceled visits to popular diners and town-hall meetings to cast their vote. They did not all show. One of the 10 absentees was Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a supporter of the Bush plan, who was campaigning in Iowa.

Most Democrats were already seated at their desks when the roll call began shortly before 2 p.m. The only Democrat who missed the vote was Sen. Tim Johnson (S.D.), who is recovering from brain surgery. Democratic Sens. Robert P. Casey Jr. (Pa.) and Max Baucus (Mont.) canceled plans to visit Iraq this weekend and were present on the floor. Their traveling companions, GOP Sens. Jon Kyl (Ariz.) and Bob Corker (Tenn.), went ahead with the trip and missed the Senate action.

The resolution was identical to a measure that passed the House on Friday, with modest Republican support. "Congress and the American people will continue to support and protect the members of the United States Armed Forces who are serving or who have served bravely and honorably in Iraq," the resolution states. And it adds, "Congress disapproves of the decision of President George W. Bush announced on January 10, 2007, to deploy more than 20,000 additional United States combat troops to Iraq."

Reid said he would not try a third time to put the Senate on record against the troop increase. But he said the Iraq debate would continue when the Senate returns Feb. 26 from a week-long recess and turns to legislation to enact homeland security recommendations from the Sept. 11 commission.

Reid promised that both sides would be allowed to offer Iraq-related amendments to that bill. And Congress will soon debate Bush's request for $100 billion in additional funding for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan for the current fiscal year. In the House, Democrats are moving to fully fund the president's war request, under the condition that the administration follow strict standards for training and equipping troops.

During separate conversations with U.S. and Iraqi officials in Baghdad yesterday, Rice referred to the looming skirmishes in Washington over the troop buildup and funding request.

DOJ_NMG_0133258

"Some of the debate in Washington is in fact indicative of the concerns that the American people have about the prospects of success if Iraqi leadership doesn't do what it needs to do," Rice told reporters during a roundtable discussion at the house of the U.S. ambassador to Iraq yesterday afternoon.

"I think there's a new spirit here to try to do those things," she said. "The input appears to be there. The political support appears to be there."

But Democrats believe they are playing a strong hand in the Iraq debate. Polls show that most voters oppose a troop increase, and the GOP's heavy losses in the November elections were widely interpreted as a call for more aggressive vetting of Bush's Iraq strategy.

As soon as Bush announced the military buildup early last month, Democratic leaders considered ways to officially register an objection. Reid and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) agreed to begin work on a nonbinding resolution, believing it was the easiest vote politically, including for Republicans who are disaffected by Bush's leadership on Iraq.

But in the Senate, Republicans decided to offer their own nonbinding measure, asserting that Congress would not cut off troop funding. Some Democrats opposed to the Iraq war want to target Pentagon spending as a way to force a withdrawal of troops.

Reid refused to allow a vote on the GOP measure, explaining that he wanted to keep the debate focused on the troop increase. Republicans now have twice voted this month to block a nonbinding resolution, on grounds that Reid was not playing fair. In spirited floor speeches in recent days, Democrats taunted their GOP colleagues for throwing up procedural hurdles to protect Bush from a potentially embarrassing repudiation.

"They are trying to divert attention from the issue at hand," Reid said of Republicans yesterday. "They'd like to turn the Senate into a procedural quagmire. They want to hide behind weak and misleading arguments about the Senate's rules or a senator's right to offer amendments. These arguments are diversions."

But Republicans accused Democrats of hiding behind the Senate rulebook to avoid the funding question.

"The reason we're here on a Saturday playing stupid political games while people are off in Iraq trying to win this war is because our colleagues on the other side of the aisle are afraid to take a vote on cutting off funding," blasted Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), in a speech before the vote.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell said he would not relent. "I think the majority of Senate Republicans have made it clear again today, and are highly likely to do that again in the future, that when we turn to this issue, we're going to insist on voting on funding the troops," the Kentucky Republican said.

The White House issued a statement saying "this week's voting gave the world a glimpse of democracy's vigor," but it also welcomed the funding showdown.

"The next votes should provide unmistakable assurance of this nation's resolve in achieving success, supporting the cause of democracy, and stopping terrorist forces in their ultimate aim of bringing their violence to our shores," the White House said.

Seven Republicans voted with the Democrats to allow the debate to proceed, including Sens. John W. Warner (Va.), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), Gordon Smith (Ore.), Norm Coleman (Minn.), Arlen Specter (Pa.), Olympia J. Snowe (Maine) and Susan M. Collins (Maine). When Republicans voted to block a similar, albeit lengthier, resolution earlier this month, only Collins and Coleman broke ranks. Among these Republicans, all but Specter and Snowe are up for reelection in 2008.

The Republican senators aside from McCain, Kyl and Corker who were absent yesterday were Robert F. Bennett (Utah), Christopher S. Bond (Mo.), Thad Cochran (Miss.), John Ensign (Nev.), Orrin G. Hatch (Utah) and Lisa Murkowski (Alaska). Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) voted with Republicans.

The seven Republican defectors are all on record opposing the Bush plan. Several other GOP senators, including Sens. Sam Brownback (Kan.) and George Voinovich (Ohio), have expressed concerns, but they voted with their party yesterday. Warner was the chief author of the earlier nonbinding resolution on Iraq to come before the Senate. That version was shelved last week for the simpler House text.

"I feel that the Senate, the Senate of the United States of America, an institution revered throughout the world, should have the right to go forward and debate this critical issue before America today, before the whole world," Warner said. "I think we've come to the point in time where we must move forward."

Senate Rejects Renewed Effort To Debate Iraq (NYT)

By Carl Hulse, Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0133259

WASHINGTON, Feb. 17 — The Senate on Saturday narrowly rejected an effort to force debate on a resolution opposing President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq, but Republican defections emboldened Democrats to promise new attempts to influence the administration's war policy.

The 56-to-34 vote in a rare Saturday session was the second time Republicans were able to deny opponents of the troop increase a debate on a resolution challenging Mr. Bush, and it came just a day after the House formally opposed his plan to increase the military presence in Iraq.

But the outcome, four votes short of the 60 needed to break a procedural stalemate, suggested that Democrats were slowly drawing support from Senate Republicans for what was shaping up to be a drawn-out fight between the Democrat-controlled Congress and Mr. Bush over his execution of the war.

Seven Republicans split from their party and joined 48 Democrats and one Independent in calling for a debate — five more Republicans than during a similar showdown earlier this month. All but two of the seven face re-election next year.

The Republicans who broke ranks were Senators John W. Warner of Virginia, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Gordon H. Smith of Oregon, Norm Coleman of Minnesota, and Olympia J. Snowe and Susan Collins, both of Maine.

Senator Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada, the majority leader, said the result showed that Senate sentiment was running against the president.

"A majority of the United States Senate just voted on Iraq, and a majority of the United States Senate is against the escalation in Iraq," Mr. Reid said as he withdrew the resolution. He and other party leaders said they intended to introduce quickly more substantive proposals on Iraq when the Senate returns from a weeklong break and begins considering legislation to enact recommendations from the bipartisan Sept. 11 commission.

"We will be relentless," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, the third-ranking Democrat. "There will be resolution after resolution, amendment after amendment, all forcing this body to do what it has not done in the previous three years: debate and discuss Iraq."

Democrats would not divulge the details of their next step, but one official said it would focus on the mission of American troops in Iraq and try to skirt the more politically difficult question of federal money for the military.

Republicans derided Saturday's vote as political theater and said stark divisions among Democrats on the question of military spending would complicate the party's efforts to advance legislation designed to stop the war.

"We want a debate about Iraq that includes funding for the troops," said Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader. "They've denounced the surge. The question is, are they going to fund the troops?"

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said on Saturday that Mr. Bush urged Congress to approve his pending request for $93 billion through Sept. 30 for military operations and played down the importance of the House and Senate votes.

"This week's voting gave the world a glimpse of democracy's vigor," Mr. Snow said in a statement. "The next votes should provide unmistakable assurance of this nation's resolve in achieving success."

But Democrats said the votes in Congress — the first major clashes over the war — reflected widespread public unease with the idea of deepening involvement in Iraq.

"It may be called a surge, but I believe it is a plunge," said Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan and chairman of the Armed Services Committee. "A plunge into the sectarian cauldron, a plunge into the unknown."

Republicans continued to try to make the case that Democrats were shutting down a full-fledged Senate review of Mr. Bush's Iraq strategy by refusing the Republicans a chance to offer an alternative that would place the Senate on record against cutting off money for armed forces in the field.

"The majority cannot tell the minority what we are going to have one vote on, take it or leave it," said Senator Jim Bunning, Republican of Kentucky, defending his party's stance as senators squared off at noon. Democrats were leery of the Republican plan, written by Senator Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, because of its potential to attract the most Senate votes and to overshadow Senate action criticizing the troop increase. Some lawmakers also believed that Congress might be asked to restrict military spending, and they did not want their hands tied by an earlier vote on a more symbolic resolution.

A vote to open debate would have allowed the Senate to begin considering the identical language that was approved on Friday by the House. The resolution states, in part, that "Congress disapproves of the decision of President George W. Bush announced on Jan. 10, 2007, to deploy more than 20,000 additional United States combat troops to Iraq."

Without 60 votes for the procedural motion, the Senate was unable to start debate. It was an outcome that left Democrats accusing Republicans of ducking a vote directly opposing Mr. Bush's policy, even though many of the Republicans had significant reservations about the conduct of the war and concerns for the political repercussions.

DOJ_NMG_0133260

“The American people can see what is happening here,” said Senator Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska. “They know that some want to prevent a vote at all costs.”

Mr. Nelson and Mr. Warner co-wrote an earlier, more detailed bipartisan resolution disagreeing with the troop buildup. But that proposal stalled on Feb. 5, when the Republican leadership held its ranks together against the Democratic plan to allow a vote on that plan but not on the Gregg alternative. Mr. Warner sided with Republicans in that initial vote but broke from his party on Saturday.

“We have the right to respectfully disagree,” Mr. Warner said. “Mr. President, do you need 21,500 additional men and women in this conflict to go into the streets and alleys of Baghdad?”

Some Republicans accused Democrats of political posturing in advance of the 2008 presidential and Congressional elections and of undermining military forces and the administration. They said opponents of Mr. Bush were trying to have it both ways, by criticizing his policy but not taking the more politically risky step of curtailing spending on the war.

“If you think we are in the middle of civil war, cut off funding,” Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, said to his colleagues.

The Saturday session drew a throng of spectators who lined up outside the Capitol hoping to get a glimpse of the debate. The Senate has met on Saturday only 14 times in the past decade and conducted votes on only five of those occasions, records show.

Nine Republican senators were not present for the vote, including Senator John McCain of Arizona, a presidential candidate, who was campaigning in Iowa. Two other Republicans, Jon Kyl of Arizona and Bob Corker of Tennessee, had left for Baghdad.

But with the burden of reaching 60 votes on their side, Democrats, particularly the party’s presidential candidates, did not miss the showdown. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York campaigned in New Hampshire in the morning and came back for the vote; Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, who had been in South Carolina, also came back. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware flew from Iowa to Washington before a scheduled return to Iowa on Saturday night.

GOP Senators Defuse Dems' War Resolution (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — Senate Republicans on Saturday killed a Democratic effort to pass a symbolic resolution opposing President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq.

Democrats, who hold a narrow majority in the Senate, fell four votes shy of the 60 needed on a procedural vote to consider the nonbinding resolution. The 56-34 vote came a day after the Democratic-controlled House, in a largely party-line vote, rebuked Bush's war strategy after four days of often heated debate.

The rare Saturday session of the Senate lasted only about 3 1/2 hours, but was no less intense.

"The United States Senate, the greatest deliberative body in the whole world, is probably the only place (in America not debating the war)," said Robert Byrd, D-W.Va.

Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., accused Republicans of trying to protect the president from an embarrassing vote. He said that he would no longer push for a vote on the nonbinding resolution but that war would remain center stage in the Senate.

"This war is too important to permit Senate Republicans to brush it aside," he said. "The Senate will keep fighting to force President Bush to change course."

Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., accused Democrats of playing "stupid political games."

"This is a low point in my time in the Senate," he said.

The Senate was scheduled to begin a week-long recess Saturday, but Reid kept the chamber in session, saying it was important to get senators on the record on the issue. Nine Republican senators skipped the vote.

Republicans said they were prepared to debate the war but only if Democrats would allow consideration of an alternative resolution opposing any cut in funding for the troops.

A Reid spokesman said the Democratic leader didn't want to include the resolution opposing a cut in funding because it would be a distraction from a "yes or no vote on the escalation." The spokesman said that Reid offered to permit Republicans to bring their resolution at another time.

Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said: "We will not be forced to vote for a resolution that says we support the troops but does not ask us to seal that pledge with a promise to help them carry out that mission in the only way they can -- funding their mission."

DOJ_NMG_0133261

Republicans have contended that the nonbinding resolution is a prelude to Democratic efforts to withhold funding for the war. "The Senate was created to block that kind of dealing, and today it stops at the doors of this chamber," McConnell said.

With Democrats threatening to attach strings to the president's request for additional war funding, the White House issued a statement Saturday saying that the next votes in Congress should "provide unmistakable assurance of this nation's resolve in achieving success (in the war on terror)."

The resolution the Senate was considering taking up is the same one the House passed on Friday. It consists of two short sentences, the first stating that "Congress and the American people will continue to support and protect (U.S. forces serving in Iraq)," a phrase Democrats hoped would undercut attacks that they are undermining the troops.

Part of the second sentence says Congress "disapproves of the decision" Bush announced in a nationally televised speech Jan. 10 to add 21,500 troops to the 135,000-plus in Iraq.

Although the Senate's resolution died, Democrats picked up the support of seven Republicans, five more than from an earlier vote on a similar measure. Five of the seven are up for re-election in 2008.

"This is the most pressing issue facing our nation, and it is important for the Senate to go on record on the president's plan," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, an opponent of the troop buildup who voted with the Democrats.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, an independent from Connecticut who usually caucuses with Democrats, joined the 33 Republicans who voted no.

Democratic senators running for president canceled campaign appearances and flew back to Washington, D.C., from Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

The nine Republican no shows included Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who was campaigning for president in Iowa. They said their vote wouldn't have affected the outcome because they would have voted against limiting the debate to the anti-surge resolution. Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., recovering from brain surgery, also was absent.

Several senators were none too happy about having to rearrange their travel plans for a vote whose outcome surprised nobody. Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, assailed Democratic leaders for calling a rare Saturday session in order to try to "embarrass the 21 of us who are up for re-election (in 2008) on a nonbinding resolution that wouldn't accomplishing anything . . . just to see whether we'd come back to vote."

But Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, one of the Republicans who joined Democrats in voting to debate the anti-surge resolution, objected to the Senate taking a weeklong recess without debating the war.

After the Senate returns from its weeklong recess, both parties are expected to try to attach war-related amendments to legislation -- including a GOP effort to press for a vote on their resolution opposing any cut in funding for the troops.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., on Saturday introduced a resolution setting Dec. 31, 2007 as the expiration date for the 2002 congressional resolution that authorized the U.S.-led invasion against Iraq and requiring the president to return to Congress if he wants to extend it.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., on Friday introduced legislation that she said would cap the level of U.S. troops in Iraq at the number before the president's buildup and begin a phased redeployment of U.S. troops out of Iraq in 90 days. Her proposal also would prohibit the use of funds to send troops to Iraq, it said, "unless they have the proper equipment and training."

Tom Matzzie, Washington, D.C., director of the liberal MoveOn.org Political Action, said Saturday that Republican senators had given Bush "a green light to escalate (the war)."

Freshman Sen. Jon Tester, D-Mont., lamented, "The Senate can't seem to do anything but debate about whether or not to debate.

War Rebuke Halted In Senate (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, February 18, 2007

Senate Democrats yesterday failed in their bid to move forward with a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

The 56-34 roll-call vote was four short of the 60 votes needed to invoke cloture, or to limit debate before a vote. Seven Republicans crossed party lines to vote with Democrats to advance the resolution.

"A majority of the United States Senate is against the escalation in Iraq," said Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat. "As for the Republicans who chose once again to block further debate and protect President Bush, the American people now know they support the escalation" in the number of troops.

It was Mr. Reid's second attempt in less than two weeks to push for a vote on the resolution.

DOJ_NMG_0133262

Republicans said they had rebuffed an "unfair" attempt by Mr. Reid to prevent a vote on an alternative resolution that would protect funding for the troops in Iraq.

"There is no place for chicanery at a time of war," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican. "Even some of the president's most strident opponents know that. They know that the only vote that truly matters is a vote on whether to fund the troops."

The White House yesterday agreed that funding the troops should be a top priority.

"Both houses of Congress within a matter of weeks will conduct binding votes on a matter of cardinal importance for America's future security and global credibility: whether to fund the president's supplemental-funding request for our military," a statement from the White House said. "The president urges both houses to approve his request."

Mr. Reid said the Senate is "moving on" from trying to pass the nonbinding resolution, which cleared the House on Friday by a vote of 246-182.

He said Democrats will push for further debate on the war by attaching amendments to legislation adopting recommendations from the September 11 commission. That issue will be taken up when the Senate returns Feb. 27 from a weeklong recess.

But Senate Democrats offered no details on how they would try to block Mr. Bush's troop-surge plan.

House Democratic leaders have outlined a strategy to limit military options by restricting the use of money in a military-appropriations bill they will take up next month.

Republicans call that a "slow-bleed" approach that will cut off funds for the war, and Mr. Reid gave no indication of whether he will pursue the same strategy in the Senate.

Nine Republicans and one Democrat did not vote yesterday. One of those who didn't vote was Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, a 2008 presidential hopeful.

Mr. McCain, while campaigning in Iowa, told his audience that nonbinding measures are "insulting to the public and the soldiers," according to the Associated Press.

Democrats gained crossover votes yesterday from seven Republicans, up from just two in an identical vote nearly two weeks ago.

The seven Republicans who voted yesterday to advance the measure were Sens. Norm Coleman of Minnesota, Susan Collins of Maine, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Gordon H. Smith of Oregon, Olympia J. Snowe of Maine, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and John W. Warner of Virginia. Sen. Bernard Sanders, Vermont independent, also voted with the Democrats.

But most Republicans insisted yesterday they will stand their ground.

"Harry Reid is not going to be able to stuff us on this one," Sen. Trent Lott, Mississippi Republican, said after the vote. "Every leader thinks he can be a dictator," said Mr. Lott, who was Senate majority leader from 1996 to 2001. "He cannot."

Republicans were determined not to be portrayed as "blocking debate," as they had been after the previous vote.

"Republicans in the Senate have not prevented any debate over the war in Iraq," said Sen. Jim Bunning, Kentucky Republican, at the beginning of the nearly two-hour debate preceding yesterday's vote. "What we have prevented is the majority leader dictating to the minority exactly which resolutions we will vote on."

Still, Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, vowed that Democrats would "be relentless" in their campaign to end the war in Iraq.

"There will be resolution after resolution, amendment after amendment, all forcing this body to do what is has not done for three years: discuss and debate Iraq," Mr. Schumer said. "Just like in the days of Vietnam, the pressure will mount ... and the vast majority of our troops will have to be taken out of harm's way."

A gallery full of spectators watched yesterday's debate preceding the vote, and more than 100 people stood in line outside the Capitol, waiting to enter.

While Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, Texas Republican, was speaking, a lone protester, wearing an American flag bandanna on her head, rose and shouted, according to some in the chamber: "Three-thousand American lives lost. The American people voted bring the troops home."

As Capitol Police officers took the woman out, she shouted, "I yield back the balance of my time," mocking the phrase senators use after finishing their speeches.

No Decision On Iraq Resolution (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman

Chicago Tribune, February 18, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0133263

The Senate expressed strong, bipartisan disapproval of President Bush's policy on Iraq in a rare Saturday session, but lawmakers nevertheless failed to end their debate and pass a non-binding resolution.

One day after the House issued its stinging rebuke to Bush's plan to boost the number of troops in Iraq, the Senate was unable to muster the 60 votes necessary to end a Republican filibuster and pass what has become an important symbol of resistance to the war.

It was the second time in recent days that the Senate was stymied by parliamentary rules requiring the consent of a supermajority before any action could be taken on the anti-war resolution.

The vote was 56-34, with 7 Republicans joining 49 Democrats. Both Illinois senators, Dick Durbin and Barack Obama, voted to cut off debate and proceed to a vote on the resolution.

Frustrated Democrats vowed to continue to press the Iraq issue in the coming weeks on a bill to implement the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission. But they conceded that the resolution itself is dead. Meanwhile, the administration has already begun shoring up combat troops in Baghdad by 21,500 regardless of congressional action.

"The Senate is not done with this issue," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) declared after the vote. "It's too important to be brushed aside."

Angry Republicans insisted that the language in question would demoralize American soldiers fighting in Iraq. And they rejected assertions that their filibuster was preventing the Senate from debating the merits of the war strategy.

"Here is the truth that the American people need to know: Republicans in the Senate have not prevented any debate over the war in Iraq," said Sen. Jim Bunning (R-Ky.). "We are debating the war again today. We have debated the war in the past and we will continue to debate the war in the future."

The fact that Congress was debating the war issue at all stemmed from the voters' decision in November to throw Republicans out of office and hand control of the legislative branch to the Democrats.

Sitting solemnly as the roll was called, senators stood one at a time and answered aye or nay as their name was called. A number of Republicans decided to skip the vote altogether, including Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who was campaigning for president in Iowa.

But other presidential candidates hastily returned from campaign swings in New Hampshire and South Carolina to cast their vote, including Obama, Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Christopher Dodd (D-Ct.).

Many senators expressed disgust that they had been dragged into work on the weekend, accusing Democrats of gamesmanship.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) complained that the Senate was "playing stupid political games" as Reid refused to allow debate on multiple resolutions. And he challenged those that oppose the war to vote to cut off funding, rather than supporting a message of disapproval.

"This is a very, very sad Saturday for the U.S. Senate on the heels of a disaster in the U.S. House, where a majority, a bare majority, of the House wants to send a political message at a time of war that doesn't keep one person from being shot at," Graham said.

The House vote rebuking Bush's war plan was 246-182, with 17 Republicans voting in the majority.

Nevertheless, prominent Senate Republicans such as John Warner of Virginia, a former Secretary of the Navy, argued it was time to move forward, end debate and vote on the resolution.

"We do so because we only wish to express a measure of disagreement on one basic point, an important one, with our president," said Warner, the ranking member of the Armed Services Committee. "We're a co-equal part of our government -- we have the right to respectfully disagree."

Altogether, five Republicans changed their votes Saturday from the one they cast days earlier to prevent the Senate from voting on the resolution.

"In my view, it is most important that the Senate speak out on Iraq. If we continue to debate whether there should be a debate while the House of Representatives acts, the Senate will become irrelevant," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), one of the switchers. "To paraphrase the Roman adage: `The Senate should not fiddle while Iraq burns.' "

With the shadow of Vietnam hanging over the debate, lawmakers said they felt a special duty to take a public stand on the war, nearly four years after it began.

"Just like in the days of Vietnam, the pressure will mount, the president will find he has no strategy, he will have to change his strategy, and the vast majority of troops will be taken out of harm's way and come home," said Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), who accused the GOP of "tying itself into a pretzel" to avoid a vote.

Many senators said Congress never authorized the president to use force to quell a civil war, calling the conflict between the Sunnis and the Shias untenable and unwinnable.

DOJ_NMG_0133264

"It may be called a surge, but I believe it is a plunge -- a plunge into a sectarian cauldron, a plunge into the unknown and perhaps the unknowable," said Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

Reid Claims Symbolic Victory Even As GOP Blocks Iraq Resolution (RC)

By John Stanton

RollCall.com, February 17, 2007

Despite falling four votes short of breaking a GOP filibuster, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) claimed a symbolic victory in the fight over the Iraq War today as Democrats mustered a bipartisan majority of 56 lawmakers to support taking up a resolution opposing President Bush's plan to increase U.S. troop levels in the war-torn country.

Following the failed cloture vote, Reid withdrew the resolution, essentially ending the chances that it will again come before the Senate this year. In a brief statement following the vote, Reid said that "a majority of the United States Senate just voted on Iraq and a majority of the United States Senate is against the escalation in Iraq."

Republicans, however, argued that the vote was a victory for their efforts both to back Bush's plan and to protect the procedural rights of the minority. While Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) argued that "Senate Republicans have indicated once again that they are going to insist on a debate on Iraq that includes funding for the troops," Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) characterized the vote as protecting "what the United States Senate has stood for for 200 years ... [that] if an idea has 60 votes, it gets out of the Senate."

Seven Republicans joined 49 Democratic Senators on Saturday in voting to break a filibuster orchestrated by GOP leaders, five more than had joined Reid earlier this month during his first attempt to take up the resolution. GOP Sens. John Warner (Va.), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), Arlen Specter (Pa.), Gordon Smith (Ore.) and Olympia Snowe (Maine) joined Sens. Norm Coleman (Minn.) and Susan Collins (Maine), the only two Republicans to previously oppose the filibuster.

Within minutes of the vote, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee issued a statement attacking Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) for supporting the filibuster. Sununu is up for re-election in 2008 and is facing what is expected to be a strong Democratic challenge, and the DSCC's statement is likely a harbinger of what is to come over the next several months for him and other vulnerable GOP incumbents who opposed the resolution.

At a press conference following the vote, Reid indicated that he would not look to bring a nonbinding resolution to a vote again, although he remained noncommittal on whether his party would look to take steps to forcibly bring Bush's surge plan to an end. Reid did say that the Senate would take up a bill addressing the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission when it returns from the recess and that votes pertaining to Iraq could occur at that time.

Campaigns Pause For Senate Vote (WP)

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Debate Presents Logistical Challenge for '08 Presidential Hopefuls

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton rushed to Washington yesterday afternoon to join the Senate fracas over an Iraq war resolution after telling a New Hampshire audience hours earlier that she would rather lose support for her presidential bid than apologize for her vote in 2002 authorizing the military action.

Under mounting pressure from antiwar Democrats to make amends for her support for the U.S. invasion of Iraq, which she now says was a terrible mistake, Clinton (D-N.Y.) renewed her vow to end the war if she is elected president. But she refused to repudiate her vote, as former Democratic senator John Edwards has done.

"Obviously I would not vote that way again if we knew then what we now know," the Democratic presidential front-runner said during a town meeting in Dover. "But I have to say that if the most important thing to any of you is choosing someone who did not cast that vote or has said his vote was a mistake, then there are others to choose from. But to me the most important thing now is trying to end this war."

For Clinton and other presidential aspirants, yesterday posed a logistical challenge in trying to straddle the competing demands of a congressional debate over the course of the war and the early, critical phase of the 2008 presidential campaign. Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid's decision to hold a procedural vote Saturday on whether to consider a nonbinding House resolution critical of President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq forced them to scramble their campaign schedules to register votes of little consequence. The Senate fell four votes short of the 60 required to proceed to a floor vote on the resolution.

Clinton scrubbed one scheduled stop in New Hampshire but went ahead with the Dover town meeting before returning to Washington for the vote. In the Senate chamber, she sat composed and quiet in the back row.

DOJ_NMG_0133265

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) had planned to spend the day in Iowa but instead flew back to Washington for the vote, then returned for an evening event. Of all the Senate's presidential hopefuls, he was the only one to speak before the vote.

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) hurriedly departed a campaign stop in South Carolina to cast his vote before hustling to a campaign appearance in Richmond and then boarding a plane to San Diego. Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) voted against moving to a debate on the war before rushing to catch a plane to Orlando, where he was to address religious broadcasters.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), one of his party's front-runners for the 2008 nomination, did not bother to show up. In Iowa yesterday, McCain defended his decision to stay away from Washington in defiant terms, condemning the Senate Democrats for scheduling a rare Saturday vote on what he described as a political charade. He ridiculed the action as a "purely political stunt" that was "insulting to the public and our soldiers" in Iraq.

Other Republicans who showed up for the vote joined in deriding the unusual session as mere grandstanding by Democratic presidential candidates mollifying the party's left flank.

"We're not working," fumed Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.). "We're having a political, theatrical debate that does more harm than good. There are a lot of people who are working on a Saturday, not us. We're trying to jockey for political position among ourselves for '08."

Brownback was perhaps the only presidential candidate in a quandary over the Senate vote. He has voiced serious concerns over Bush's Iraq policies but has cast himself as a conservative's conservative. Yesterday, he decided to stand by the president and his leadership.

"While I do not think a troop surge is the best course of action, I believe that the Senate should be allowed to vote on resolutions that would demonstrate support for the men and women serving in our military and guarantee they have the funds necessary to complete their mission," Brownback said.

But Clinton had the most to say about the war. A video posted on her campaign Web site detailed what she called a plan to end the war. That proposal would cap the number of troops in Iraq at the January level. "It would be against the law to send more," she said. In a nod to House Democratic plans, she endorsed mandates for the training and equipping of combat troops, proposing that the defense secretary would have to certify that the troops met such standards before they are deployed.

Leading House Democrats hope to condition Iraq deployments on a series of caveats: Combat troops would need a year's rest between tours of duty. Combat tours in Iraq could no longer be extended beyond a year. And the Pentagon's "stop loss" program, which keeps some officers in the military beyond their required years of service, would have to end.

Clinton offered no such details. The political centerpiece of her plan would require the president to seek new authorization for the war in Iraq if troop withdrawals do not begin within 90 days.

"Let me be clear," she stated for the camera. "If George Bush doesn't end this war before he leaves office, when I'm president, I will."

In her morning appearance in New Hampshire, she said Democrats cannot wait for bipartisan solutions to stanch the bleeding from a war that has cost more than 3,100 American lives and more than half a trillion tax dollars. "We have to end this war, and we can't do it without Republican votes," she said.

Graham tried to goad Democrats to go further and vote to cut off funding for the war. Senate Democrats have spent weeks refusing to allow a debate on a Republican resolution opposing any withholding of funds for the troops, and Graham ascribed the maneuvering purely to politics.

"Here's the crux of the matter: The reason we're here on a Saturday playing stupid political games while people are off in Iraq trying to win this war is because our colleagues on the other side of the aisle are afraid to take a vote on cutting off funding," he said. "The reason they don't want to be on record is because the radical left will eat Democrat '08 hopefuls' lunch. They will create a fight on that side of monumental proportions."

As Senate Avoids Debate, Only Statements Are Sartorial (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 18, 2007

Senators entered the chamber to vote on the Iraq war yesterday as if emerging from a Lands' End catalogue.

There was Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) in a gray tweed blazer with elbow patches, a purple sweater, lavender shirt and violet tie. Nearby was David Vitter (R-La.), wearing tan slacks and a black knit shirt. No fewer than 17 senators wore navy blazers: Richard Burr (R-N.C.) combined his with green corduroys, Pat Leahy (D-Vt.) with a blue sweater, Tom Carper (D-Del.) with a red sweater, Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) with a windowpane-pattern shirt, and John Sununu (R-N.H.) with wrinkled khakis.

Other weekend legislators had trouble with the casual Saturday concept. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) wore a pink hooded sweater known as a "hoodie," black clogs and white socks. Ken Salazar (D-Colo.) opted for a bolo tie and a western jacket with suede patches on the shoulders. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) went with blue jeans and a turtleneck. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), who does not drive on Saturday because of the Jewish Sabbath, wore hiking boots.

It was, as Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) put it, "a very special occasion." The rare Saturday session, in addition to making the Senate floor look like an Andover reunion, gave the lawmakers one more chance to talk about -- and then vote against -- having a full debate about the direction of the Iraq war. Both sides knew in advance that Republicans still had enough votes to block the debate again (Democrats came up four votes short), but Democrats were determined to cause the GOP maximum discomfort by forcing a vote on the weekend.

"We all know it's rare for the Senate to hold a Saturday vote, but the issue before us is too important to wait," said Harry Reid (D-Nev.), the majority leader.

Lindsey Graham (R-Blue Blazer-Gray Flannel Slacks) referred to see it as "a very, very sad Saturday" for all. "This is being billed as an unusual Saturday session where the Senate is working," said Graham, sporting South Carolina's palmetto-tree emblem on his tie. "I would argue we're not working, we're having a political theatrical debate."

West Virginia's Robert Byrd (D-Beige Suit), who knows something about theatrics, volunteered: "If it will help to bring our soldiers home, I will work every Saturday for the rest of this Congress. I will stand here -- right here! right here! -- on this floor, on this floor of this Senate every day, every day, every day, 24 hours every day if it would mean one less family without a son or a daughter. Hear me!"

Alaska's Ted Stevens (R-Blue Blazer-Gray Trousers), was sour about delaying his Presidents' Day recess. "It is an important subject to be debated, but why Saturday?" he complained.

With a few exceptions (Barack Obama sauntered in 20 minutes after the vote began), the Democratic senators attempted a note of solemnity. They sat quietly at their desks for the vote, standing to call out "aye." But Republicans, nine of whom skipped the vote entirely, declined to play. McConnell, the minority leader, ignored the clerk when his name was called. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) made a show of breezing through -- he put on his overcoat immediately after voting and left with his briefcase -- and fellow Kansan Pat Roberts (R-Blue Blazer-Chinos) wore a blue scarf and playfully swatted colleagues with his driving cap.

Wearied by two weeks of fighting over whether to have an Iraq debate, the senators by yesterday had resorted to calling each other chickens.

"Apparently some in the Senate are afraid of such a debate," said Byrd, who punctuated his taunts by sneezing into his microphone.

"I am not running from a vote," announced Jim Bunning (R-Ky.). "I don't know one of my Republican colleagues that is afraid to cast a vote."

"I applaud the courage of a few hearty Republicans who will vote cloture and allow this vote to occur," Reid bullied.

"I'm not afraid of your ideas," Graham maintained.

McConnell advised the Democrats that their position "takes no courage."

Among the few senators who did demonstrate courage yesterday was John Warner (R-Va.), who was all business in a dark blue suit and a dress shirt with French cuffs. He wore an angry expression as he heard Graham accusing Democrats of following the "politics of the moment" and "trying to jockey for political positioning." As Graham raged on, Warner made a circling motion with his finger and pretended to bang a gavel in an attempt to get the presiding officer to cut Graham off.

"I've been privileged to be a member of the United States Senate now in my 29th year," Warner said when Graham finally was silenced. "Never have I stood on this floor and in any way impugned the integrity of any senator." Siding with the Democrats, Warner declared that "we must move forward" with a debate, adding: "I think I'm doing right for the integrity of this institution."

Graham, who left his desk after his tantrum, must not have heard Warner's reproach. Even after his side prevailed in blocking the debate, Graham was still swinging. "I'm not afraid of any other idea," he boasted at a news conference. "There's nothing on the table I'm afraid of."

Not that anybody doubted Graham. It takes a strong man to wear a palmetto tie.

Senate Blocks Iraq War Resolution Debate (AP)

By David Espo

AP, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Senate gridlocked on the Iraq war in a sharply worded showdown on Saturday as Republicans foiled a Democratic attempt to rebuke President Bush over his deployment of 21,500 additional combat troops.

The vote was 56-34. That was four short of the 60 needed to advance the measure, which is identical to a nonbinding resolution that Democrats pushed through the House on Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0133267

"The Senate, on behalf of the American people, must make it clear to the commander in chief that he no longer has a rubber stamp in Iraq," said Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., in the final moments before the vote.

Republicans blasted him and the Democratic leadership for refusing to allow a vote on an alternative that ruled out any reduction in money for troops in the field.

"A vote in support of the troops that is silent on the question of funds is an attempt to have it both ways," said Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the GOP leader. "So we are asking for an honest and open debate."

The vote marked the second time this winter that Senate Republicans have blocked action on nonbinding measures critical of the president's war policies. This time, however, there were signs of restlessness within the GOP.

Seven Republicans broke with their leadership, compared with only two on the previous test vote.

Also this time, the maneuvering concerned a nonbinding measure that disapproved of Bush's decision to deploy the additional troops and pledged to support and protect the troops.

The vote in the House on Friday was 246-182, with 17 Republicans breaking ranks to support the measure and two Democrats voting in opposition.

Saturday's debate and vote occurred in an intensely political environment, both in and out of the Capitol. The unusual weekend session sent presidential contenders in both parties scrambling to make the vote.

One of them, Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, squeezed in a morning appearance in New Hampshire, where she told one audience, "We have to end this war and we can't do it without Republican votes."

Polls show strong public opposition to the war, which as killed more than 3,100 U.S. troops. Democrats seemed eager to force Republicans into votes that might prove politically troublesome.

"They are torn between their president's policy and the wishes of the constituents, but vote they must," said Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, head of the Senate Democrats' campaign committee.

Democrats in both the House and Senate have said the nonbinding measures would be only the first attempt to force a shift in Bush's war policies.

In the Senate, Reid has told lawmakers he will turn anti-terrorism legislation into a forum for debate over the war. He has met privately in recent days with fellow Democrats as the leadership plans its next move.

In the House, Democrats have said they will attempt to place restrictions on Bush's request for an additional $93 billion for the military in an attempt to make it impossible for him to deploy all 21,500 additional troops.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., has described a series of provisions that would require the Pentagon to meet certain standards for training and equipping the troops, and for making sure they have enough time at home between deployments.

Murtha and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., describe these provisions as designed to protect the troops.

Republicans argue the effect would be to deny troops needed reinforcements and are expected to try to block the restrictions.

Republicans Block Senate War Debate (POL)

By Daniel W. Reilly, John Bresnahan

The Politico, February 17, 2007

In a rare Saturday session, Senate Republicans blocked Democrats from debating a House-approved resolution rejecting President Bush's plan to send another 21,500 combat troops into Iraq.

Republicans united largely behind Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., and refused to allow the measure to be considered unless they could offer an alternative declaring that funding for military personnel in Iraq would not be cut.

The vote on a cloture motion filed by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., was 56 to 34, four short of the 60 votes needed to begin debate.

Seven Republicans voted with the Democrats: Sens. John Warner of Virginia, Norm Coleman of Minnesota, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Gordon Smith of Oregon and Susan Collins and Olympia Snowe, both of Maine.

Only Coleman and Collins had previously sided with the Democrats in an earlier bid to start Senate debate an Iraq resolution that would certainly have led to a rebuke of the president’s strategy.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, I-Conn., joined the GOP filibuster Saturday and voted against cloture.

Republican Sens. Bob Bennett of Utah, Kit Bond of Missouri, Thad Cochran of Mississippi, Bob Corker of Tennessee, John Ensign of Nevada, Orrin G. Hatch of Utah, Jon Kyl of Arizona, John McCain of Arizona (read more here) and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska did not vote.

Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., recovering from brain surgery, has been absent from the Senate for several months.

DOJ_NMG_0133268

At the White House, press secretary Tony Snow said the president was focusing on votes down the road to fund the war in Iraq, not on the latest “nonbinding” resolutions.

“This week’s voting gave the world a glimpse of democracy’s vigor," Snow said in a prepared statement. “The next votes should provide unmistakable assurance of this nation’s resolve in achieving success, supporting the cause of democracy, and stopping terrorist forces in their ultimate aim of bringing their violence to our shores."

After Saturday's Senate vote, Reid claimed the results showed the president was losing support from Senate Republicans for his plan to “surge" more troops into Iraq to help quell the violence there.

“A majority of the United States Senate just voted on Iraq, and a majority in the United States Senate is against the escalation in Iraq," Reid said.

But McConnell, is a speech on the Senate floor, charged that Democrats want to cut off funds for the troops in Iraq but were afraid to proceed. He characterized as a political stunt a vote on the Iraq resolution that was passed, 246 to 182, by the Democratic-controlled House on Friday. Seventeen House Republicans broke with the president then and supported measure rejecting the troop surge.

“Let those of us who support the president’s plan to win in Iraq say so. Let those of us who oppose it say so," McConnell said. "But we will not be forced to vote for a resolution that says we support the troops but does not ask us to seal that pledge with a promise to help them carry out that mission in the only way [we] can — funding their mission."

And Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., said: "If you did have this vote, the left, the radical left, would eat every Democratic presidential hopeful alive."

"The hard left wants out of this war yesterday,’’ Graham added. “And two-thirds of this body understands the hard left is dead wrong."

Senate Democrats Again Fail To Get Iraq Vote (HILL)

By Klaus Marre, Alexander Bolton

The Hill, February 17, 2007

The effort of Democratic leaders to force a Senate vote on a non-binding resolution opposing a troop surge in Iraq was blocked in a rare Saturday session. Though a majority of senators supported the plan in a 56-34 vote, Democrats were unable to convince a sufficient number of Republicans to support them and failed to get to the 60-vote threshold they needed to move forward.

A day after the House rebuked President Bush's plan to add more than 20,000 combat troops to the existing force in Iraq, Senate Democrats again failed to invoke cloture and move to a vote on the underlying resolution. But while they fell short by 11 votes on February 5, this time they were only four votes shy of getting cloture.

Republicans supporting the measure were Sens. John Warner (Va.), Arlen Specter (Pa.), Susan Collins (Maine), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), Gordon Smith (Ore.), Olympia Snowe (Maine) and Norm Coleman (Minn.).

Sen. Joe Lieberman (Conn.), an independent who caucuses with the Democrats, voted against cloture.

Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Barack Obama (Ill.), two of the frontrunners for the Democratic presidential nomination, decided to be in Washington for the vote rather than go campaigning. Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), a contender for the Republican nomination, did not vote.

The debate leading up to the vote Saturday was marked by heated rhetoric and interrupted by a protestor who had to be removed from the gallery.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) said the day marked a "low-point" in his career as a senator. He accused Democrats of playing "stupid political games," adding that if they think the situation in Iraq could not be salvaged, then they should just vote to cut off funding.

Several Republicans strongly criticized Democratic leaders for how they have handled the issue, accusing them of partisanship and trampling on minority rights in the Senate. The GOP wants to vote on its own resolutions on the issue.

"The Senate is the greatest deliberative body in the world, but it's becoming clear that differing views and amendments will not be considered," said Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.). "The Democrats' hypocrisy is becoming a pattern that ignores their promises of bipartisanship."

But Democrats rejected those assertions and Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) said the vote was about Senators standing up and declaring where they stand on Iraq.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) stated prior to the vote that it was "an opportunity to send a powerful message." Reid and other Democrats accused Republicans of using Senate procedures to avoid a debate on the issue.

Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) said the Senate is "probably the only place" in the country where the debate on the Iraq war is not taking place.

Schumer said the resolution is the first step in ratcheting up the pressure on Bush and predicted eventually this would lead the president to change his strategy and eventually help get the troops home.

"This is not a fight against terrorism - this is a civil war…," Schumer said, calling Bush's Iraq policy misguided.

Following the vote Reid, when asked what the next step would be and whether it would include cutting funding, said, "I know of no talk at this stage about cutting funding."

Reid also stated that the Senate would move onto other issues. The upper chamber will take up legislation implementing the recommendations of the 9/11 commission after the Presidents' Day break. Senators are expected to offer amendments related to the war to that bill.

Senate Won't Vote On Objection To Troop Buildup (CNN)

CNN.com, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Senate Democrats failed to garner the 60 votes they needed to consider a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq.

The vote was 56-34, with seven Republicans crossing the aisle to vote with senators who oppose the troop buildup.

The measure was identical to a nonbinding resolution the House passed Friday denouncing the plan to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq.

"We are policing a civil war in Iraq," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-New York, said before the vote. "American troops should not be in the middle of that war."

He added, "The president's escalation is misguided, to put it kindly."

The Saturday vote was a procedural decision on whether the Senate should move on to a final vote on a resolution that expresses opposition to Bush's plan.

Republicans pushed for an amendment by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-New Hampshire, that would address funding of the war, which they said would make the vote meaningful.
